OUR WAR ILLUSTRATIONS.

On page 4 we illustrate SHIP ISLAND, lately occupied by our troops; on page 13 the vessels composing GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION; on page 12 a view of GREEN RIVER BRIDGE, KENTUCKY; and on page 5 SAVANNAH AND ITS APPROACHES.

SHIP ISLAND was occupied by the advance-guard of General Butler's expedition on 30 December. The troops consisted of the 26th Massachusetts and 8th Connecticut Volunteers, under command of Brigadier-General Phelps. They left Massachusetts in the steamer Constitution. The expedition was duly illustrated in Harper's Weekly at the time. On the 31st, as we said, they effected their destination, landed, and occupied the island without molestation. It is understood that they are to be followed by other troops, as future naval operations will be commenced against Mobile or New Orleans, or both. The following ground plan of Ship Island will, with our illustrations, enable our readers to understand the importance of the movement:

Ship Island is situated in longitude 89 and a little north of latitude 30, and is the property of the state of Mississippi. It is about sixty miles from New Orleans, nearly the same distance from Mobile, and Northeast by East of the Mississippi River, forty miles from Mobile, and nineteen from Pickens. It lies between Horn Island on the east and Cat Island on the west, and is distant about five miles from each. Some five or more miles to the north, on the main land of Mississippi, are the towns of Biloxi, Tschoupola, and Handsboro'. The two towns are favorite summer resorts for the wealthy planters and merchants of the Gulf States, both, of course, cannot be off their shore, are now the places of refuge for rebel gun-boats.

Ship Island is somewhat undulating, and extends in a slight curve about two miles outer-coastwise, and westeastward. At West Point (the western end), where the fort is located, the island is about a mile in breadth of a mile wide, and is a mere sand spit, utterly barren of grass or foliage of any kind. At the eastern end it is about half a mile across, and is wild, and is well wooded with pine, cedar, and live-oak.

The whole island contains a fraction less than two square miles of surface. Excellent water can be obtained by unlimited supply by sinking a barrel any where on the island. The island is admirably suited for the purpose of a depot command.

The island possesses a very superior harbor, into which fifteen feet can be carried at ordinary tides, and at the eastward north of the west end of the island. The anchorage, with water equal to the land, is about a mile in length, and averages three and a quarter miles in width. The harbor is one of the most landcrest secure in the Gulf—from the east-eastward, northward and eastward, and southward and southwest. In the harbor, during these storms without a pilot, if good light-houses were placed in proper positions. The fort was full of rain-water, and was broken to fourteen inches.

FORT MASSACHUSETTS, of which we give an illustration, is thus described in the Herald letter:

The fort, which is situated on the sand spit at the extreme western end of the island, is now under the charge, somewhat resembling a rear in form. As I have stated already, it was completed in accordance with the Federal Government, and when in a state of demolition progress was learned by the rebels, who obtained of work and then abandoned it. Piles of brick, and rendered bombproof by sand-bags, are now to be seen in front of the work.

The fort is built eleven casemates, and our forces have built two more since they occupied the fort. The casemates are bombproof. The fort is at present but one tier high, it is provided with Dahlgren guns, and a gorgeous of very heavy caliber and in perfect order, and there are barely enough guns to mount the fort, and two boards in removing them from the transport. It is hoped that they will be able to mount the fort in a few days, and that even the spot where it fell.

The vessels composing GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION will be found portrayed on page 13. They comprise vessels of all kinds, from steamsloops to schooners. The principal vessels in composing the expedition proper, are North River propellers altered into gun-boats. These vessels, it is believed, will carry two-rifled, as they can carry a large number of men, besides acting as gun-boats. They have been strengthened forward and aft, and carry from two to four guns each. The destination of General Burnside's expedition is, of course, a secret. It is asserted, however, that it will operate in conjunction with General M'Clellan, and form a base not very far from Fortress Monroe.

GREEN RIVER BRIDGE, KENTUCKY, near which the contending armies under Schoepf and Zollicoffer have been encamped, is 73 miles from Louisville, Kentucky, on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. This most elegant structure was built in the Fall of 1857. It is nearly 1000 feet in length; the centre pier is 115 feet high. The first or south span was blown up by the rebels and entirely destroyed.

Our bird-eye view of SAVANNAH AND ITS APPROACHES will convey a clear idea of the theatre of Commodore Dupont's operations.

OUR WAR MAP.

We have republished separately the admirable

War Map of the Southern States, which appeared in a late Number of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and are prepared to furnish it

BEAUTIFULLY COLORED,

at SIX CENTS per copy, with the usual discount to Agents. This Map is generally admitted to be the MOST COMPLETE WAR MAP IN EXISTENCE.

ADVERSERS.

The great exertions made by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY to illustrate the WAR have been rewarded by a large increase of circulation. During last year over FIVE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS of the WAR have been published in HARPER'S WEEKLY. A new circulation OVER HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND COPIES WEEKLY, which is, we believe, the largest circulation of any Journal in this country in which Advertisements are published. Price 50 and 75 cents per line.

The ETHIOPIAN Dealers will be supplied with HARPER'S WEEKLY by John Adonis Knight, Publisher of the London Journals, 20 Fleet Street, London, England. Yearly Subscriptions and Advertisements will be received, and single copies of HARPER'S MONTHLY and WEEKLY furnished.

THE "TRENT" QUESTION.

It is well understood that Great Britain has demanded satisfaction for the Trent affair, in what manner and to what extent is not known at the time we write. It is inferred from the tone of the British press that the degree of satisfaction required is such as can not be granted without subjecting the United States to decided humiliation. And the question which has engrossed for months the British cabinet during the past week has been whether we should submit to humiliation, or go to war again with England.

The answer to that question has not been unanimous. Some of our leading men and some journals on the war with England if the British demands growing out of the Trent affair are such as can not be honorably complied with. Others again, who think that national honor can not afford to embark in a foreign war, and that it is better for us now to submit to the demands of the British ministry, for the time being, and to trust to the future for opportunities of redress and vengeance. The latter view appears to be entertained by those whose opinion is entitled to the greatest weight.

They argue that if the British navy and British credit were placed at the service of the rebels, it would be a very serious matter indeed, to conquer them. We might, and we probably would, do infinite injury to British commerce. We could, if it were deemed worth while for whose accomplishment we have taken up arms would be placed beyond our reach. The war between the two countries in which the States would be prolonged indefinitely, and our ultimate success would be rendered extremely doubtful.

In view of these considerations, and of the paramount importance of preserving the Union —all costs, and at whatever they may be, and to preserve to rebels the right of property the controversy between. That this is the view of the Administration we do not know. But there is reason to believe that it is the view of a large and active as any one to the vital importance of maintaining our nationality at any sacrifice, and that he will not risk the main point for the sake of incidental controversies and side issues.

Of the conduct of Great Britain in this affair it requires neither comment nor opinion to understand language. It is as well known in England as here that the United States are engaged in a life struggle; that their armies and their navy are enlisted in a contest for the maintenance of our nationality: that there never has been a time since the commencement of this experiment when this country was less fitted to embark in a foreign war. It requires some self-command to remain upon the conduct of a nation which chooses this moment to offer us the option of war or humiliation. History, we think, may hardly be searched for a parallel. For a dozen times since 1814 occasions of war have arisen between this country and England, and have always been adjusted by negotiation. It is only now, when our whole energies are engrossed in a domestic struggle, that England ventures to threaten us with war.

But a just Providence rules, and to Him the issue may safely be intrusted. No wrong, in national affairs, ever goes unpunished. In such baseness as England has exhibited in the course of the past nine months can escape retribution. A time will come—and in our day, too—when we shall call England to account for the unnatural enmity she has displayed toward us, and especially for her base sympathy with traitors and pirates, and for her cowardice and cowardice she now evinces in trying to drive us in the wild hour of our most trying extremity. She should be the last power in the world to make us her foe, for she has not a friend in the world. There is not a nation in Europe that would not exult over the fall of England, for there is not one she has not insulted, outraged, or injured at some moment when they could not strike back. France, Russia, Spain, Germany, Italy—all will sympathize heart and soul with us when the time comes for our retribution, our vengeance. Millions of human structures in India, and millions in China, will bless the day when we strike to the heart of the brutal oppressor, who, for a century, has trampled them, and robbed them, and cheated them, and tried to convert them into mere instruments for the consumption of Manchester and Birmingham goods. Twice in our history we have fought with England, each time for causes which even Englishmen now admit to have been just. We are prepared now fight in prospect but it will be the last.

THE LOUNGER.

HARPER'S WEEKLY wishes its friends a Happy New Year! It has every reason to do so, for it believes that it will be prosperous and influential the coming time. Nor can it be unmindful of the prosperity which has followed it during the past year. The last year now closes—a prosperity which it may fairly say is not altogether undeserved. With a weekly issue of 120,000 copies, an illustrated journal like this is necessarily a power in the land. To-day, at least, while it compliments all others, it has a right to claim for itself a distinguished and specially if it means, in good faith, not to forget itself in the coming year, but to serve its friends as faithfully as in the past.

A Happy New Year! It can hardly fail to be that. Already, in our Southern metropolis—as already wasting itself away, and it will leave the land freer and fairer in all good purposes and principles. The dawn of peace calls to the mountains from the East, beyond the sea, is a dent that is unmistakable, and we shall shy shine before long. We have come in the last year to our national consciousness. We have proved to ourselves that the sons are worthy of the sires. We have shed our money and blood, and will yet cost more. But that temporary sacrifice is the price of peace welcome, and the consequences will make each future year of our lives a Happy New Year.

A CHAPTER OF HISTORY.

WHATEVER be the result of the difficulty between this country and England, history will record but a few simple facts:

That this was a great friendly power at peace with Great Britain;

That a different political systems each country was working out the problem of constitutional liberty;

That our commercial relations were most essential and intimate;

That the traditional mutual jealousy and dislike springing naturally from the circumstances of our earlier history were fast disappearing;

That the Civil War was not necessarily an Anti-Slavery nation, and the system of Slavery still lingered among us, yet that public sentiment here was rapidly repudiating the institution, and a lawful solution of the question, of which the proof was this civil war, in England;

That that result being clearly foreseen by a faction in the country, they raised the standard of revolt professedly to destroy this Government and establish another upon the corner-stone of Slavery;

That no other reason for the revolt was seriously presented or considered;

That immediately upon the declaration of this purpose the Government, by every practicable means, or achieved any result whatsoever, the British Government, without waiting for a word from this Government, at once declared the rebels at war with the great power, thereby treating a faction aiming to subvert a friendly government for the purpose already indicated as the surface equal of that government;

That in reply to the natural incredulity, surprise, and indignation of loyal American citizens, the chief organs of British opinion, leading statesmen, and public meetings assumed the identity of this Government as a fact already accomplished, and based their sympathy with the rebellion upon the integrity of the nation of waging a wicked and fratricidal war;

That the thinly-veiled sympathy with the rebellion, and selfish delight in the difficulties of this nation, which, with few exceptions, have been manifested by Great Britain from the beginning of the length induced the captain of an English passenger steamer, in open and deliberate violation of the Queen's proclamation—which was intended to embarrass this Government by granting belligerent rights to rebels which expressly forbade any of the English subjects to carry "officers, soldiers, dispatches, arms," etc.—to receive as passengers two men professedly going to the bleu to commissaries of the rebels to foreign courts, and so publicly declared to be by the confession of the captain himself;

That in pursuance of the unquestionable rights of a belligerent power, a naval officer of the United States, regarding the offending steamer, and not seizing the traitors, kindly permitted the offending ship to escape;

That Great Britain had always exercised, and still asserted, the right of stopping any American vessel on the high seas, and removing any British seaman found on board;

That she had thus stopped hundreds of American vessels, impressed thousands of sailors;

That upon hearing what this nation had done, the English press and Parliament and the parliamentary right to do precisely as they chose, and other nations only what Great Britain might permit;

At this point the record, for the moment, closes. If it shall be completed by the further fact that thereupon England declared war against us, recognized the rebellion as a successful revolution, and, in concert with the slaveholders, sought to overthrow this Government and consummate the ruin of the country, no student of history will be surprised. No intelligent man is surprised. There is little to be surprised. Only the greatest firmness and care upon the part of this Government can prevent her hastening, in the hour of our peril, from dealing a blow which she will hope may remove her most formidable rival forever.

WHAT WILL BE DONE?

THE attitude of the country and the tone of the newspapers since the news of the English excitements are most extraordinary. The calm calm and perfectly firm, neither inviting nor evading a war, which could not be to full measure forced upon all sides, the feeling of the nation undoubtedly is to acknowledge frankly any wrong that may have been committed and to make it up as we dishonor.

Unquestionably the Government will insist that by all international law and usage, and especially by the uniform conduct of England upon the ocean, nothing can be clearer than the right of a national ship to stop any neutral vessel and remove contraband of war, dispatches, and agents.

We do not recognize the claim which Great Britain has set up that the Queen's proclamation, which already wanting itself away, and it will leave the land freer and fairer in all good purposes and principles. The dawn of peace calls to the mountains from the East, beyond the sea, is a dent that is unmistakable, and we shall shy shine before long. No intelligent man is surprised. There is little to be surprised. Only the greatest firmness and care upon the part of this Government can pre-

WHY IS ENGLAND OUR ENEMY?

WHY should England wish a war with us? In the last war our personal friend it are questions that are instinctively asked by many. Why is it so fondly cherished the tradition that England was a peculiarly unfriendly country? Why is the commonality of language and race is sufficient to secure permanent friendship between us.

But the case is not so clear to a moment's calm consideration.

If we emerge victorious from the suppression of the rebellion, as no sane man doubts, we shall have demonstrated the superiority of our system to every other in the world. The British Government could hope to subdue a conspiracy so vast and vigorous as this has proved to be. Our success will be the most triumphant argument against aristocratic system. Every English coronet, from the crown to the cap, will be found to be stained in the Englishman of proved deepest insight; and what would not English toryism and the tory populace of John Bull do with a word more than Jacobin politics! Our success will be a tremendous political argument against England.

But again, if we are victorious, we come out with an army and a navy which make us absolute masters of the North Continent, and masters of the seas. What, then, becomes of the mistress? If John Bull bears, like the Turk, no rival near the throne, is he not likely to deal with the rivalry?

Our domestic struggle is thus really the crisis of England. Her very existence is beginning, and hence all her conduct during the contest. Doubling she will strain every point now to precipitate war. If she does not, she will secure insult upon an ultimatum, this effort will be defeated.

The cue of England at this moment is to insist upon the rights of neutrals, in order to give the way to a recognition of the Confederate traitors. That again places in all questions of difficulty between us and her the temerity to deny the right of secession" exclaimed an Englishman the other day, who had been a friend to the country from the first, and the Athenæum, a purely literary and scientific London journal, begins a review of a work upon the American Union by a Mr. James Spence, with these words: "Although Mr. James Spence takes the unpopular side of the American question in his book, and arranges with lucidity and force the arguments which establish the existence of a constitutional right to secede in the theory of the Constitution," etc., etc.

This is amusing, because nothing is more profound than the ignorance of every Englishman in the matter of our political system. That they should not understand it is not surprising, but that they should now, whether in the person of Mr. James Spence, or these mysterious and final gentlemen "the Law Officers of the Crown," undertake to enlighten the world at large, and especially the President and his Cabinet, as to the proper interpretation of our Constitution, is so ludicrously preposterous that it must be turned off with a loud laugh.

And yet, notwithstanding this practical absurdity, and the unquestionable alienation of English feeling from this country, and the imminent danger of a collision, there is no good reason for supposing that the collision may not be avoided. A century, however, will not repair the mischief worked by the jealousy of England at this time. We may be ceremonious acquaintances, punctiliously careful upon every point of etiquette, but we shall not for many a generation be the friends that we ought to be now, and that so many believed we already were. Nor can any just judge declare that the reason is to be found in any tariff system that we may have adopted. No such purely superficial question explains so deep a difference. It is to be found in the eagerness and evident joy with which England hailed the prospect of our national ruin.

AN ARMORY IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE letter of the Hon. Isaac N. Arnold, of Chicago, representative from Illinois, to the President—the appointment of Mr. Kellogg, of the same State, upon the Committee for the establishment of a Western Armory, and the memorial of the citizens of Chicago to the Government setting forth the claims of that city as the proper site, all show that the Northwest is thoroughly alive to the importance of securing that armory for the great capital of that region.

The case of Chicago is a very strong one, and its chief points are the following:

That the arsenal should be somewhere in the Northwest is generally admitted. There are three on the eastern side of the Alleghany—namely, Watervliet, West Point, and Springfield; but the Northwest, whose population exceeds that of all the loyal Eastern States, has none. The western and northwestern frontiers are the points where arms will be required for the next century; and at the beginning of the present war there were no arms of any importance in the whole region. In Illinois there was the greatest difficulty in getting even a few thousand, and the troops when posted as sentries were for a long time compelled to do duty with clubs instead of muskets.

The great security of the works at Chicago is another consideration strongly urged. From the seat of domestic rebellion Chicago is separated by hundreds of miles of territory filled with a brave and loyal people. From foreign attack she is vulnerable only through the Straits of Mackinaw. The small expense of a fortification there, as Mr. Arnold shows, would make the lake inaccessible. The immense commerce of the lakes, exceeding in the whole the entire foreign commerce of the country, could, in case of need, be sheltered in Lake Michigan, and by means of an arsenal the merchant marine be rapidly converted into a navy.

The economical view is not less strongly presented. The iron, copper, lead, and lumber could be furnished, according to estimates, more cheaply in Chicago than elsewhere. Provisions are cheap. Mechanical labor abundant. Thirteen trunk lines of railway, counting, with their connections, more than five thousand miles, centre in Chicago. The futility of reliance upon one line of road has been shown painfully enough in the Baltimore and Ohio and Baltimore and Washington roads. But besides the railroads, the water communication by the great lakes and the Illinois canal and rivers, all improvable at an expense entirely disproportioned to the value of the results, is unsurpassed in the West.

Pittsburg is the rival claimant with Chicago. But in regard of building material, lumber, iron, copper, lead, coal for smelting, provisions, transportation, and security, the advantages seem to lean to Chicago. In skilled labor the two places are fully equal. The advantage of Pittsburg appears to be in motive power, in the cost of bituminous coal. But Chicago pluckily claims that this difference in the cost of coal for one purpose is more than counterbalanced by the other important considerations suggested. And as the Government owns ground at Pittsburg on which the armory might be built, Chicago will willingly furnish ground free of cost.

Mr. Arnold's letter contains some very curious and interesting statements. "Millions," he says, "are very properly expended annually in protecting and fostering the foreign commerce of the nation. The expense to the national treasury of the enormous trade on the great lakes is merely nominal; a few light-houses and a single revenue-cutter armed with a single gun." Again he says: "A line drawn north and south through Pittsburg will show a majority of the loyal people of the Union west of that line. Yet this vast country, furnishing fully one-half of the soldiers now in the field, is entirely dependent upon eastern armories for the manufacture of arms. A national armory at Chicago during the last year would have saved the Government millions of money, the lives of many gallant men, and would have materially shortened the war."

Every year of our history will confirm one striking remark of Mr. Arnold's: "The provincial history of the Northwest terminated with the census of 1860."

A WORD TO "BOSTONIAN."

A FRIEND, who says that Harper's Weekly circulates twenty thousand or more copies in Boston and its neighborhood, suggests that the paper might wisely give a few more illustrations from that region. The suggestion is good; and we do not need Boston authority for believing that city to be a metropolis. But our friend should remember that a paper which circulates a hundred and twenty thousand copies has a very various and extended diocese. In Maryland and the District of Columbia twenty thousand are also taken; and as that region is the seat of present public interest, we naturally find the most attractive subjects there. If our friend has any suggestions of particular subjects to make, Harper's Weekly will be always very glad to receive them. Meanwhile we may observe that since the war broke out Harper's Weekly has illustrated Faneuil Hall, Fort Warren, and other Boston "lions."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

FRAMLEY PARSONAGE.—A critic says: "There is a certain manner and style about it that pleases all." That certain manor is doubtless the parsonage itself, and the stile is the stile that leads to it.

A wounded Irishman wrote home from the hospital, and finished up by saying, "I've fought for this country, I've bled for it, and I shall soon be able to say I've died for it."

  Let the world thy rottenness see;
And I would that my hand could grasp again
  The money I lent to thee.

Oh! weep for the orphan boy,
  That his little is lost to-day;
Oh! weep for the holder of stock,
  That his savings are swept away.

And the city banks go on,
  And pay their depositors still;
But oh! for a touch of my vanished gold,
  That has gone from the Pall Mall till.

  Let the world thy rottenness see;
But the hard-earned gold that has fled
  Will never come back to me.

A century ago, the lady of one of the "City" knights wrote a note once to an old acquaintance, verbatim, as follows: "Lady —— precents compelments to Mrs. ——, and beggs she'll abstane from calling on her, as she sees now nobody but folks of fashion since her Ladyship and Sir —— has been nighted by his Majesty."

In a discussion with a temperance lecturer, a toper asked, "If water rots your boots, what effect must it have on the coats of your stomach?"

At an election dinner a voter said he had never received a bribe to the extent of a farthing. "Oh, Mr. Smith, how can you say so," observed another voter, "when I know Mr. Wilks sent you a hare?" "Ay, that's true enough; but it was full of maggots." "Well, then," was the rejoinder, "if it were not bribery, it was corruption."

"Now, children, who loves all men?" asked a school-inspector. The question was hardly put before a little girl, not four years old, answered quickly, "All women!"

An old man, when dangerously sick, was urged to take advice of a doctor, but objected, saying, "I wish to die a natural death."

Can a man with wooden legs be considered a foot passenger?

An old maid, speaking of marriage, says it is like any other disease—while there's life there's hope.

"So you are going to keep a school!" said a young lady to her aunt. "Well, for my part, sooner than do that, I would marry a widower with nine children." "I should prefer that myself," was the quiet reply; "but where is the widower?"

An eminent and witty prelate was once asked if he did not think such a one followed his conscience. "Yes," said his grace, "I think he follows it as a man does a horse in a gig—he drives it first."

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.—A short man became attached to a tall woman, and somebody said that he had fallen in love with her. "Do you call it falling in love?" said the suitor. "It's more like climbing up to it."

A QUALIFICATION.—A merchant, lately advertising for a clerk "who could bear confinement," received an answer from one who had been seven years in jail!"

Can a man be said to be in a stew when you make his blood boil?

A late lecturer remarked that it wouldn't be a very violent stretch of the imagination to believe "that a thoughtful Massachusetts baby, six months old, sits in his mother's lap eying his own cradle, to see if he could not invent a better; or at least suggest some improvement."

A learned young lady defines a thimble as a diminutive, argenteous, truncated cone, convex on its summit, and semi-perforated with symmetrical indentations.

A milkman was awoke by a wag in the night with the announcement that his best cow was choking. He forthwith jumped up to save the life of his animal, when, lo! he found a turnip stuck in the mouth of the pump.

A truly rural young lady is about to publish a work on "The Rise, Growth, Culture, and Progress of the Hen, as an Element of Civilization."

TEST OF CHRISTIAN CHARACTER.—"Well, doctor," said a barrister to a witness, "what is the character of this defendant?" "He is a Christian, Sir." "A Christian?" "Yes, Sir; a good Christian; a most exemplary Christian." "Well, how do you know this?" "I know it, Sir, because I attended him through a fit of the gout, and never once heard him swear." The testimony was considered satisfactory.

Lady Yarmouth asked Garrick one day why Love was always represented as a child? He replied, "Because Love never reaches the age of wisdom and experience."

"Don't touch me, or I'll scream!" as the engine-whistle said to the stoker.

"Did you ever go to a military ball?" asked a lisping maid of an old veteran. "No, my dear," growled the old soldier; "in those days I once had a military ball come to me, and what do you think?—it took my leg off!"

People who cross the ocean for mere pleasure generally conclude, before finishing the voyage, that they were retched fools.

The story is told of a certain New Zealand chief, that a young missionary landed at his island, to succeed a sacred teacher deceased some time before. At an interview with the chief, the young minister asked: "Did you know my departed brother?" "Oh yes! Me deacon in his church." "Ah, then, you knew him well; and was he not a good and tender-hearted man?" "Yes," replied the pious deacon with much gusto, "he very good and very tender. Me eat a piece of him!"

A gentleman traveling across Salisbury Plain saw an old man sitting at the door of a cabin, weeping bitterly. "My friend," inquired the gentleman, "what is the matter with you?" "Why," replied the man, "daddy jist gave me an awful licking 'cause I wouldn't rock granddaddy to sleep!" The gentleman rode off, fully satisfied with the salubrity and healthiness of the Plain to produce such unparalleled instances of longevity.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, December 17, in the Senate, several petitions were presented for emancipating the slaves of rebels. A bill was reported to increase the number of cadets at West Point. Senator Lane in a speech criticised the action of the Government in the conduct of the war, and was replied to by Senator Carlile. The Chair appointed Senators Wade of Ohio, Chandler of Michigan, and Johnson of Tennessee, as the committee to investigate the general conduct of the war. The House resolution for an adjournment until January 6 was laid on the table. An executive session was held, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Bingham, from the Judiciary Committee, reported back the joint resolutions requiring the Provost Court at Alexandria, Virginia, to hold the property of rebels until Congress take further action on the subject. The resolution then passed. The resolutions of Mr. Eliot, for the emancipation of slaves, being the special order, were then resumed. On motion of Mr. Kellogg, the resolutions, and all others relating to the subject in the same special order, were referred to the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 77 against 57. A bill was reported from the Foreign Affairs Committee appropriating one thousand dollars to pay the owners of the British ship Perthshire for losses incurred in consequence of detention by our blockading fleet off Mobile, in June last, our naval officers at the time acting on a misunderstanding of the circumstances. The bill was finally passed, but not until after it had given rise to a somewhat lengthy and discursive debate. A bill was reported from the Naval Committee to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to construct twenty iron-clad steam gun-boats, at a cost of from five hundred thousand to six hundred thousand dollars each, which, after a brief debate, was laid over for further consideration, and the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, December 18, in the Senate, petitions for the emancipation of slaves, and for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, were presented by Senators Doolittle and Sumner, respectively. Senator Sumner offered a resolution that Trusten Polk, now a traitor to the United States, be expelled from the Senate. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. Senator Sumner's resolution that the army shall not be used to surrender fugitive slaves was taken up and adopted. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Committee on Elections reported adversely to the claim of Charles Henry Foster to represent either the First or Second Congressional District of North Carolina, and the report was adopted. A bill appropriating one million dollars for gun-boats on the Western waters was passed. The Pension Appropriation Bill was taken up, amended so that no pension shall be paid to rebels, and then passed. The bill authorizing the payment of troops mustered into service in Missouri was passed. This provides for the pay of the forces under General Frémont, as well as those under other generals. The Contract Investigating Committee was requested to inquire into the policy of abolishing sutlerships, or regulating them so as to prevent impositions upon soldiers.

On Thursday, December 19, in the Senate, Senator Sumner presented a number of numerously signed petitions in favor of the emancipation of slaves, with compensation to loyal masters. Senator Willey, of Virginia, offered a resolution to the effect that the existing war was forced upon the country by the rebellious States without provocation, and with the design to destroy the Union and the Constitution, and repudiate the fundamental principles of republican government. The Senate discussed the resolution of the House to adjourn till the 6th of January, in order to participate in the Christmas holidays, but adjourned without arriving at a determination on the subject.——In the House, the bill providing for the construction of twenty iron-clad steam gun-boats, to be built by contract or otherwise, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem best for the public interest, was debated and passed. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was passed. A bill abolishing the franking privilege was introduced by Mr. Colfax, and the second Tuesday of January assigned for its consideration.

On Friday, December 20, in the Senate, petitions for the emancipation of the slaves of rebels, for an armory at Rock Island, for the establishment of a system to exchange prisoners of war, and for the expulsion of Senator Bright, of Indiana, were presented and appropriately referred. A bill appropriating one thousand dollars to the owners of the British ship Perthshire, as indemnity for damages by reason of illegal detention by the blockading squadron, was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and laid on the table. The Judiciary Committee were discharged from further consideration of the subject of the abolition and reconstruction of the Supreme Court. Senator Saulsbury's resolution, calling for a copy of General Phelps's proclamation to the loyal citizens of the Southwest, and by what authority it was made, was taken up, briefly discussed, and laid on the table. Senator Willey, of Virginia, then resumed and concluded his speech on national affairs.——In the House, a bill appropriating $150,000 to complete the defenses of Washington was passed. Resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature in favor of relief to Ireland, in view of a probable famine there, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A resolution that the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill so amending the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 as to forbid the recapture or return of any fugitive from labor without satisfactory proof first being made that the claimant of such fugitive was loyal to the Government was adopted by a vote of 78 to 39. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, offered a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to report a bill providing for the confiscation of all the property of all rebels, and their aiders and abettors, and the unconditional liberation of their slaves, and protection of said slaves from recapture by their masters. The proposition was laid on the table by two majority. Mr. Wilson, of Indiana, offered a resolution directing the Military Committee to report an additional article of war, prohibiting officers of the army from employing the force under their command to return fugitive slaves to their owners, and providing for the punishment of such officers by dismissal from service. No action was taken on the subject.

Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, December 23, in the Senate, Senator Davis, the new Senator from Kentucky, appeared and took his seat. A memorial was presented from citizens of Boston, representing that the freedom of the press had been abridged, and asking relief. The bill making an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the construction of gun-boats for operations on the Western rivers was reported from the Committee on Finance, and passed. Senator King, of New York, offered a resolution, which was laid over, requesting the President to institute law proceedings against persons held in custody by Executive authority. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill providing against the return of fugitive slaves by the army, and for the punishment of any officer ordering it. The bill to increase the number of cadets at West Point from 170 to 350 was taken up and debated at considerable length, but was not definitely acted upon.——In the House, Mr. Vallandigham introduced a bill to enforce the writ of habeas corpus. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. A resolution introduced by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, on Friday, requesting the Military Committee to prepare a new article of war for the punishment of all officers using any forces under their command for the return of fugitive slaves was considered, and finally adopted. The bill to increase the duties on tea, coffee, and sugar was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and passed after some debate, 77 to 29. It was immediately sent to the Senate, and passed that body also. The resolution introduced by Mr. Morehead, of Pennsylvania, requesting the Judiciary Committee to report a bill debarring forever any rebel from holding office under the Constitution and laws of the United States, was passed.

ESCAPE OF COLONEL CORCORAN.

The papers publish an interesting statement made by Lieutenant Hurd, of the Second Maine Regiment, who was wounded and taken prisoner at Bull Run, and has recently been released. He, together with Colonel Corcoran and some three hundred others were confined in the Charleston Jail at the time of the great conflagration there, and they only escaped from the jail, which was burned, by leaping from a window, no effort being made to save them by the Charlestonians. Colonel Corcoran, Lieutenant Hurd believes, escaped during the confusion, as he expressed his determination to try to reach Beaufort or the North, and has not since been heard of. According to Lieutenant Hurd's representations, the National prisoners now in the South are treated in the most brutal and unjustifiable manner.

SKIRMISH NEAR WASHINGTON.

A brisk and successful conflict took place last week on the lines in front of Washington. General M'Call's brigade went out one morning on a foraging expedition toward Dranesville. His advance force, commanded by General Ord, consisted of four regiments of infantry, a regiment of Pennsylvania rifles, and Easton's battery. Near Dranesville a fire was opened on them by the rebels, under Colonel Forney, numbering four regiments of infantry and one of cavalry, who were concealed in the bushes. The fire was returned from our rifles and the battery, and after an hour's fighting the rebels fled toward Fairfax Court House, leaving 150 killed and wounded behind them, together with two caissons of ammunition and a quantity of clothing and stores. General M'Call had ordered up General Reynolds to a point on the Leesburg turnpike to support General Ord, in anticipation of an attack; but before Generals Reynolds and M'Call reached the field of action the rebels had been defeated by Easton's battery and the rifles of Colonel Kane's Pennsylvania regiment. Our loss was about six killed and twenty-seven wounded.

GENERAL POPE'S OPERATIONS IN MISSOURI.

Dispatches received from General Pope state that on Wednesday he got between the enemy encamped in two bodies, one at a point near Chilhowee and another in Clinton and Henry counties; that they retreated upon his arrival toward Rose Hill, leaving all their baggage and valuables in his possession. General Pope followed them up, but at Johnson, Bates County, they scattered in all directions. With a strong cavalry reconnoissance General Pope captured 150 rebels near Osceola, and at different other points about as many more. The whole country between Rose Hill and Grand River is now clear of rebels. Meanwhile another portion of his force, under Colonel Davis, surprised a second rebel camp, on the evening of the 18th, near Milford. The rebels, who were thirteen hundred strong, surrendered upon finding themselves surrounded. Among the prisoners were three colonels, seventeen captains, 1000 stand of arms, 1000 horses, sixty-five wagons, and a large quantity of supplies, tents, and baggage. The loss of the enemy is not known, but the Union loss was but two killed and eight wounded.

MORE BRIDGE-BURNING IN MISSOURI.

The rebels of General Price's army, in Missouri, made another raid upon the railroads on Friday night, destroying the track, water-tanks, wood-piles, and bridges on the North Missouri railroad for a distance of a hundred miles, commencing at a point eight miles south of Hudson, and continuing to destroy the rails and telegraph lines as far as Warrentown. It appears to have been a preconcerted movement, in which the inhabitants of that district participated, as no single party could have accomplished so disastrous a work in the short space of time which it took to complete the extensive damage.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENSES.

The report of General Barnard, Chief Engineer of the Army, which has just been submitted to Congress by Secretary Cameron, shows that the defenses around Washington consist of forty-eight works, mounting three hundred guns; that the whole defensive perimeter occupied is about thirty-five miles—exceeding by several miles the famous field-works of Torres Vedras, the most extensive fortification of this kind known in modern times. General Barnard asks the appropriation of $150,000 from Congress for the completion of these works, as many of them were thrown up in the face of the enemy, and therefore require considerable labor to make them perfect. Secretary Cameron has also submitted to Congress a report in favor of the appropriation of $4,710,000 for putting our coast defenses in order, from the lakes round to San Francisco, a large portion of which is to be devoted to defenses of New York harbor.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The exchange of rebel prisoners has commenced. The bark Island City left Boston last week for Fortress Monroe with two hundred and fifty of the rebels captured at Hatteras, who have been released from captivity at Fort Warren by the Government.

THE FIRE AT CHARLESTON.

Somewhat fuller particulars of the great fire in Charleston have reached us by way of Fortress Monroe. The Courier, published on the 14th, gives a list of between two and three hundred sufferers (property owners) by the fire, and estimates the loss at seven millions of dollars; and the Mercury of the same date gives a list of five hundred and seventy-six buildings, which were totally destroyed on Wednesday alone. Five churches were burned, and various prominent public buildings used for secular purposes. The Richmond papers state that a Message was sent to the Confederate Congress, on Friday, by Jeff Davis, in which he recommended relief for the sufferers, and two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were accordingly voted the next day—an advance upon the claims of South Carolina upon the rebel Government.

MORE INCENDIARISM SOUTH.

It is not in the least improbable that the fate of Charleston may be shared before long by other Southern cities. The Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser says that no less than seven attempts were made to set fire to that city within two days, and that two of them were partially successful.

COTTON COMING TO MARKET.

The Atlantic, from Port Royal, brought the first installment of Sea Island cotton—150,000 pounds—and the intelligence that 400,000 pounds have already been secured by General Sherman. The expedition which was expected to leave for some point further South, under command of General Viele, has been abandoned for the present, the military and naval authorities having come to the conclusion that the force could be used to more advantage in the vicinity of Port Royal.

MORE DISTRESS AT NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans Delta of November 25 says that 1800 families were supplied at the free market on the preceding day—an increase of one hundred families during a single week.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DEATH OF PRINCE ALBERT.

THE consort of Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, expired at noon of Sunday, 15th ult., his disease being gastric fever.

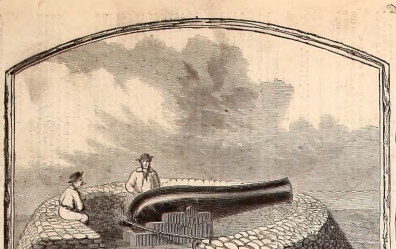
THE CHIEF OF THE TORIES FOR WAR.

The Earl of Derby is said to have been consulted by the British Government relative to the Trent affair. He is said to approve of its war policy, and to have counseled ship-owners to instruct outward-bound vessels to signalize any English vessels that war with America is probable.

PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.

The excitement in England continues unabated, as far as the expression of newspaper opinion and public speeches are concerned. The war preparations of the British Government show no signs of diminution. Transports were still fitting out, and troops were being ordered in increased numbers to Canada. The Black Prince and Chanticleer, the steamships Persia and Australasia, with 11,000 men, artillery, and stores, were under orders to sail on the 11th December. The Hero, carrying 80 guns, sailed on the 8th. The Sutlej, 51 guns, was ordered to start for Canada as soon as possible. The Fifth Dragoon Guards and the Grenadier Guards have received orders to proceed at once to Canada. The Admiralty Agent, Captain Williams, who was on board the Trent when Mason and Slidell were taken off, received a letter from the British Government approving of his conduct in protesting against the capture of the rebel emissaries.

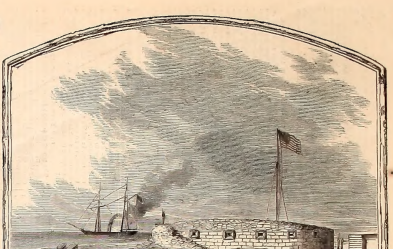
FRANCE.



NAPOLEON OFFERS TO MEDIATE.

General Scott, previous to embarking in the Arago, had an interview with Prince Napoleon, at which it is reported that the Prince stated that the Emperor had expressed a desire to bring about a pacific solution of the impending difficulty between England and America.

GERMANY.



THE FEELING THERE.

The Austrian papers are fearful that a war between England and America would remove the only obstacle in Europe to French ambition, and that France would begin war against Germany.

CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW CHRISTMAS STORIES.

I.—PICKING UP EVENING SHADOWS.

It is a tale, this that I am about to tell, of good deeds revealed, of good instincts roused, of a good work done, and a good result attained, and all through Evening Shadows.

I have often thought what tell-tell things shadows are. I mean the shadows that one who stands outside sees in the windows of a lighted-up room or building; the shadows thrown on a blind by figures interposing between it and the lamp-light. I have noticed these in churches during divine service, when I, wandering about outside, have looked up at the windows and seen the shades of a pair of lovers reading out of the same hymn-book; of children evidently chattering and grinning together; and sometimes a shadow which, bobbing forward from time to time in a jerking fashion, then catching itself, still with a jerk, then remaining preternaturally erect and still, and then beginning to bob again, has suggested to me that the fourth head of a sermon in eight compartments was being developed, and that the shadow before me was that of one who was taking refuge from oratory in sleep.

Among the number of the shadows which my memory retains there are some that lie upon it with no dark and shuddering chill; some that were cast by objects in themselves so pure and noble that the shade itself seemed only a subdued brightness, and the light that cast it—a glory.

My story begins at the time, some years ago, when, as a single man, I was living in a narrow and rather crowded street in one of the old parts of London—one of those streets where very decent houses are mixed with much poorer ones—and in one of the best and cleanest of which I occupied two rooms; a bedroom and a sitting-room. Having at that time, as I have now, a great dread of noise while at work, I made use of the back room as my studio, sleeping in the front of the house, which was quiet at night, but not in the daytime, by reason of the day traffic. My painting-room then was on the second floor, and at the back of the house; and as there was a street running at an acute angle to that in which I lived, and joining it only a few yards higher up, it will easily be understood that the backs of the houses in this slanting thoroughfare, which was called appropriately enough Cross Street, were in tolerably close proximity to my painting-room window. I have been thus exact in describing the topography of my place of abode, because then you will be better able to understand how it happened that my attention was directed to the circumstances which I am about to detail.

You will be able to understand how it was that, sitting, especially during the short days, as the dusk was beginning to fall, looking meditatively out of window and thinking of my work, my attention would often be drawn, almost without my knowledge, to some of the windows in the slanting street which I have described, and how I found myself not unfrequently speculating about some of the inhabitants of the rooms which were separated from that in which I was sitting by so small a space.

There was one window more than all the rest which, for some reason or other, used especially to occupy my thoughts. It was a window exactly level with my own, and exactly opposite to it. During the daytime, though the blind was always drawn up as high as it could be, I could see but little of the room, but what I could make out only showed me that it was a very poor place indeed. Long habits of a speculative use of my eyes, if I may so express myself, have perhaps given me a tendency to attach much importance to the external aspects of things as indicative of what goes on within. Be that as it may, I possess that tendency, and possess it very strongly on the subject of windows. I think that the windows of a house give one a great idea of the dispositions, the habits, and the tempers of the occupants. Who has not felt, in passing by a house whose well-cleaned windows are filled with flowers, where the solid white and green of the Arum, and the delicate shades of color in the rows of blossoming hyacinths, stand out in pleasant freshness against the dark back-ground formed by the interior of the room—who has not felt that the inhabitants of a house whose windows are thus decorated are in a calmer and happier condition than their next-door neighbors, where the yellow blind hangs crookedly across the dirty window, and the wire screen beneath has got a bulging ragged hole in it?

Holding, then, the theory which I have ventured thus to put forward, it will be readily believed that I augured the better of the occupants of the room opposite, from the fact that I could see through the lower panes of the window the leaves and branches of a great big fuschia spread out fan-wise on a wooden frame. Other little contrivances and adornments there were about this poor casement, which, though of the cheapest and most two-penny order of decorative art, showed yet some love of the gentler side of things, and a wish to put a good face on poverty.

But it is, as I have already said, toward dusk and in the evening that my attention has been oftenest fixed on the window which I have been describing. It is then that, the room being lighted up, the shadows of things and persons within it are thrown upon the blind with a clearness and distinctness which those who have never observed such matters would hardly credit. The shadows tell me then that the room is tenanted by a husband and wife, both young, I am certain. The man, as I gather from his position, and what I take to be the shadow of a tissue-paper screen behind which he stoops over his labor, is a poor drudging engraver, for whom the days are not long enough, sitting cramped up at his patient toil through many hours of the night. As I watch him, he will rise and stretch back his head to relieve the muscles of his neck, and then I see that the shadow thrown on the blind is that of a young figure, spare but well-made. The light shows me also that he wears a beard; it is a very strong light indeed, and this makes me more sure than ever that he is an engraver. The shadow of his wife is there beside him—almost always. How she watches over and tends him; how she hangs over his chair, or kneels beside him! I had never, at the time I speak of, seen her, but I could not help fancying that she was pretty and good enough to light up a darker room than that in which she lives, and to make her husband's life of toil—if he can keep it up—not only bearable but delightful.

If he can keep it up—but can he? His shadow is all that I have seen of him, but it looks like the shadow of one in delicate health. I never miss him from his place at night, and I can see the edge of his blind by which he works at his window all day. "If he sits drudging there," thought I, "he will surely, as is the case in all excess, defeat his own object, and end in being disabled altogether."

It was not long before I began to fear that what I had apprehended had taken place. There came a day when the blind was not drawn up to let in the light on the engraver's work, but remained drawn down the whole day. It would be difficult to express how anxiously I longed for the evening, and the shadows which should tell me more.

That evening the light was burning in the room as usual, but the straight-edge of the engraver's blind was not seen cutting against it. There was the shadow of but one person—it was that of a woman—and as the figure which cast it moved so quietly about, I could make out that she was pouring out drugs and mixing the different compounds wanted in a sick-room by the light of the lamp. Sometimes she would pause in these occupations and look toward one end of the room, where I concluded the bed was placed; and sometimes I could even imagine—but this must have been pure fancy—that, looking still in the same direction, her lips would move at times, and that she was speaking. I could even see her tasting the food she was mixing, with her head a little on one side; altering and tasting it often before she carried it across the room to where, I felt sure, the sick man lay. So much will shadows tell.

From my front window I can see a long way up and down the street, even to that corner where the early-breakfast depôt is found every morning—a poor stall enough, and driving a poor business, I should have thought; a business, however, in which I am so deeply interested that my first morning act is to go to the window and see if the poor old proprietor has got a customer—nay, once I put on a pilot-coat and a wide-awake hat, to appear in character, and purchased a cup of his coffee, which was a sound coffee enough, though a little gritty, and perhaps a thought weak. Enough of that. I can see to the coffee-stall one way, and nearly as far the other, and at the back I command a bit of a court, two mewses and a half, and, by great dislocation of neck, a little scrap of Brewer Street, Golden Square. Now in all these regions, which are continually under my eye, I have noticed one constantly-pervading presence, one figure which comes upon the scene without fail every day in the year and at all conceivable hours. It is the figure of a tallish gentleman of about five-and-thirty, who stoops a little, has a very round back, wears spectacles, is always dressed in a buttoned black frock-coat, is always in a hurry, always expected anxiously at the houses he visits, and always followed to the door, on coming out again, by some who question him eagerly as he leaves them, and who seem to seek for comfort in his most inscrutable face. Of course I have not watched this gentleman's proceedings long without coming to the conclusion that it is Mr. Cordial, the parish doctor, whose surgery in Great Pulteney Street I am so often in the habit of passing.

If there had been any previous doubt on my mind as to the state of things in the house opposite, it would at once have been put to flight when, on the day succeeding that evening on which I had watched the engraver's wife in her capacity of nurse, I caught a dark glimpse of this gentleman's head (rather a bald head for so young a man) at the window of the room opposite, which he had come to, to prepare some mixture or other.

"Now here," I thought to myself, "is a pretty business! This is just what I feared. Here is this poor fellow laid up, unable to work, and probably not only ill in body, but harassed in mind by the consciousness that, as long as he is ill, there can be no money coming in to supply the daily expenses which, however poorly they live, he and his wife must of necessity incur."

I thought over this matter, and turned it all sorts of ways, as people who are unlucky enough, or unwise enough, to live alone do turn and twist things, and was so haunted by the thought of what was going on in the room opposite that, in the course of the afternoon, I was obliged to go out and take a long walk, in order to fill up the time that must necessarily intervene before the lamp would be lit and the shadows thrown upon the blind. When I got back from that walk I was in such hot haste for such silent news as I might reasonably hope to gain, that I did not even stay to light my candle, but felt my way as well as I could across the room, and stationed myself at the window.

At first I thought that there were no shadows at all on the white glaring blind, except those of the poor bits of curtain and of the spread-out fuschia before-mentioned; but by-and-by, noticing a small and continually moving shadow mixed up with that of the curtain, and observing that it rose and fell regularly and quickly, I presently connected it with another mass of shade a little above it, and arrived at the conclusion that this last was thrown by a woman's head, and by the moving shadow by her hand, as it rose and fell in the action of working with the needle. It was not long before I found out that my hypothesis was well grounded; for a little while the shadow of the hand was still and that of the head was raised, as if the person whose silhouette lay thus upon the blind was in the act of listening—and then it rose, and I saw the well-known figure of the engraver's wife pass the light, and knew that she had moved toward that quarter of the room in which I had made up my mind that the bed with the sick man in it was placed.

During the greater part of that evening, as I watched, and my occupations were frequently interrupted that I might do so, I made out no shadow but that which I have just mentioned. But, at about nine o'clock, I saw another shadow pass before the blind, and as it was that of a man, I had for a moment the hope that it was cast by the invalid. It was only for a moment; another glance showed me that this person wore no beard, and that there was greater bulk of figure than would have been cast by the poor engraver. I soon concluded that it was the doctor; and if I had any doubt on this subject it was removed when I presently observed the workman-like angle of elbow made by the shadow as it stood before the light, pouring something into what I suppose, from its size, must have been a tea-cup.

Twice a day, then. He was ill enough for the doctor to come to him twice a day.

My determination was taken as I made that reflection. I had got wrought up to a great state of interest and suspense about this case which I could hardly explain to myself. I felt a strange longing to know more of it, and I came to the resolution—it was like what might have been expected of a man half cracked with living alone—that I would go out, then and there, waylay the doctor as he came away from his patient, and ask him all about it.

I had lost some time in reflection, and when I looked hastily across before leaving my room I did not see any shadows on the blind, yet it was reasonable to suppose that I might still catch the doctor in the street; so out I rushed. Sure enough, there was the doctor just coming out of No. 4 Cross Street. How lucky I was to be in time!

I found the parish medical authority not very communicative or prone to take a very romantic view of sickness and suffering. He was a good sort of man enough, no doubt, but dry and matter-of-fact. He had seen so much of sickness and misery that he was used to it. He answered all my questions, however, politely, though seeming a good deal surprised at them.

"He had just been visiting a sick man in that house, had he not?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied, "he had. Bad case of low fever."

"Second floor—a married couple?" was my next inquiry.

Again an answer in the affirmative.

"Was it a case of great distress?"

"Yes, of very great distress."

"They have nothing to live upon but what the husband makes by his labor?" I asked.

"Nothing," was the answer.

"And he is laid up and unable to work?"

"That is the state of the case," replied the doctor.

"Ah! I thought so," said I. "Would you be kind enough, Doctor Cordial," I continued, "to take charge of this small sum" (it was a very small one) "for the benefit of these poor people—on no account mentioning how you came by it?"

The doctor promised that he would, and I was just going to leave him, when I thought I would ask the poor fellow's name.

"His name is Adams," said the doctor; and so we parted.

I now felt quite a sense of proprietorship in looking at my poor shadows opposite, and watched them more eagerly than ever. There was one action of the shadow, now unfortunately the only action to watch, which used to puzzle me not a little. The sick man's wife used at times to stand before the light, and, as it appeared to me, used to hold some article of clothing, or other piece of drapery, and examine it closely; sometimes I fancied that I could make the object out to be a shirt, or a coat, at another time a pair of trowsers. After this she would disappear, and I always noticed that the lamp would then be turned down till its light was very low, and would remain so for a considerable period. I could not understand this at the time, though I did afterward. She was testing the condition of different articles of clothing before taking them to the pawnbroker's.

And now I began to discover one of the bad results of my solitary life. Though I had given Dr. Cordial a small sum to go toward helping these poor people, it was quite impossible, in my straitened circumstances, that I could spare more. If I had resolutely kept my friends about me, there would have been somebody or other to whom I could apply in behalf of my poor shadows, while now it was impossible to do so. Even when the idea entered my mind of trying to revive some former friendships with this view, the fear that any one so applied to might imagine I wanted the help for myself at once deterred me.

While I was engaged in turning all these things over in my mind, there came across it the memory of one individual to whom I really felt as if I should not mind applying in this difficulty.

There was a certain Mr. Pycroft, a copper-plate printer, with whom I had formerly had dealings. He was an old man, and it so happened that at one time in my life I had been in a position to do him a service, and had done it. There was something about his age, his position, and our former relations, which made me feel less shy of approaching him than I should have felt with any one else. He was a fat, jolly-looking old boy, and was, as far as I had had opportunities of judging, as good-natured as he looked.

There was, however, one circumstance connected with his history which seemed to show him in a less amiable light, and the remembrance of which made me for a time hesitate about applying to him. I remembered to have heard that some short time ago he had acted with great severity toward his eldest son, who, having contracted a marriage against his father's wishes, had been deprived of his share in the business, which he had formerly enjoyed, and left to make a living as well as he could by his own exertions. The fact is, that the old man had had a darling project of marrying his eldest son to a young girl whose father was a business connection of his own. The old copper-plate printer was not only thwarted in this, but was further outraged by his son's choice having fallen in a direction particularly distasteful to him for private reasons. I suspected also, from what I had heard, that the conduct of the eldest son, which had been represented to his father as being violent and rebellious in no ordinary degree, had been made the worst of by the younger brother, who not only stepped into the lion's share of the business on his brother's removal, but himself contracted the marriage which his brother had declined. I could not help thinking, when I heard the circumstances of the case, that this younger son had had a great deal to do in poisoning the old man's mind with regard to his elder brother's conduct.

At all events, old Mr. Pycroft was the only person I could think of just now as likely to help my unfortunate shadows, and to him I determined to apply, but in a roundabout way. It occurred to me that if I could enlist his sympathy in the fate of these poor people, just as my own had been awakened, by means of the shadows, it would be a far better plan than any other.

It so happened that I had often promised my old acquaintance to show him a collection which I had of Rembrandt etchings, and it occurred to me that now was the time when these might come into play with great effect. So, making an excuse in relation to the matter of business which had formerly brought us together, I called on my old acquaintance, and, in the course of conversation, invited him, naming an evening, to come to my lodgings and examine these curiosities, intimating that we would moisten that pleasing labor with a glass of brandy-and-water. Punctual to the time named Mr. Pycroft arrived, and we got through the first hour very comfortably, though I could not help feeling rather anxious about the success of my scheme.

After examining the etchings, Mr. Pycroft, over the second glass, began to rally me about living in such a labyrinth of streets, asking me if I did not find it dreadfully confined at the back.

"By-the-by," I said—and here I must own that I was guilty of some small amount of deception, for I spoke as if the matter in hand were of no sort of importance—"by-the-by, Mr. Pycroft, you wouldn't imagine how much recreation I derive from observing my neighbors in that very cross street which you find comes too near my windows."

"If you was to come out of this kind of solitary life," replied Mr. P., "you would have other things to amuse yourself with besides the goings on of a parcel of people whom you know nothing about."

"Now here, for instance," I went on, unmindful of the interruption, as I drew aside my own curtain and pointed out the window of the room occupied by my poor young couple—"here is a window which has revealed to me all sorts of interesting matter—enough to make a story out of almost, I can tell you."

"What, this window opposite? But do you mean to say, Mr. B., that you think it right to look into people's rooms like that?"

"I have scrupulously abstained from doing so," was my answer, "and have made all my observations with the blind down, as you see it now."

"With the blind down? But how could you make any observations with the blind down?"

"By means of the shadows of the occupants of the apartment," was my answer.

"Shadows?" cried Mr. Pycroft, obviously incredulous. "You don't mean to tell me that you could make out what was going on in that room by means of the shadows on the blind?"

"Something of what goes on," I replied, "at any rate. Enough to interest me in the fortunes of those to whom the room belongs."

"Well, really, Mr. B.! If I had it on any other testimony than your own I should have thought it simply impossible."

"Would you like to look for yourself?" I said. "I dare say something will take place behind the blind before long which will give you an opportunity of testing the accuracy of what I have said."

"Well, without doubting that at all," replied my guest, "I really think I should."

Mr. Pycroft was sitting near the window, but my reading-lamp upon the table made the room rather too light for our observations. So I pushed the table away to the other end of the room, turned down the wick of the lamp, and lowered the shade over it as well.

"Well," said Mr. Pycroft, "I see nothing at present but a white blind with a light behind it."

The shadow of the little wife's head was there in the corner by the curtain, and the shadow of the hand rose and fell as usual; but Mr. Pycroft had not such a practiced eye as I had for detecting such matters. I pointed these out to my friend.

"I do see something bobbing up and down," he said, "now you mention it. But I should never have found it out without your help. Stop! there's a shadow now covering nearly the whole blind. What's that?"

"I suspect that it is the shadow of the same person," was my answer. "She will probably go nearer the window and farther from the light presently, and then you will see."

In a minute or two the shadow appeared again, and this time not so large.

"I can make it out now," said my friend, "quite easily; it is the shadow of a woman. I can see the line of the waist and of the skirts of the dress."

"Can you make out the face at all?" I asked.

"Oh yes," answered Mr. P. "It is turned sideways, looking to the left there. She's gone now," he added in a moment.

In a few minutes her shadow was thrown again upon the blind.

"What's she about now?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"Nay, you shall tell me," I answered.

"Well, she seems to have some small object in her hand, which she is shaking."

"And now?" I asked again.

"I can't make out, her elbow seems raised—both hands are raised. No, I can't make out at all."

"I think she is pouring something out," said I.

"So she is, no doubt," answered my guest, who was evidently becoming much interested. "Stay," he continued, after a moment's pause, and looking at me quite anxiously as he spoke—"shaking, pouring—'to be well shaken before taken'—why, it must be medicine."

"I suspect it is medicine," was my answer.

"Is there some one ill, then?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"Yes," I replied, "her husband."

"And did the shadow tell you that, too?"

"Yes, the shadow of her husband used to appear on the blind as often as hers, now I never see it. Exactly coincident with the disappearance of the husband's shadow has been the arrival of another shadow, which has been that of the parish doctor."

"And pray," asked Mr. Pycroft, with the air of one whose credulity had been really too much tasked at last, "may I ask how you knew it to be the doctor's shadow?"

"Doctor Cordial has the roundest back you ever saw in your life," was my answer.

"Well, this is really very curious," ejaculated the old copper-plate printer, who was now evidently powerfully interested.

As we continued to look the light was suddenly removed, and the room was left in darkness.

"What do you suppose has happened now?" inquired my companion.

"I suppose," was my answer, "that she has left the room for a short time. We shall see more presently, no doubt;" and almost as I spoke the light reappeared, and another shadow was in the room besides that of the little wife.

"The doctor?" asked Mr. Pycroft.

"There!" I cried, triumphantly, "you see how much may be discovered by shadows. You are expert already."

"He has a round back, certainly," said the old copper-plate printer.

The round-backed shadow now faded off softly in the direction toward which the profile of the little wife was turned so often. The white blind remained for some minutes shadowless.

"I suppose he is examining his patient now," said Mr. Pycroft; "here he is again," he added in another minute. The doctor, however, stood so near the light this time, and so completely with his back toward us, that we were unable to determine what he was doing. This was, naturally, often the case with the shadows. Much as one was able to make out, there was, of course, infinitely more, an explanation of which it was impossible even to guess at.

In a short time the round-backed shadow was joined by that of the sick man's wife, and then the two stood for some time in conversation; at least it was reasonable to suppose so.

"Giving her directions, I shouldn't wonder," said the copper-plate printer.

"Most likely," I answered.

"I wonder if he's very bad," said my companion. After this there was a pause. The two shadows continued standing by the table. At last we both thought that the doctor's shadow appeared to give something to the shade of the engraver's wife, and immediately after the light was removed as it had been before, had been probably occupied with the loading in order that the doctor might see his way down stairs.

"And so they're very poor," said Mr. Pycroft, as if talking to himself.

"They had nothing but what the husband could earn," I answered, "and he is wholly incapable of working, and will remain so probably for weeks to come."

The light had now reappeared in the room. The shadow of the little wife seemed to linger by the table after setting it down. She stood there motionless for a considerable time, and then we noted that the head fell forward, and that she had sunk buried in the hands, as if in an agony of silent grief.

We neither of us spoke, and at the same moment I dropped the curtain of my own window, which had before been fastened back; for I felt that this was sorrow with which a spectator had no right to intermeddle.

Soon afterward my old friend rose to go, and we spoke not another word on the matter. Just before I retired to rest, however, I glanced out once more. The shadow of the little wife's head was in its usual place, and the shadow of her hand rose and fell as usual. She was at work again.

The next day, or an early post, I received a letter from Mr. Pycroft. He had been thinking a great deal, he said, of what he had seen and heard before, and inclosed a little money, which he asked me to see applied to the benefit of the young couple in whose fortunes I had interested myself. He also begged me, from time to time, to let him have tidings of "the shadows" which he described.

I handed the money over to Dr. Cordial, asking him to apply it as might seem best for the present, but making no mention of who it came from. I asked him to let me know of any change that might be possible of the condition of his patient. These I transmitted pretty nearly as often as I received them to the old copper-plate printer.

For some days there was not much to report, nor did the shadows tell me any thing different from what they had before revealed. The poor engraver's shadow was still waning, and the shadow of the little wife was either stationary in the corner, when she did not leave the room, or glided to and from her needle, or else was seen flitting about the room in attendance on her sick husband. Then I saw there came a time when the fever reached its crisis, and when it was clear, according to the doctor's report, that the sufferer must sink under it or recover. To many my story will be tedious, and I will not dwell on the details of this period of suspense. The one quality of youth and hope had not patient enough to constitution to rally, and after this crisis in his disorder he began to mend.

And now my convalescence began to set in, and a time arrived when one evening the shadow of a wasted figure seated by a table was cast on the wall. I could guess as I watched it, and observed that it was accompanied by the well-known shadow of the little wife, that the sick man was moving from his bed to a chair by the fire.

Of course I made this advance known to my friend, the copper-plate printer, and he in turn communicated with all the particulars of the gradual improvement in our invalid's health, even to the period when it was to be considered that he was able at last to sit up for a certain number of hours every day in his engraver's workshop, and once more for his wife's support.

"They're very grateful," I said, when I made this announcement to my old acquaintance, "to the unknown friend who has helped them in the time to time throughout their troubles."

"Oh, no, no-no-no, nonsense!" it is nothing, nothing at all—nothing at all!" ejaculated the old fellow, trying to get away from the subject.

"And they owe very much, I continued, resolutely, "to thank him personally, if he would but reveal himself and give them the opportunity."

"No, no, not for the world," was the answer; "oh dear no—impossible. Here, my dear, the profile extra, just to set them going, you know, because he mustn't receive money, you see."

"And you won't let them see you?" I asked again.

"No, no, no—no account," said the old boy; "I'll tell you what, my dear sir, I'll consider it in a moment, "I should like to see them—see them as I did before—the shadows, you know." he added. "I'll come and have a glass of grog and-and-and water with you some evening, and have a look at the shadows again."

I was obliged to be satisfied with this, and, making an engagement with my old friend for the next day, I left him and went home.

The evening came, and with it an unusual amount of stir and bustle in the quiet room opposite. The figure of the little wife was observed flitting backward and forward in front of the light, as if she were engaged in unaccustomed activity. Suddenly, hopping in the very middle of the window, and so close to the thin white blind that I could see its distinctly, there was a shadow not of a bird in it; and it was owing to the presence of this object that I had been induced to look for some idea of what my two friends opposite were like. What a figure of fun appeared upon the stage, as would sometimes happen, to give a chip of encouragement to its occupants! I saw the profile of the person who did so as distinctly as one used to trace the silhouettes of the old family portraits which itinerant artists were wont to cut out at fairs. Except at rare intervals, I had seen the engraver in the wife stood thus near the window and far from the light, I could distinguish that the bust a shapeless mass; and when one of them approached the candle nearly, their shadows became so gigantic that the whole upper part of the room—as unusually large on—was completely darkened, even by one figure. The shadow of myself I have said before, that the opportunities were very rare when I could make out what the shadows were about, and that in all cases in which I could detect such processes of stirring about, of eating and of medicines, and the like, it was owing to the fact that some necessary object connected with the act of feeding was placed on some article of furniture which stood in or near the window.

Punctual to the appointed hour, my old friend, the copper-plate printer, made his appearance, and his first question, after the usual greeting had been exchanged, was:

"Well, how are the shadows?"

I placed his chair in the old position, and we both sat down.

The bustle and movement to which I have advertised as going on in the room opposite were still noticeable, and I had little doubt that the apartment was being "cleaned up;" an impression to which additional force was given by a female charging on the scene of a thin, straight shadow, which I took to be a broomstick, and which was now brought into active service.

I must not omit to mention that at the moment of a certain pause in our talk, the name from the figure of the poor engraver was thrown with great distinctness on the blind. He had come to the window to stick some object, probably a piece of pasteboard, between the pane of the bird-cage.

When this happened I noticed a great change come over the countenance of my guest. He raised himself in his chair, and, with the eagerl forward said, in quite a strange tone of voice:

"What did you say was the name of these people?"

"Adams," was my answer.

"Adams—you are quite sure?"

"Quite," I replied. "At one time the shadow had vanished again, but I remarked that for a considerable time Mrs. Pycroft had been more than comfortable, and we had talked of many matters belonging to them, and I had at heart before he again returned to the shadows.

"They seem quiet enough now," said Mr. Pycroft at last.

"I dare say," I answered, "that the cleaning of the room is over, and that they are sat down to a bit of supper."

"Do you think so?" asked the old copper-plate printer.

"I dare say they have some little luxury furnished by your liberality."

"Do you think so?" said the old boy, who had a great idea of comfort. "What do you think they've got? I wish the shadows would show us!"

I darted at once at the opening which I saw here.

"The shadow is there now," I said; "no why not go across and see it in substance? It would make them happy, and it would make me happy. I am sure."

The old gentleman had just finished a tumbler of hot grog. He was in high good-humour, and as I spoke rubbed his hands together, and looked a latent smile developed itself about the corners of his mouth.

"It wouldn't be bad fun, would it?" he said.

I wanted nothing more, and in another minute I had him on his legs, and was leading him out of No. 9.

A little girl was on the door-step with a pot of beer in her hand, and we had no sooner stopped before the house than the door opened, as was incidental to the lives of maidens who stand only between the street and the kitchen fire.

"Please, Sir, will you ring the second bell from the top?"

"Second door?" I said, as I complied: "that's the door, my friend, on the right hand?"

"Yes, Sir, and he's my father," said the young lady, who evidently looked upon the couple attached to us as the first fruits of the day's labour, seen this child's shadow on the blind.

"Well, I want to see him," I replied, "and so does this gentleman."

"Oh, but mother," though," said the little girl —who, by-the-way, appeared to be a precocious person—"for father's not expecting you in a fevi and father's been ill, and you can't disturb him, and as he's a artist—engraver, you know, Sir."

"You just hold your tongue, Miss, will you?" said a voice at this juncture, "and let me talk to the gentlemen."

I looked up, and saw that the door had been opened by a tall, gaunt woman, with a large nose.

"Who did you please to want, Sir?" she asked in a whining tone, which I disliked very much.

I told her briefly who I was, and the object of our visit.

"Oh, what a joyful surprise!" said the gaunt woman, whining as before in a manner infinitely offensive to me. "Gal, you hear? Mrs. Lucy, she continued, addressing the child, "and tell your father that the kind gentleman as assisted him in his illness is come to see him. Oh, Sir, oh, kind gentlemen!—(*to the shadow that I had interested myself in, and who was now seen to be moving backwards through his illness, and—take care of the stairs, child gentlemen—and-and-and, Sir, you're welcome, and here's a joyful surprise, James: the gentleman that's been so kind all the time, and has come and be pleased to take a seat, gentlemen, and honor our poor room by sitting down in it."

I was thunder-struck. A little common-looking man was sitting at the table in a very smoking fowl, a bit of bacon, and some potatoes had been placed. He bore the evident marks of recent illness, and was with some difficulty at present. He resumed his seat, however, as I and my companion sat down. It took a minute or two before I could say any thing that was offered me in sheer surprise and bewilderment. The woman was very civil and obsequious. What, was that the substance of the neat little shadow which I had seen at work that great gaunt sloping creature? Were shadows so deceptive as this? I looked at the little man. The opposite neighbor could have had such a nose as I now saw, and that it was not a mere cast out in bold relief and left its mark upon my memory every time she approached the window?

I like fainted as I looked at my poor engraver. He was an inoffensive man enough, as he sat there like that, and expressed his gratitude to my companion for the assistance accorded to him during his recent attack; but he was a large-nosed, large-limbed man, no doubt. Not quite such a heavy brow as his wife's, but still a man of powerful make.

All this time, Swa while her husband was speaking, the gaunt woman kept up a continual protest of gratitude of the slimiest description, to which the old gentleman made no reply, but sat with his hands and his eyes fixed upon the fowl. Mr. and Mrs. Adams sat a little prepared for the real Mr. and Mrs. Adams by what he had seen of their shadows as I was. I, however, was not quite prepared for the real state of the invalid's health, which I had managed to foster on the strength of the shadow of the mother of us spoken a word.

Suddenly the tremendous idea entered my mind that there must be some mistake. I had been standing some time at the little girl whom we originally met on the door-step, and who, to do her justice, seemed the most complimentary person. I now struck me that her head came considerably above the window-sill, and I remembered that the child was almost extraordinary thing that its shadow had never caught my attention. My eyes having by this time got into comparison of the young lady with the window-sill been directed toward this last part of the room, I next observed that there was no bird-cage hanging in the window.

"Hallos!" I ejaculated, "you've taken down the bird-cage."

"Bird-cage, Sir?" whined the gaunt woman, deferentially.

"Yes, I got no bird-cage," burst out the small child of the door-step, "nor never haven't had none—nor yet no bird, neither."

"Will you hold your tongue, Miss?" interposed her mother.

There was an awkward pause. I looked again about the room, and looked at the man's head at her husband—he had no beard, I now observed, I had, however, presence of mind enough not to ask after that missing appendage as I had done after his bird-cage. A thought flashed across me since dawning, and walking toward the window and pulling aside the blind, observed, as an excuse for looking out:

"I am afraid you must be a good deal choked up at the back with houses. Isn't that rather unwholesome?"

A volubler answer on the subject of confined lodgings, their advantages and disadvantages, followed than I cared for at the moment. I looked down window in the house opposite. I had left the light and the blind half drawn up. The window before me, exactly in front of that which I was looking, was fastened back, and was open with shutters. Stretching my neck, and gleaning in a slanting direction toward the next of the opposite house, I saw that the room beyond it was also illuminated, and that the blind was half lowered.

"Your supper is getting cold," I said, coming back to the table, and addressing myself with meaning with my companion: "my friend and I have dined, and can wait; and we love to see enjoying ourselves, and so now we will leave you to better yourselves to the fowl that you smile it remained here."

So saying, and revisiting all entreaties to stay and take a share of the good things, I made for the door, and was soon on the staircase, followed close by Mr. Adams, who, I observed, kept up as we remained in the room, did nothing now but repeat, "Wrong, entirely wrong, Mr. Pycroft, the young people, haven't we?" in a loud and perfectly audible whisper to the little girl, who received the two loquacious herself to-hear what was said, and during the time that we were in the room she never ceased whining out her gratitude for a single moment.

When we got into the street I turned round and looked up companion in the face.

It is wrong, entirely wrong, my dear sir," I said, "to think that you have been assisting people who were not in distress. I am sorry for it, and sorry for the penny of your bounty has gone to the family so little in need of it."

"And how do you account for the mistake?" asked my old friend.

"I can only conclude," was my answer, "that by a curious coincidence the man and his two-and-four lodgers ill in two houses next door to each other, that the room having Dr. Cordial's visit has also opposite to mine, he had gone from the one house to the other, that he had had to pay a short visit to the invalid we have just left—and that then I had met him coming away, as I thought from attending to my poor neighbor, and so really from the deserving personage whose supper has been spoiled by our intrusion."

"And the shadows?" gasped Mr. Pycroft, utterly fallen.

"Have, through my unfortunate mistake, no received a single benefit," was my answer.

Mr. Pycroft stared at me for some time in perfect amazement.

"We can never leave the thing like this," he said, at last. "Do you think you could be sure of the house the third time?"

I can understand your feeling some misgivings about it," I answered, "but I think you may rely. This is the house, beyond a doubt; and I looked up at the window as I spoke.

Then let's bring the matter to a conclusion at once," said the old copper-plate printer, resolutely, and with that we actually rang at the second bell-handle from the top of the door.

After the proper amount of delay the door was opened by a tall, gaunt woman.

"Second-floor back?" said I, in a mellifluous voice.

"Front," replied the shatterly woman, in rather an injured tone: "you should have rung the bell on the right hand."

I begged pardon with all humility, and the slatternly woman ushered us upstairs.

"The two pair back's at home, I know," she said, "and the first floor's out, and as well high you."

We availed ourselves of this offer, and in a few seconds we were on the second-floor landing. The shatterly woman opened the door, and we found at first hidden from view, but in the other, as she rose upon our entrance, a recognized face and figure—one with which I was so familiar.

The room was a great contrast to that which we had left. The floor was tolerably well provided with furniture. The room was utterly bare, looking as if all the furniture had been taken away, as probably they had, to be turned into money. A couple of chairs and a table were the only articles out of the room. The table, and a couple of cups and saucers, the only articles of crockery I could see. The engraver's lamp was on the table, and his wife was sitting at work by the window. She had evidently just been cooking—a very little scrap of bacon and a few potatoes in a dish—and was hanging in the window, if I had wanted any confirmation of my conviction that I had found my shadows at last.

Of course, all these things were taken in by me at a single glance. It was necessary that I should at once account for my visit and that of my friend, and I began at the first thing that occurred to me.

"What do you mean?" I asked, in utter bewilderment.

I mean that if this has all been a planned thing to bring a reconciliation between me and my son—"

"Tut-tut-tut!" I gasped.

"I can only say," continued Mr. Pycroft, "that I should greet with the success it deserves."

He turned as he spoke, and made for the door, which I opened for him.

"Stay, Mr. Pycroft," I cried. "If you choose to retain the feeling of animosity, which so ill becomes you, you must, but you shall not go away with a false impression of this matter as far as I am concerned in it. I swear to you that your suspicions of me are false, that when we came to this house we knew little or nothing of the circumstances than you had, and that I never knew your son was living in this airy abbey; though, if I had, I would certainly have done my best to reconcile you to him. Under the present circumstances, you owe to one who bears your name"

"Who bears my name!" interrupted the old man when I denied his imputation of having been concerned in a plot to trick him into reconciliation, and now his eyes were directed toward the place where his son stood before him.

He was a fine, good-looking fellow, and as he stood there holding his wife's hand in his, and with the refined expression of his features I wearing on his worn but handsome face, I could not help feeling that such a son might well be proud of.

"Father," was the first moment left her husband's side, and, advancing to where we stood, laid her hand upon the arm of the old man. He looked at him once more, and then, beckoning the poor engraver to the door, he left the room, leaving it to the room, where I felt that my presence was no longer needed.

About an hour afterward I was sitting disconsolately in my room, reflecting on the loneliness of my own position, and rather envying my opposite neighbors the happiness which they were present in a cheery voice from my friend.

I rushed to the door, and saw my friend Mr. Pycroft standing at his son's open window.

"Come over, my dear sir," said the kind gentleman, "and spend what is left of the evening with us."

I accepted gladly, and was just drawing in my head from the window to go down, when I saw a man.

"And I say," said Mr. Pycroft, in a stage whisper, "as we are rather short of liquor here, perhaps you wouldn't mind bringing a bottle of brandy in your pocket with you. I'll pay you when you're going as a lesson—"

In a few minutes I was sitting one of a comfortable party in the room opposite.

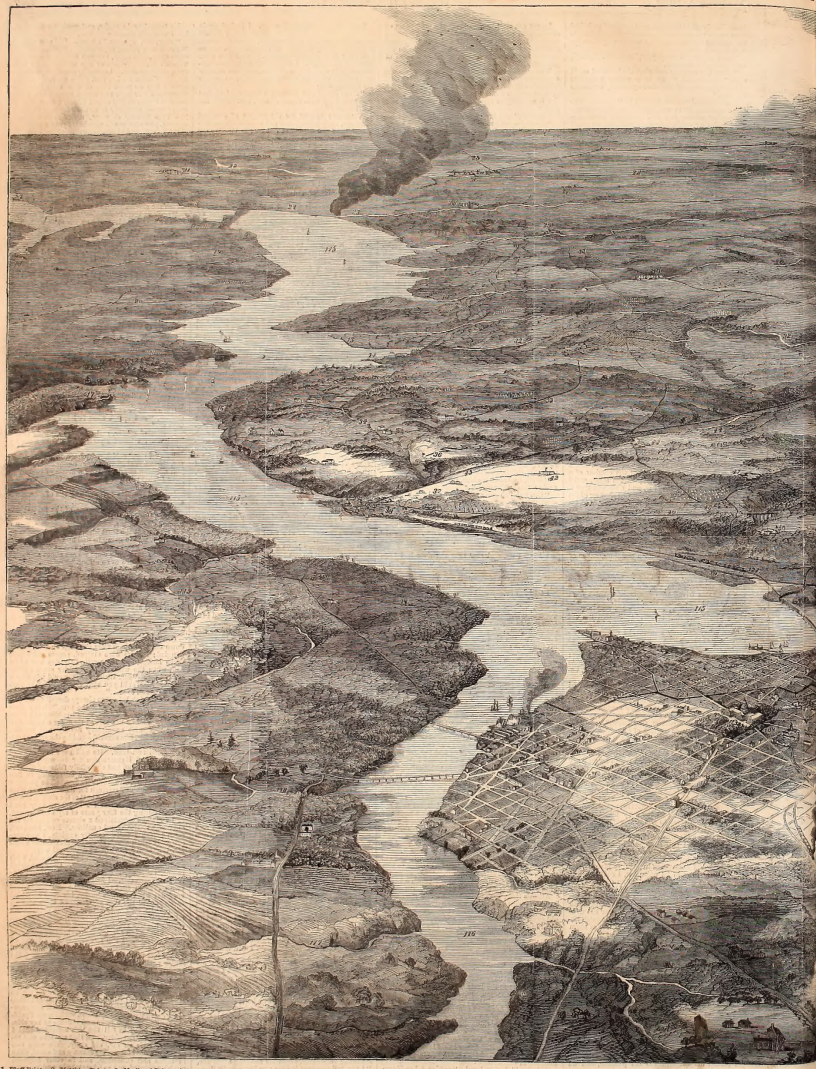
"Do you see the use now of the first things we intend to do now?" said the little wife, smiling as she looked at me.

"I have not the least idea," was my answer.

"Why, you know," said the little gaunt curtain we can get, in order to prevent our opposite neighbor from seeing what we are about whenever we have occasion to be alight.

"You need not be afraid," I said, "and you may now remove the curtain, for the opposite neighbor hopes henceforth to see as much as he likes of their doings, since that he is not likely to trouble himself much more about—their shadows."

II.—PICKING UP A POCKET-BOOK.



OFFICE-HOURS were over, and we were all taking down our coats and hats from the pegs on which they dangled; lodgers were cleaned, papers put away, desks locked, and we were ready to go out, and in and, when the whitehaired cashier came sidling toward me, and said, "Can you oblige me this moment? Would you step this way? The firm wishes to see you."

Good old Job Wigmton always described his employers as "the firm," and I knew that they were sacred beings in his eyes, were Spalding and Hamilton's bank, and had served there for a quarter of a century with exemplary fidelity and respect. Wigmton was a widower, with the daughter, a pretty near in that great mercantile house, was an Englishman born and bred. He had kept the books of Spalding and Hamilton's house in Calcutta and in Philadelphia, and had cheerfully followed them to Baltimore, and then to New York, and finally to San Francisco City, five years before. The younger clerks, fleet of foot and light of heart, used to say he rather disposed to make a butt of the simple, honest old man; but I, who had been one of his earliest friends during the four years of my employment, knew that he was universally respected for the old man's sterling good qualities. Now however, for he seemed to be summoned before the most relentlessly taken aback by the communication which Mr. Wigmton made to his own private ear.

"The firm wish to see you!" I stammered, with a tell-tale color rising in my face. Old Job nodded assent, and I left the room with my head in a confused spectacles. I had noticed, in spite of my perplexity, that the old man looked pale and full of nervousness; his voice was husky, his hand trembled as he held it out to me, and there was one of the unwonted moisture in his round blue eyes. As I followed him through the long office, the other clerks casually sat during business hours, I marked that every head was bent down, and every pen apparently might pretend. I had formerly been on terms of great and cordial intimacy with all these people, but for the last three months, my intercourse, with the senior partner in especial, had been strictly confined to the necessities of my office duties. It was not that I had done any thing to forfeit the good opinion of the firm, but I had unhappily, for the same confidence in me, the same regard for me, as I had formerly enjoyed. Mr. Spalding was a bachelor, ship, at least cordiality. This partial estrangement had arisen in the following way. I had been receiving smiling through tears and blushes at my side. I had written to my father, who had formerly loved his only daughter, and that my love was returned. He refused his consent. We were two young persons of the same country and creed, alike in tastes and education, and in other respects, wealth excepted, not so ill matched; and we were together on a foreign shore, among strangers who we had been sufficient to associate us similarly together, to read poetry, sing duets, and so forth; for Susan had a pretty voice, and I had the full approach of poverty-stricken suitors, and Mr. Spalding was a rich man, and had no daughter of his own.

before, and will again—down the smooth rose-strewn path that leads from friendship to love. I am sure of one thing: it was not my employer's wealth, or the idea of Emma's probable expectations from her father—who had but two children, a son and a daughter, between whom to divide the accumulations of a life spent in honorable toil—which allured me. But the time came when soft words and fond looks had to give place to an avowal of attachment. I spoke out to Emma, without premeditation; and, once across the Rubicon, other considerations, undreamed of as yet, came to beset me mockingly. What would Mr. Spalding think of me? Surely he could form but one judgment of the poor clerk, with no property beyond his pitiful savings, who had dared to entangle the affections of his master's daughter? My course was clear. I must tell him the truth, at whatever cost to myself.

I did so. The disclosure was hurried on by some slight unforeseen circumstance, as my proposal had been, but I was at least candid in my avowals. To do Mr. Spalding justice, he rejected my suit in as gentle and courteous a fashion as the harsh operation would admit of. But, cut to the heart, I withdrew from his presence, very very wretched, and had for many days afterward serious thoughts of excluding myself from observation, becoming a solitary man, and leading a gloomy and moody life. Better thoughts, however, lying deeper within me, admonished me of the utter worthlessness of a purposeless existence, and of the utter contemptibility of the soul that can sink into it. And thus it fell out that I ceased to visit my employer as a private friend, and yet remained in his employ.

Was I mean-spirited for staying on thus? I can not pretend to decide so nice a point, but I know that it was a great stimulant to me to have obtained a moral victory over myself, and some relief to the disappointment of my dearest hopes that I was still allowed to breathe the same air as Emma Spalding, to catch a glimpse of her sweet saddened face, were it but on the way to church, though for three weary months we never interchanged a word.

So I was not a little surprised when Job Wiginton summoned me to the presence of "the firm." My heart beat quickly as the old cashier turned the handle of the door. What could Mr. Spalding want of me? I had kept the promise he had wrung from me; I had abstained from any intrusion, any unlicensed correspondence. Surely, surely he could not send for me merely to say that a rejected suitor was ineligible even as a servant, and that our connection must cease? In the larger of the two adjacent rooms, a room hung in Spanish fashion with stamped and gilded leather, and heavily furnished with dark mahogany from Honduras, I found the firm. Mr. Spalding, a tall, thin, gray-headed gentleman, was pacing up and down the apartment in great agitation. Mr. Hausermann, a German, as his name implies, sat before a table covered with papers, ejaculating guttural exclamations of wonder from time to time, and with a look of hopeless perplexity in his fat pink face. The cashier entered along with me, and closed the door.

"Ach, mein Himmel!" muttered the junior partner—a hale, portly man, but of a flabby nature, morally and physically, compared with the energetic chief of the house—"ach! we were petter to have never peen porn than live to see this!"

Job Wiginton gave a groan of sincere sympathy. I quickly perceived that something had gone wrong, and as quickly did I see that this mysterious something had no direct reference to my audacity in winning the heart of Emma Spalding. What was amiss? There is one grisly ghost that always haunts the imagination of the more intelligent subordinates of a commercial firm—Bankruptcy. But the house had been such a prudent house, so steady and well ballasted, had glided so demurely along in safe old-world groove, that it was rather ridiculed in consequence by the mushroom firms that daily arose or collapsed around us. But I had little time to think, for Mr. Spalding stopped in his walk, came abruptly up to me, and took me by both hands. "George Walford," said the old merchant, with more emotion in his voice and features than he had ever shown before, "I have not been kind to you lately. You were a good friend to me—before—before—" and here he reddened somewhat, and ceased speaking.

I glanced toward Mr. Hausermann, but he looked so fat and helpless as he sat in his arm-chair, murmuring phrases in his native tongue, that I saw no explanation was to be looked for in that quarter. So I told Mr. Spalding, in as firm a tone as possible, that our mutual esteem had, I hoped, survived our intimacy, and that I still felt myself a faithful friend to him and his, and would gladly prove myself one.

"I thought so—I thought so," said the merchant, looking pleased for a moment; "you are a good lad, George, and that's why I come to you for help in my sore need, hard and harsh as you may have thought me the other day—when— Never mind!"

"I was first to say it," exclaimed Mr. Hausermann. "'Let us call Shorge Walford,' say I. 'He has got ver goot prains; ver goot young man.'"

A quarter of a century spent among Anglo-Saxons had never taught Mr. Hausermann the English language in its purity. Indeed, his life, out of office hours, was spent entirely with Teutons like himself, who swarm all over America, and with whom he could enjoy German conversation, Rhine wine, and the black coffee of the Fatherland. I should never get to the end of the interview if I described it verbatim, chronicling the broken sentences and vague talk of the junior partner, and the comments of Job Wiginton. The confidential cashier sympathized with the distress of his employers as a faithful dog might have done, and was about as likely to suggest a practical remedy. Mr. Wiginton was worthy of all trust; he was as close as wax and as honest as the day, but he was a mere machine for the casting up of sums, the balancing of books, and locking of safes. Mr. Hausermann was not much cleverer than the cashier; he was an admirable arithmetician, could detect an error of a halfpenny in a problem involving billions, and his penmanship was magnificent. But, with these attainments, he owed his present position in commerce not to his abilities, but to the florins he had inherited, and to the talent and keenness of his English partner. It was from the chief of the house himself that I heard the following tale: Mr. Spalding, as I have said, had but two children, Emma and her brother Adolphus; his wife had died on the voyage from Philadelphia, and his affection centred in his boy and girl. Unluckily, Adolphus did not turn out well, was wild and extravagant, and squandered his liberal allowance among horse-jockeys and gamblers. Mr. Spalding, strict with all the world besides, was rather lax and indulgent where his son was concerned. The young man was very good-looking and of pleasing address; he had been the darling of his dead mother; and the father was very patient and forbearing with him for her sake. The youth went from bad to worse, got deeper into debt and evil company, seldom came home, and seriously impaired his health by a long course of excesses. All this I knew, for Adolphus was a clerk in the house, nominally at least, though he hardly ever occupied his stool in the office. But what I did not know was that Adolphus Spalding, in his eagerness to settle a number of so-called debts of honor, had been led to rob his father. He had forged the signatures of Spalding and Hausermann to a check for thirty thousand dollars, payable at sight, and purporting to be drawn by the merchants on their bankers in New York. More than this: he had abstracted from his father's desk a Russia-leather pocket-book, containing bills and securities to a great amount, and this he had placed in the hands of the same vile associate who had undertaken to present the check at the counter of the New York bank.

"The scoundrel is gone Northward already. He started last Tuesday, by the way of Panama, along with the mail," said Mr. Spalding. "You know the man, I dare say, for he was very notorious in the town—Joram Heckler."

"Dr. Joram Heckler!" I exclaimed, as I recalled to mind the dark, clever face of the young man alluded to: a plausible, well-mannered person, who had been sub-editor of a San Francisco newspaper.

"Yes, Doctor, or Colonel, Heckler," responded Mr. Spalding, with a bitter smile; "for it appears that he has assumed a military title on the journey back to the North. He possessed great influence over the mind of my misguided son; he was the tempter in this accursed robbery; and I doubt not that he intends to appropriate the entire spoil to himself."

I now asked Mr. Spalding, as delicately as I could, how he had obtained his information.

It appeared that Adolphus, whose feeble frame, exhausted by hard living, was ill-fitted to sustain the fierce excitement of the felonious act he had committed, had sickened of a fever immediately after the departure of his accomplice.

"The wretched boy lies on his bed up stairs, quivering between life and death," said the father, with a faltering voice, "and in his delirium he has betrayed his guilt. His sister, who has watched at his bedside like an angel as she is, dear girl, she was frightened at his ravings of self-accusation. She called me, and with my own ears I heard the son I was so proud of—my petted boy—tell how he had cheated and plundered me."

The old merchant staggered to a chair, and I saw the tears trickle between the fingers with which he tried to hide the workings of his wrinkled face.

After a time he grew more calm. Then he developed his plan, in which broke out his habitual decision and force of character. Before all things, the honor of the house must be saved. The value of the money at stake (though a large sum) was trifling compared to the disgrace, the loss of credit, the blot upon the name of Spalding. Yes, at any cost, the young man's shameful act must be hidden in darkness. The check must not be presented, the bills must not be negotiated. But how to prevent the tempter from realizing the benefits of his ill-gotten booty? He was off—he was speeding toward New York by the quick Panama route; in a few weeks he would be there. No pursuit seemed possible. The delay till the start of the next mail would be fatal. I remembered the Pony Express, the swift overland mail whereby we Californian residents can most rapidly communicate with the civilized world, and I suggested this resource.

Mr. Spalding shook his head. "No, that would never do: I might send a dispatch, no doubt, to stop the payment of the check. I might perhaps procure Heckler's arrest on his arrival in New York, but thence would spring inquiry, doubt, suspicion, and the whole black affair would creep into the journals before a week was out. No. I have but one hope, one chance; I must send a trust-worthy person—I am too old to go myself—a trust-worthy person to hasten to New York by the perilous route across the Rocky Mountains, and he must arrive before Heckler, and must get the papers from him by violence or stratagem. George Walford, you are the man I have selected."

"I, Sir?"

I was stupefied. Before my fancy rose, like a panorama, the long route, then but lately explored, that traversed the enormous continent from sea to sea—a route teeming with dangers. All I had ever heard or read of prairie travel, of famine, fire, the assaults of wild beasts, and of human foes more pitiless still, crowded on my memory at once. I thought of the vast distance, of the almost Herculean fatigues to be undergone, of the icy barrier which the Rocky Mountains stretched across the track, as if to bar the progress of presumptuous man; and though I am no fainter of heart than my neighbors, I dare say my countenance expressed dismay and repugnance. Indeed, I am sure it did, for Mr. Hausermann groaned, and said, "Donner! what shall we to now?"

"Walford," said Mr. Spalding, "I don't wish to dissemble with you. I am asking you to incur the certainty of very great fatigue, hardship, and danger. I am asking you to risk life itself to save the honor of the house and that of my own family. I do not make such a request without proposing a proportionate reward— There, hear me out! I don't offer you money for such a service. Come back successful, and you shall be a partner in the house of Spalding and Hausermann; and if you and Emma are still of the same mind three months hence—"

I trembled with joy as I interrupted my employer. "I'll go, Sir, gladly and most willingly."

"That's a prave poy! I knew he would!" ejaculated the German; and the cashier rubbed his hands joyfully.

"When can you be ready to start?" asked Mr. Spalding.

"Directly. In half an hour, if you please."

"An hour will do," said Mr. Spalding, with a smile at my eagerness. "Bodesson shall be at the door by that time, with his carriage and his best horses. You must save your strength as much as you can for the prairie. You have a six-shooter, I know. Get ready what requisites for the journey will go into small compass. You shall have an ample supply of money—spend it freely, lavishly, and don't spare horse-flesh or gold upon the way. I would give half my fortune to place you speedily on the pavement of New York. You are an embassador with full powers, George, and your own wit and courage must carry you through. Now, you had better prepare for the road."

I lingered.

"Any thing more to say?" asked the merchant, good-humoredly.

"If I could speak for a moment—just an instant—to Miss Spalding?"

"She is at her brother's bedside," replied the old man, hurriedly. "But—yes, you are right. You shall see her before you start."

I seemed to make but one step to the house where I lodged. I spent ten minutes in hastily arranging my belongings—and it is wonderful how much a man can condense into ten minutes when he is under the influence of strong excitement—charged my revolver, packed a few things in a small bag, and ran back like a greyhound. Mr. Spalding gave me some fuller instructions, and handed to me a heavy parcel of gold and silver, as well as a bundle of bank-notes. I was to keep the bank-paper until I reached the civilized world; in the desert my only hope would be to bribe in specie the half-tamed wanderers of the West. Mr. Spalding was still talking when Bodesson, one of the principal liverymen of San Francisco, drove his spanking pair of Spanish horses up to the door. Then the merchant went up stairs, and returned with his daughter. Dear Emma! she was pale, and thinner than of old, but her eyes were bright and loving, and her words, full of hope and constancy, gave me fresh courage, and a resolve to do or die. Our parting was very brief. A few hurried whispers—a hasty renewal of the old vows and troth-plight—and for a moment I caught her in my arms and kissed her cheek, and in the next I was gone. I sat by Bodesson's side; the whip cracked; off flew the foaming horses along the street; and I looked back and waved a farewell in answer to Mr. Spalding's waving hand and Emma's handkerchief. Then we turned the corner, and darted along the road.

Bodesson was well paid, and he kept the mettled horses at their work over many a mile of ground. I seemed to start cheerfully, and under good auspices. My heart was full of hope. The gay French Creole by my side was a merry companion; he sang Canadian songs, whistled, chirruped to the bounding bays, and chattered incessantly.

"Monsieur was going to the prairies! Ah, très bien! The prairies were ver intéressantes, ver moch so. But Monsieur must take care when he got there—must not stir from the protection of ze dragoons, or les sauvages, ze ferocious Indians, would carry off Monsieur's cheveux—what you call scalp!"

So the Frenchman prattled on. He believed I was going to Salt Lake City on business, and never doubted that I should voyage with a caravan under escort of the States dragoons. What would he have said had he known that I was to traverse that land of danger and hunger alone?

My journey to the eastern border of California was not remarkable enough to justify me in dwelling here on its details. Spending money freely, I was able to proceed almost entirely in wheeled carriages more or less rude, and I contrived to push along over sorry roads at a respectable pace. I slept in the vehicles during the dark hours, snatching a broken slumber as best I could in the midst of jolting and swaying. Sometimes even a bribe could not induce my Mexican or American drivers to risk the perils of a stony road at night, and then I recruited my strength by rest, but was always ready to start at cock-crow. I knew well what was before me, and that all the fatigue I endured was child's play to what was in store. I had been on the prairies before—those, at least, which lie east of the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Spalding was well aware that I was a good horseman, expert in the use of fire-arms, and of a robust constitution. These are not the common attributes of a clerk, but I had not been bred to the desk. My father had been esteemed rich, till at his death, in embarrassed circumstances, I had been left to battle with poverty as I might; I had kept hunters at Oxford, and had been passionately fond of field-sports. I had kept up the habit of taking brisk exercise, and now I was about to find the benefit of trained muscles and robust health. I did not disguise from myself that I was embarking on an enterprise full of risks. I might starve in the desert, whitened as it was by the bones of many an emigrant. I might perish miserably in one of those fires that rush like flaming serpents through the boundless sea of grass. And if my scalp did not blacken in the smoke of some Indian wigwam, fever or sheer fatigue might make an end of my life and hopes at once. Or, I might reach New York too late. It was gall and wormwood to me to think that Joram Heckler was pressing on toward the North with all the speed of a fast steamer. The very thought made me bound and stamp my foot on the floor of the rude mail-cart, as if I could quicken my progress by such a gesture. How I prayed that contrary winds might delay the packet on its passage from Aspinwall to the Empire City!

I reached Carson City, on the border of the desert, and there I made a brief halt that I might prepare for the coming effort. I was perfectly well aware that the most dangerous and difficult part of the road was that lying between California and the Mormon settlements. Once beyond the Utah territory, I might well hope to escape the arrows and tomahawk of the savage. I found Carson full of returning emigrants, diggers going back with their pelf to the Atlantic States, Mormon converts and traders who had emptied their wagons in Californian markets. These good folks were all waiting for the regular escort of national dragoons, under whose guard they were to travel. It was impossible for me to move so slowly, and I accordingly bought a bag of sun-dried beef, another of parched corn, some blankets, and such matters, and a powerful horse handsomely accoutred with a bridle and saddle of Mexican make. I bought the latter from an American dealer, who was mightily tickled at the idea of my making my way alone over the prairies. "I give you credit for your grit, sartainly, mister," said he; "it is good, and no mistake; but I guess you'd better sleep upon the idea a few times more. Then Indian scalpers will lift your ha'r, sure as hogs yield bacon. Won't you believe me? Come along, then, and ax another man's opinion!" And he dragged me toward a sort of tavern, the porch of which was crowded by men and women, French, Spanish, German, Yankee, and mulatto, all of whom were gathered round a lathy, dark-haired young fellow in a trim half-military dress, that would have passed for that of a policeman but for the red flannel shirt and Mexican sombrero he wore. This man had keen mobile features, and was hardened by constant work and weather into little more than muscle and bone; he wore spurred boots and thick "savers," and was cracking a whip as he gayly chatted with the crowd, who laughed at his wit in a way that proved him a prime favorite. He was, in fact, one of the salaried riders of the "Pony Express," ready to start with the bag of dispatches the instant the courier from San Francisco should arrive with it.

"Yes, Colonel; yes, gals," I heard him say; "I'm downright sorry to leave, but duty is duty, ain't it? If the Indians don't rub me out—"

"Rub you out, Shem? Catch a racoon asleep!" cried one of the rider's admiring friends.

"Wa'al!" said Shem, with a modest voice, but a boastful twinkle in his restless eye, "the varmints have tried a time or two, but they've found Shem Grindrod rather a tough nut to crack, they have. When a chap's Kentucky bred, real, right down hickory, 'tain't so easy to lift his ha'r as— Service to ye, stranger!"

For his eye had lighted on me.

"Shem," cried the horse-dealer, "here's a gentleman wants to cross the parara, all alone, on hossback, Broadway fashion. What do you say to that?"

There was a general laugh. Shem took off his hat with mock respect.

"Whoop!" he cried. "If that ain't clear grit in the down-easter dandy! You'll see snakes, mister, I reckon. There's no accommodation for gen-teel persons, and you'll jest get your hoss stole, or chawed up by the wolves, and you'll lose yourself and die for want of a dinner, if you don't fall in with the Injuns—and if you do, Jehoshaphat!"

All this would have been provoking to some men, but I knew the American character too well to be out of temper. Shem evidently took me for a presumptuous townsman, plunging wantonly into the lion's mouth, and was good-naturedly discouraging my rashness. With some trouble I drew him apart, and commenced a private conversation. I told him that I was bound for the Eastern States; that my business was imperative, but that if he could help me I would pay him most liberally for the aid rendered. For I had formed a crude idea that if I could procure the privilege of using the relays of spare horses kept at the different stations on the route, for the use of the mail-bag riders, I might accomplish the most awkward part of the journey with great rapidity. Shem, however, though not ill-natured, dashed my hopes to the ground. Such a concession would be "agin all rule." The servants of the Express Company "darn't do it." It was not to be thought of. I must wait for the caravan.

I did not wait for the caravan, but set forth that very day. The people gave me a half ironical cheer as I rode out of the straggling street of Carson, but I saw the Yankee dealer shake his head and screw up the corners of his mouth, as if he considered me little better than a suicide.

There was no use in letting the grass grow under my feet, so I pushed briskly ahead. I was riding a powerful horse, one of those bred in Kentucky or Tennessee, and which will sell for a high price on the western border of prairieland. To find the way in broad daylight was easy. There was a broad track made by the passage of countless wagons and beasts of burden. I had a compass, but I really did not need it. I covered many a weary league of ground in the course of that day's ride. Here and there, among the forked streamlets which were feeders of the Carson, I came to farms where I easily procured corn for my horse and food for myself. I had come to two resolutions: one, to economize my little store of jerked beef as much as possible; the other, to refuse all hospitable proffers of whisky, being convinced that on water only could such trying work as that before me be accomplished. I kept on, with brief pauses through the day, and held to the track as long as the moonlight served me, urging on my flagging steed to the very limits of his strength. Then, in the dark, I dismounted, took off saddle and bridle, hobbled my horse, and tethered him so that he had ample space to graze. Then I lay down, wrapped in my blankets, pillowed my head upon my saddle, and fell asleep with my weapons by my side.

I awoke with a start, in the pitch dark night, and could not well remember where I was. My horse was uneasy, and his abrupt motions had disturbed me. I heard a rustling in the long grass, a scratching, a pawing of light feet among the herbage, and a whining sound as of hungry dogs whimpering for food. Dogs? There were no dogs there. Wolves! And my horse, on whose security my life might depend, was trembling and bathed in perspiration. I had kindled no fire, apprehensive lest the light should attract some band of prowling savages; and now the coyotes were gathering around us like flies about honey. For myself, I felt no fear: the wolf of America is very different from the "gray beast" of German forests or Pyrenean snows. But my poor nag was in danger, and his very tremors were adding perilously to the exhaustion of the long and hurried ride. I rose, and began groping about for brushwood. Luckily I was still in a well-watered region, where shrubs and undergrowth abounded, and where the gigantic cotton-wood trees reared their majestic forms beside the streamlets. I soon came upon a clump of brush, and cutting with my sharp and heavy knife as much as I could carry in both arms, I returned with it, and cleared a little space of the grass, which was long enough to be dangerous in the event of its catching fire. I then took out my tin box of lucifers, struck a light, and kindled a fire: though not very easily, for the heavy dew stood in great glistening beads on grass and shrub, and the moistened wood emitted many a cloud of pungent and dark smoke before I could coax the sullen embers to burst forth in the required blaze. All this time I had to give an occasional halloo, rattling a tin cup against the barrel of my revolver, for the purpose of intimidating the wolves; while it was necessary to pat and soothe by voice and hand the poor horse itself, which was tugging at the tethering-rope in a way that threatened to break it every instant. At last, to my great joy, the fire leaped up, red and cheery, its bright beams illumined a little radiant patch of prairie, and, hovering in the shadows on the edge of this illuminated spot, I saw the slinking coyotes, the smallest and most timid, but also the most cunning, variety of the wolf of America. Presently I flung a firebrand among the pack, and they vanished into the darkness, but for half an hour I could hear their howls of disappointment growing fainter and fainter as the distance increased. My horse was quieter after the disappearance of the wolves, and in about an hour I ventured to return to my blankets and my repose, after piling a fresh heap of brush on the steadily glowing fire. Not very long afterward a feeling of intense cold awoke me by slow degrees. I opened my eyes. The fire was low; its embers glowed crimson, fading gradually into blackness. Overhead was the dim sky, the vast host of stars having the peculiar pale and sickly hue which heralds the dawn. It was very cold. There was a rushing sound in the air, and the grass of the prairie was tossed to and fro in wild confusion; a strong wind was blowing—the norther. This was the first blast of the chilly north wind that annually sets in at the close of the unhealthy season in the South. It had a piercing and glacial effect, coming, as it did, from the Polar ice-fields, and across the Rocky Mountain range; but I gladly hailed it, for I remembered that it would be dead against the mail steamer that was breasting the waters of the Mexican Gulf with Joram Heckler and his plunder on board. I might beat him yet!

But the wind increased in force; it was blowing like a hurricane, and I shivered in spite of my warm poncho and blankets. My horse had lain down, and was trembling with cold. I was obliged to spare him a blanket; he was a "States" horse, swifter, but not so hardy and useful for prairie travel as the mustangs of the plains. The wind did not diminish as the sun rose, red and angry, and a new cause of alarm began to haunt me. I had heard of travelers utterly weather-bound for days among the prairies, on account of the fury of the resistless wind. And time was so valuable to me! I felt sick at heart as the chilly hours of early morning crept on, and almost despaired of success. I was benumbed and stiff; the dew had been turned to icicles by the sudden cold; and now every waving blade of grass seemed crested with a diamond, glittering and flashing in the level sunshine. By nine o'clock the wind began to abate; it slackened very gradually, and at half past ten I considered that I might resume my journey. My breakfast was not a luxurious one; a mouthful of beef and parched maize, swallowed in the intervals of saddling my horse and rolling up my blankets. Then I drew up the iron peg to which the halter was attached, rolled up the halter, lasso fashion, at my saddle-bow, and mounted. I was less awkward in the everyday routine of prairie life than might be supposed. Years ago, before I entered Spalding and Hausermann's employ, I had spent some weeks in a frontier fort, as the guest of the officers of a United States Ranger regiment. I had accompanied my hosts on several hunts and scouting expeditions against hostile Indians, and had found some amusement in picketing my steed, lighting camp fires, and so forth: little dreaming that my whole earthly happiness would ever depend on my proficiency in such arts. As the sun rose in the pale blue sky nature assumed a more cheerful appearance; the icicles and hoar-frost melted, and the air became merely bracing and agreeable, as the bitter cold passed away. On we went, following the plain trail of the wagon trains, up and down the gently rolling slopes of the undulating prairie. I noticed with some dismay that my horse was no longer the mettled creature that had pranced so gayly out of Carson the day before. At first he certainly answered my voice and the pressure of my knee, by stepping out gallantly; but after a while he began to flag, bore heavily on the bit, and required a frequent touch of the spur. It was clear I had taxed his powers too severely on the previous day. He was going weakly under me, in a spiritless way that spoke volumes. What was I to do? I had plenty of money, but money can not prove a talisman in the wilderness. There was not a farm between the place where I stood and the Great Salt Lake itself. My only chance in procuring a remount lay in meeting some one who would sell me a steed, and this was far from a certainty. I was chewing the cud of bitter reflections when I heard the light tramp of a galloping horse behind me. Quickly I turned my head, and saw a booted rider dashing gayly along over the swells of the prairie; his trim coat, half opened, showed a red flannel shirt; and his Mexican sombrero was bound with a cord of tarnished gold. He had a revolving carbine pistol at his saddle-bow, and at his side hung from his shoulder-belt his leathern dispatch-bag. It was my acquaintance of yesterday—Shem Grindrod.

"Mornin', stranger!" he called out, cheerily; "I didn't skear you yesterday, it seems, by my yarns about Injuns. 'Twas Gospel truth, for all that. Camped out, I reckon? Your hoss does look a little the wuss for wear, mister, though. You've pushed him a goodish stretch, you have."

We rode on for some distance side by side. My poor horse was inspired to do his best by the presence of the other horse, and together we sped over the country: my steed trotting, Shem's mustang galloping, for Spanish-American horses have but one pace when urged beyond a walk. Shem was much more kind and even polite in his manner than on the previous day. He told me, bluntly, that he respected a fellow that proved himself a man, but that what he hated worse than copperhead snakes was a Broadway dandy giving himself adventurous airs. My horsemanship had won Shem's esteem, and he sympathized heartily with me when he saw that I was really bent on crossing the desert at any risk.

"Your hoss is a good bit of stuff, mister," said he, "but I'm afraid he's pretty nigh used up for one while. Now you listen to me. The best thing you can do is to buy a mustang fust chance you get. There'll be hunters passing south, and p'raps they'll trade. When you get right out among the plains, you stick to the trail well, and if a grass fire blinds it, you take your compass and bear up for east by north. Keep that pistol of yourn ready, and if you do see Injuns, keep cool. Don't waste a shot. Every round bit of lead is worth a life on the parara. Good-by, wish you luck!"

Shem headed his horse for one of the Express stations, a little lonely block-house, with a stockaded yard, which was garrisoned by a few of his comrades, and where a relay of fresh horses was kept. I looked wistfully at the block-house and the well-stocked corral, and then turned away with my tired steed to resume my weary travel. I knew that early in the afternoon I should reach another station of the same kind, and there I meant to apply for refreshment and shelter in case my horse should knock up altogether. Before I had gone a mile I saw my friend Shem, on a fresh steed, scouring the plain. He waved his hand, and gave me a cheer of recognition, and I looked after him enviously as he flew like an arrow up the slope, and vanished in the distance. By good luck, however, I almost instantly encountered a party of white men, the first travelers I had seen. These turned out to be three trappers returning from Oregon, with a fair stock of peltry loaded on two mules. They were all well-mounted on "Indian ponies," and one of them led by a lariat a powerful and shapely mustang, whose bright eye and wide nostrils matched well with his wiry limbs. He had been captured on the plains, not two months before, one of a wild herd; but he was sufficiently broken in to be useful in prairie fashion. I struck a bargain with the trapper, by which my exhausted but more valuable quadruped was bartered for the half-wild mustang; the trapper also receiving four gold eagles. The arrangement was mutually satisfactory, and as the tall Kentuckian helped me to shift my saddle and bridle to the spotted nag I had just acquired, I saw his eyes twinkle with self-congratulation.

"One word of advice, Colonel," said the trapper, as I placed the gold in his hard brown hand; "keep your eyes skinned as you go along, and don't let the cussed Redskins double upon you. There's Indian sign about, there is. I saw the print of a moccasin down yonder by the spring, where the Indians never come for any good, mister. You mind—Utahs ain't to be trusted, and Shoshonies are worse. As for Rapshoes, Heaven help you, Colonel, if they ketch you alone! There's Indians about. I smell 'em."

"I wish you'd got a good rifle on your shoulder, mister," said another, as I mounted; "six-shooters is very handy tools, but nothing sickens the Indians like a good five-foot bit of holler iron, that air true."

I took leave of these good fellows, who wished me a safe journey in the heartiest way, though evidently disbelieving in the likelihood that a "greenhorn" could carry his property and scalp safe across the desert. The mustang was fresh, and darted along at that untiring though not very speedy gallop which animals of that hardy race can maintain for a very considerable time. We made capital progress: the country grew drier, and the grass shorter, and the swampy bottoms and trickling brooks were fewer. I met with no adventure, except that my new purchase put his foot into an outlying burrow, as we skirted a "village" of prairie dogs, and gave us both a roll on the turf; but we were unhurt, and I had luckily kept my grasp of the bridle, or I should have lost my horse. Once I thought I saw something hovering on the edge of the horizon, but whether savages, buffaloes, or wild horses, I could not determine. After riding several miles I came to a place where the trail dipped suddenly into a low tract of alluvial earth, intersected by a stream of some magnitude, and shaded by a belt of lofty cotton-wood trees. I traced here the fresh footprints of a horse, which must just have passed, for the bruised grass had but partially risen around the edges. "Crack, bang!" went the sharp report of fire-arms ringing from the thicket below, and with the reports mingled the horrid war-whoop of the savage. Grasping my pistol, I dashed in among the trees, and beheld poor Shem Grindrod, bleeding, reeling in his saddle, and beset by a party of six or seven Indians, mounted, and in their hideous panoply of war. Shem had been pierced by three arrows; he was fainting with loss of blood; but he fronted the savages boldly, and one Indian lay at his feet, rolling in the agonies of death. My arrival changed the current of the fight; two rounds from my revolver, the second of which laid low a muscular barbarian, smeared with yellow ochre, who was pressing on Shem with an uplifted tomahawk, sufficed for their discomfiture. Probably they took me for the advanced guard of a party of whites. At any rate, they fled at speed across the plain.

I was just in time to break Shem's fall, as the poor fellow dropped from his saddle, feebly murmuring, "Thank ye, mister. You've saved my scalp, any way, if 'twas just too late to save—" His voice was hushed here, and he fainted in my arms.

There was a metal flask of whisky dangling at the mail-bag rider's saddle-bow, along with his blanket and haversack; I hastily unscrewed the stopper, and contrived to force a few drops into the mouth of the wounded man. Then I tore my cravat into strips, and with it and my handkerchief tried to bind up the hurts Shem had received, after vainly attempting to withdraw the barbed arrows. Two of the injuries were mere flesh wounds, more painful than dangerous; but the third was of a serious character: the shaft was imbedded in Shem's side, though the hemorrhage was trifling in appearance when compared with the abundant flow of blood from the other injuries. In about a couple of minutes Shem revived sufficiently to look up. I was touched by the gratitude his eyes expressed. Probably, poor lad, he had received but a scanty share of kindness in his scrambling life.

"Do you suffer much pain from the arrow wounds?" I asked. "Take a drop more of the whisky; it will give you strength; and if I can once help you to proceed as far as the block-house—"

"'Tain't no manner of use, stranger, my duty to ye, all the same," replied the rider, after swallowing a small quantity of spirits. "I've got my finish at last. A chap that's fit in the border fights ever since he could squint along a gun don't need no doctor to tell him when he's got goss, he don't."

I could not disguise from myself that Shem was right. His face showed a ghastly change; it was ashen white, pinched, and thin; while the lips twitched, and the eyes had acquired that peculiar eager glance, and restless, craving brightness, which we never notice except in those over whom death hovers. But I tried to cheer the poor fellow; succeeded in stanching the blood that flowed from his arm, transpierced by two of the iron-tipped reeds; and begged him to keep up his hope and courage.

"'Tain't worth wasting words upon, mister," gasped Shem; "I knowed I'd my call: onst I felt the cold and the rankling pain that follered the smart of that cussed arrow in my ribs. I'm jest bleeding to death inwardly, I am, and all the surgeon chaps in the States couldn't help me, no, nor yet the cleverest bone-setter in the pararas. But you cheated the curs out of my scalp, stranger. They had a hanker to get this child's ha'r, they had, to dance round in their darned village, them Shoshonies. My! How the squaws will jeer and mock 'em when they go back empty-fisted, and leavin' two of the pack behind 'em too!" And Shem, with death in his face and at his heart, actually laughed. He had to catch painfully at his breath before he spoke again. "Stranger, it's an ill wind blows nobody any good. You hark to me. What I couldn't give you, nouther for dollars nor axin', you'll get now. Go on to the station; take this here mail-bag along; give it 'em, and tell 'em the rights of what's chanced. They'll turn out fast enough, I'll warrant, and they'll put me under the turf afore the wolves pick my bones. And another rider must go on with the bag. And tell 'em 'twere my dyin' wish they'd give you a fresh hoss at each block, and so let you go with the rider and push ahead. The Co. won't be riled at the breach of rules—seein' you saved the bag, let alone my scalp, and—"

He broke down here. I was quite melted at the unselfish thoughtfulness of this poor dying creature, this untaught, half-wild frontiers-man, who could care for my speedy journey while his own vital breath was trembling on his livid lips. I gave him a third sup of whisky, begging him to let me know if I could communicate his last wishes to any distant friend or relation?

"There a gal that lives to Hampton Town," said Shem, almost in a whisper, "the darter of a dealer that trades in mules, she be; and Ruth and I—Oh, 'tis a pity the wedding-day were put off, cause the Co. gives pensions to wives, but none to sweethearts, and Ruth's father met with misfortins in trade, and she'd ha' been glad of a few dollars a year, poor thing!"

I asked his sweet-heart's name, for, as I assured him, I felt certain that the house of Spalding and Hausermann would befriend her for his sake, if through the service I had rendered Shem I were really enabled to do my errand with a success otherwise unattainable.

"Ruth Moss," said Shem, in his weak voice; "that's her surname and given name. She's a good girl, pretty and good, is Ruth, and only too tender a flower for a rough borderman like me; goes to chapel reg'lar, and writes like a print book."

He then begged that I would send to Ruth a certain knot of ribbon which he had received from her as a keepsake, or merely snatched in a lover's whim I do not know which; at any rate, I found it carefully wrapped in deer-skin, in the bosom of his dress, but ah! with a deep dark stain of blood marring the gay blue of the silk. The arrow had passed nearly through that humble love-token. Shem further prayed me that, as I passed by the Round Pond Station, between Fort Bridge and Red Creek, I would tell his old father, Amos Grindrod, that he, Shem, had "died like a man."

"The old man 'll be cut up, I'm afraid," murmured Shem, whose eyes were getting dim; "but he'll be glad to know my ha'r warn't lifted. Tell him I were wiped out by the band of Mad Buffalo, the Shoshonie. 'Twar' Mad Buffalo hisself that sent the arrow through me just as I kivered him with the carbine. The skunk! Many a noggin of drink I've given him when he come tradin' to the fort. But there war a grudge atween him and me, and he's ped it; but let him mind how he ever comes within range of old Amos Grindrod's rifle!"

Shem was anxious to know whether the Indian I had shot was quite dead, and what painted device his half-naked body bore. His own glazing eyes could not distinguish; but when I described the yellow ochre barred with white, he said it must be the "Little Owl," one of Mad Buffalo's best warriors. The other Indian was of slighter make, and daubed with black and vermilion. Both were stone dead. Shem asked me, half timidly, if I would be so good as repeat "a bit of Scripture." He had not been much of a chapel-goer, but Ruth had "got religion," and his mother too had been "a Christian woman," as he quaintly observed. I knelt beside him, and held up his head as I uttered aloud the words of a brief and simple prayer, such as little children are taught to lisp with their innocent lips; and once or twice I heard the husky tones of the dying man repeat the words. But there was a strong shiver through his frame, and poor Shem Grindrod was dead before the prayer was prayed out.

About an hour later I rode up to the station, mounted on my own horse, and leading Shem's by the bridle.

"Halloa! pull up, pull up, or I'll plug ye, sure as my name's Bradshaw!" shouted a stern voice through a loop-hole of the lonely block-house. And I saw the long clouded barrel of a frontier rifle pointing in my direction. I halted, of course.

"That's one of our hosses!" cried a second voice; "the critter's stole it, I reckon. What is he?"

"I am a friend," I called out; "a traveler from California. Let me come in, and I will explain all."

The garrison held a short but animated debate. One man avowed his belief in the truth of my story, another broadly hinted that I might turn out a "renegade" or "white Indian;" that I merely wanted to open the doors of the fortress to my ferocious allies, ambushed somewhere hard by, and that it would be as well to shoot me, as a provisional act of prudence. But the majority carries the day in America; and, luckily for me, the majority decreed my admission. Loud was the surprise, and sincere the sorrow, with which the little garrison received the news of their comrade's murder. Three of the men caught up such rude tools as they possessed, and, slinging their rifles, prepared to take the "back trail" to the spot where the unfortunate young man's body lay, and where his remains would be hastily laid in earth, after the custom of the frontiers. Another hurried, with all the instinct of discipline, to saddle a horse for the purpose of carrying forward the mail-bag which poor Shem had resigned only with his life. This rider was the most affected of the group by the melancholy tidings I had brought. He would have preferred to be one of those who were to lay his old associate beneath the prairie turf, but this could not be. He was "next for duty," he said, simply, with tears standing in his hardy eyes. So he hurried to equip himself and steed for the perilous road. I now ventured, rather timidly and awkwardly, to prefer my request for the accommodation of fresh relays of horses along the rest of the route, speaking as modestly as I could of my own preservation of the dispatches. The men looked puzzled as they scrutinized me and weighed my demand. One of them—he who had taken me for a renegade white in the Indian interest—gave me a piercing glance, and gruffly said, "How do we know he ain't been bamfoozling us with a pack of lies? He may have murdered Shem, ye see, jest to get a remount, and—"

"You jest shut up!" thundered, in tones of deep indignation, the rider who was to carry on the mails. "You oughter to be ashamed of that tongue o' yourn, Jethro Summers. Here's a gentleman, and, what's more, an honest chap, has fit by poor Shem's side, has saved his scalp from them Shoshonies, and brought on the bag for us, and you're to insult him with your mean talk. See! his hoss is fresh, and he's brought in Shem's hoss; and you to go telling him he'd murder a white Christian to get a lift. It's a burnin' shame, Jeth Summers!"

"'Tis, 'tis!" exclaimed the other two men. "Did ye ever know a darned renegade look a chap in the face, bold and honest, like the Colonel there? He's a good chap, is mister; and if ever he wants a friend in a rough-and-tumble fight, we're his men, sure as minks can swim."

The trio shook hands with me with genuine warmth. Now, when the iron was hot, was the time to strike. I therefore made an energetic appeal to them to supply me with horses, assuring them that my whole prospects and happiness, as well as those of others, depended on my speed. They listened with interest; but when I concluded with the words, "Shem Grindrod wished it; he bade me ask it of you, as he lay dying," the game was won. To be sure, the one ill-conditioned member of the community grumbled out something about "soft sawder, breach of rules, cunning Yankees, and dismissal." But the tall rider cut him short, by affirming with an oath that "if the Co. chose to ride nasty on such a point, after the stranger's services, why the Co. was a mean scamp, and he wouldn't serve 'em, for one." I did not at first exactly comprehend this frequently-recurring phrase of the "Co.," and was disposed to regard it as the name of some over-looker, or superintendent, but afterward discovered that this monosyllabic impersonation meant the Express Company.

"Look sharp, mister. You shall have a mount, but there's time lost a'ready, and we shall have to ride whip and spur. Come and pick a nag out of the corral. There's a brindled mustang your saddle will fit like his skin. The roan's best, but his back's rubbed raw. Ask Jonas to give you some beef and biscuit: we sha'n't pass many hot-els, that air positive. Charge that revolver o' yourn, Colonel; I see two bullets a-missing. Have a horn of whisky—old Monongahela? No! Do be spry with the saddle, you Jeth—a man should help in a case like this. Easy, mister, with the bridle—the mustang bites—so! We'll take care of your nag, and you'll find him as sleek as a slug if you come back our way. Good-by, boys!"

So saying, the impatient rider finished his preparations, sprang to his saddle, waved his repeating carbine over his head, and set off at furious speed. I followed as rapidly as I could, shouting a farewell to those left behind, who were on the point of starting for the place where poor Shem was lying beside the corpses of his copper-hued foes, stiff and stark.

The brindled mustang was fat and lazy, compared with the nimble cream-colored pony on which my guide was mounted. It took all my exertions to overtake 'Demus Blake, whose name was probably Aristodemus, though thus curtailed by usage. We rode at a tremendous pace.

"Larrup your beast, Colonel," cried the rider, "we're woeful behind. Don't be stingy with the spur-iron, for that brindle does allays shirk when he can. Mind—'ware the sappy ground, where you see them clubby mosses! Jordan! they'd take a hoss up to the girths, and there you'd stop like a tree'd coon. Push on, Sir. Rattle him across them riv'lets: not that a parara hoss can jump like the critters from the U-nited States."

It struck me that 'Demus Blake was bawling and flogging in this excited way for no other purpose than to quiet his own nerves and drown care. I was confirmed in this view by the fact that, after six or seven miles had been swallowed up by the rapid career of our foam-flecked steeds, the rider reined his horse into a steady hand-gallop.

"There, mister," said he, "we'll go quiet now. I feels kiender easier under my left ribs. Tell'ee, Colonel, little as you think it, to look at such as me, I was as near making the biggest baby of myself—there, I was! Poor boy Shem! I knowed him, Sir, oncommon well, and oncommon long. We played about together, when we were as high as a ramrod, in Pequottie village, nigh to Utica, in old Kentuck. And when old Amos and my daddy, Jonathan Blake, calculated to move West, they chose the same location. Sad news for old Amos—a white-haired old chap now, but pretty tough, too. He's at Brown's Hole—no, at Round Pond—trading for peltry. I wouldn't care to have the tellin' on him."

The rider was silent for a good while after this. He did not speak again till I paid a merited tribute to Shem's courage. I had found him, I said, fronting seven Indians like a stag at bay. The frontiers-man's eye glittered proudly:

"A brave boy, Sir. I was with him, first fight—that is, Shem's first, cause I'm two year an older man. 'Twarn't hereaway. South of Frémont's Pass it wur, and bloody Blackfoot Indians war the inimy, three to one, on'y they'd no firearms. 'Twarn't child's play that day, mister!" The backwoodsman expanded his broad chest, while his nostrils dilated, and his lips tightened, as he recalled the arduous struggle long past.

He was a much stronger man than Shem, of a spirit less gay and lightsome, but not without a certain amount of rude practical poetry in his disposition. He knew Shem's sweet-heart: a very nice-looking girl, of rather a quiet, subdued, and pious nature. "Not too common on the border, nouther, where even gals mostly has a spice of the wild-cat, but, mebbe, that pleased Shem."

Of the distress in store for old Amos Grindrod—a hunter once renowned for his prowess and skill, whether in warfare or the chase—Blake spoke feelingly and with deep conviction.

"'Twill shorten the old man's days, Sir, but it's lucky the old woman's not alive to hear it: she was that tender of Shem, if his finger ached she'd flutter like a robbed hen. Good old soul she was, Mrs. Grindrod, and nursed my old mother when she took the fever in that murderin' swamp."

Honest 'Demus had too much innate good-breeding to be inquisitive as to the purport of my unusual journey. In this respect, as in some others, he far surpassed in tact and politeness many an accomplished citizen in varnished boots and satin vest. But he offered me some well-meant advice.

"Take it coolly," said he, "and don't flurry yourself, Colonel. You've got more color in your cheeks than need be, and your hand was as hot, when I shook it, as a bit of deer-meat toastin' over the fire. I don't know as you ain't right, shirking the whisky, though 'tis food and comfort to such as me. But a smart touch of fever would tie you by the leg, stranger, so don't fret overly, and sleep all you can. As for Injuns, they'll hardly trouble two white men, when there's nouthin' to be got but a kipple of nags that can be bought for a cast of the lasso, or larist. The emigrant trains is different, for the Red devils scent plunder in the wagons, and only the dragoons skear 'em. 'Twar spite med the Mad Buffalo fall on Shem Grindrod. Shem give him a coat o' tar and turkey feathers one night, at Bridger's Fort, when the Injun got so drunk with whisky some rascal sold him, he lay like a hog on the ground. They never forgive, them Injuns. Shoshonies have no pity, compared to the savages east of the Rocky Mountains. Keep a look-out for outlying war parties, mister, when you get to the mountain parks. Crows will take hoss and clothes; Blackfeet allays hanker arter ha'r!"

I took my guide's well-meant advice, and endeavored to get through the journey as phlegmatically as might be. I snatched every opportunity of repose, if only for a few minutes, while the reeking saddles were being shifted to the backs of fresh horses; and it is wonderful how much refreshment I at times derived from a nap so brief as not much to exceed the traditional "forty winks." More than once my companion said to me, "Colonel, you're about dropping with sleep. Shut your eyes, if you like, and give me your reins. I'll guide both hosses, and you can't hardly roll out of that cradle o' yourn." And, indeed, the deep Mexican saddle of demipique cut, which I had luckily provided on starting, was admirably adapted, with its lofty pommel and cantel, to the use of a dozing equestrian. Curious spells of slumber those were, when my head would nod like that of a porcelain mandarin, and my eyelids droop as if weighted with lead, and when, after a few minutes, I would start up, broad awake, as my mustang stumbled over broken ground. Once—it was while 'Demus Blake was still with me—I had a long and most delicious period of slumber, uninterrupted by jerks or concussions; and when I awoke quite a new man, and revived to an extent at which I now wonder, I found myself supported by the strong patient arm of my conductor, who had been galloping by my side for miles, managing both bridles with his disengaged hand. "I thought it would fresh you up, Colonel!" said the brave fellow.

Not all my mentors throughout that phantom ride across prairieland were as frank as Blake, nor as merry as Shem. But the mail-bag riders turned out good fellows in all main points, and I can safely say that I found but two or three surly or ill-natured persons among all those who garrisoned the block-houses; while fortunately it fell to my lot on no occasion to be accompanied by one of these. In the prairie, as in the world at large, I found good-feeling the rule, cynicism or malice the exception, though I am bound to say that the ill-conditioned individuals made twice as much noise and stir as their more amiable mates. The first start had been difficult, but at each succeeding station I received my remount without much delay or parley. The "privilege of the post" was conceded to me, while I was always welcome to a share of the rations in each little community. On the whole, I found the men cheerful in their strange isolation. They were liberally paid and not ill-fed, and they looked forward to a pension in the event of becoming crippled by some Indian hatchet-stroke or arrow-shot. Planted in the wilderness, with the prospect of being presently encompassed by deep drifts of snow, over whose frozen surface the wolves would come to howl and scratch at their doors, like dogs seeking admittance, they were in fair spirits and undismayed. Their habitual talk was of the wild adventures that formed the everyday life of that frontier of Christendom; of Indian stratagems and cruelty, of panthers and "grizzlies," pronghorns and buffaloes. Several of them had consorted familiarly with the painted tribes of the desert, and spoke sundry Indian dialects as fluently as their mother tongue. I found these hardy men kind hosts enough; they would hush their talk, not to disturb me as I lay down on a heap of skins and blankets to sleep, while the guide saddled the horses: and they soon ceased to ridicule my apparently capricious refusal of whisky. "Mebbe the Colonel's right"—Colonel is the Western title of courtesy—they would say in their blunt politeness. Once I found the inmates of a station, built on swampy ground, quite helpless and prostrate with fever. The fever had abated when the healthy norther began to blow, but the poor fellows were cramped with pains and very feeble, and only one of the party could crawl about to cook and feed the fire. I had need to fix my mind on the reward of success, on the distant goal glittering far ahead, for it was no light task that I had undertaken. The thought of Emma nerved me, and I felt an Englishman's dogged resolve to win, to fight on, and to break sooner than bend. But the fatigues of that journey surpassed all my conceptions. By day and night, under a glaring sun or through the frost and cutting northerly winds, on we pressed, fording streams, threading the way through marshes, stumbling among the burrows of prairie dogs, or dashing across boundless plains. I almost learned to hate the long terraces of turf, the illimitable sweeps of dark-green surface, the blue horizons, the swells of gently sloping earth, smooth enough for the passage of wheeled carriages. On we went, till the long grass, mixed with flowers and wild tufts of the flax-cotton, gave place to a shorter and crisper herbage, the true "buffalo grass" that the bisons love; or till water became scarce, and the sage plant replaced the blossomed shrubs of the west, and the springs were brackish, and here and there our horses' hoofs went cranching over a white stretch of desert, strewn with crystals of salt that glittered in the sun. We saw little of Indians, and of game still less. The latter, my guides told me, had been chiefly scared away by the constant passage of emigrants. As for the savages, we sometimes saw the plumed heads, the tapering lances, and the fluttering robes of a troop of wild horsemen against the crimson sky of evening; but they offered us no molestation, and the riders said they were Utahs on the look-out for "buffler droves" returning from the south. Of the fatigue of that interminable ride, the aching joints, the stiffened sinews, the pains that racked my overstrained muscles, I can give no just idea. Still less can I convey any sense of the continual strain upon the intellect and the perceptive faculties, or how my brain grew as weary as my limbs.

I shall never forget the evening of my arrival in Salt Lake City, the capital of Utah Territory, and New Jerusalem of the Mormons. I had been encouraged by the guides to look upon this town in the deserts as a turning-point in the journey, beyond which I should be in less peril from Indians, and after which a comparatively short ride would carry me to more civilized regions. But, to my surprise, I found the inmates of the station at Salt Lake City quite as lonely as, and more suspicious and moody than, in the far-off posts among the prairies. They were Gentiles in the midst of a fanatic population, wholly swayed by the hierarchy of that strange creed whose standard had been set up in the lawless wastes of the West. Nor was it long before I heard the cause of their dark looks and low spirits.

"Where's Josh Hudson?" asked the rider who had come with me, when the first greetings had been exchanged.

"Who knows?" answered the man addressed; "I don't. Seth said he went to the town, while I were in the corral with the hosses. If so, all I can say is, he never come back."

"When was that, Seth?" asked the newly-arrived rider.

"Two days agone," answered Seth, as he scraped the surface of a half-exhausted quid of tobacco with his long sharp bowie-knife, "jest afore sundown."

"He's not desarted. Josh was too honorable to make tracks that way," said the rider, confidently.

"Desarted! Not he. But that's what'll have to be put in the report—leastways, missin'," said Seth.

The rider looked Seth in the face, and drew his forefinger, with a meaning look, slowly across his own throat. Seth nodded.

"Least said, safest," said Seth, looking dubiously at me.

"Colonel's safe. You may speak afore him, same as myself, boys!" cried the mail-bag rider, who had come with me; "do ye mean them bloodthirsty Mormons—?"

"Whist, Jem! Whew! You'll get all our throats cut," cried the oldest man, starting up in great alarm; "there may be one of the brutes within ear-shot." He looked through the window, and opened the door, to satisfy himself that no eaves-droppers were near.

"I forgot," apologized Jem; "but about Josh Hudson?"

"I'm afeard," answered Seth, in a voice dropped almost to a whisper, "that he's gone for good. Josh was troubled about his sister, Nell Hudson, that jined the Mormons last winter, up in Illinoy, and was coaxed off, and is here, somewhere."

"Ah," said the listener, "I heerd as much."

"It's my belief," continued Seth, "that Josh got on this station a purpose to seek the gal out, and get her to go home to the old folks and the Church she were bred in. Mormons won't stand that."

"Ah!" said the guide Jem again.

"So, in short, Seth and me some think, we do," said the oldest of the group, "that Josh has been at his scoutin' onst too often, and met 'shanpip.'"

"Shanpip!" I repeated; "what is that?"

The man eyed me curiously. "Never heerd of 'Shanpip Brethren,' then, harn't ye, mister? So much the best for you. P'raps you've heerd tell of Danites?"

I had heard, vaguely and obscurely, of that spiritual police of Mormondom, of those fierce zealots who obey their Prophet blindly.

"Then you have reason to fear that your comrade is—"

"Is lyin' under the salt mud of one o' them briny pools nigh to hand," interrupted the man, "and not alone, nouther. Theer's been a many missin', that never went back to settlements nor on to Californey. And theer they'll lie hid, I reckon, till the Day of Judgment, when Great Salt Lake shall give up its dead, like the rest of the airth and waters."

I asked if an appeal could not be made to the Mormon elders themselves?

"'Twouldn't answer, Colonel. Suppose I goes to-morrow to Brigham's own house, or Kimball's, or any of their big men—elders, or angels, or high-priests, or what not—and asks after Josh Hudson. Brigham's very mealy-mouthed, afraid the man's run away; what could be expected from a benighted Gentile, and that; gives his own account of it in preachment next Sabbath. P'raps one of 'em gives me a glass of wine or a julep, and mebbe it disagrees with me, and I die of it. You may stare, but didn't the States Treasurer die that way, arter takin' refreshment at Angel Badger's house? And a pretty angel he be. P'raps I don't drink under a Mormon roof, and then, mebbe, I walk home late, and lose my way, or some other accident happens me—true as death, mister, on'y last week, as I passed Big Lick, I saw a dead woman's face looking up at me, all white and still, at bottom of the salt pool."

Thus far the elder man had spoken, but now Seth, who had evinced great uneasiness, jumped up with an oath, and cautiously opened the door. No one was listening.

"Tell'ee what," said Seth, "we'd best keep this discoorse close till we're outside the territory. They're that sharp, Mormons, blessed if I don't think they're all ear. And if they get's a notion what we're sayin', the Colonel won't never see New York, and I sha'n't never happen home to Montgomery agin. Indian Walker and his pesky Utahs mostly got a knack of tomahawking them as Mormons don't much like. And mebbe we'd meet other Indians, with blankets and red paint on their faces, jest like the real Utahs, and pretty sharp knives in their belts."

"Seth's right," said my former guide; "we don't want to set up any chaps to paint Injun on our account, as Angel Brown and Young Harris and the Danites did, when Martha Styles and Rachel Willis chose to go home to Illinoy—so, Colonel, you get a snooze, and Seth, you needn't hurry about saddlin'—we've rode awful quick."

I was not sorry when day-dawn found me, after a hard gallop by moonlight, approaching the confines of the Mormon territory. The rest of the journey was unmarked by adventure. Hardships there were, but no great perils. We traversed a route on which the bleached bones of many horses and mules lay white and ghastly, and on which many a low turfen mound marked the last resting-place of an emigrant, or his wife or child, never to reach the Promised Land of Hope.

But provisions were more plentiful now, and water more regularly stored and easy of access, than when the expelled Mormons made their famous march across the desert, marking the untrodden route with graves. We narrowly escaped being smothered in the snow, in passing the outlet in the Rocky Mountains, and this was our last semblance of peril.

Previous to this, it had been my sad duty to tell old Amos Grindrod, whom I found at the Round Pond Station, of his son's death, and to commit to his care the bit of ensanguined ribbon that was to be returned to poor Shem's sweet-heart. The old man tried to bear the tidings with the stoicism of those Indians among whom he had passed much of his life, and expressed great pleasure at hearing that Shem had "died like a Kentucky man, clear grit," and that I had come up in time to save his scalp. But in a few minutes nature conquered. The old man's bronzed features worked and twitched, and tears trickled from his aged eyes as he sobbed out, "Shem! dear boy Shem! 'twas I that oughter be dead, not he."

At last the weary ride was over: we had passed outlying farms guarded by a strong stockade, then the farms grew thicker and the stockades were dispensed with, and at last the roofs of a village, called by courtesy a town, came in view. Gladly did I dismount, gladly did I shake the hard hand of the last rider of the Express Company! Leaving that honest fellow puzzling over the cabalistic flourishes of a ten-dollar note I presented to him, I hired a pair-horse wagon of light build, and set off at once. The wagon bore me on until I exchanged it for a coach, the coach did me the same good office until I heard the snort of the steam-horse, and took my ticket by railway. How delicious, how snug and luxurious was such a mode of travel, after so much hard saddle-work! Corduroy roads seemed smooth, and American railroads not in the least addicted to cause the trains to jerk or rock. The gliding motion was charming, and I made amends for lost time, by sleeping in a manner which provoked more than one fellow-traveler, eager to know my business and station in life.

I had already telegraphed to New York briefly thus:

"Has the California mail, via Panama, arrived?"

Briefer still was the answer:

"No."

That was right, so far. My toil was not yet purposeless. I might hope to be in New York before Dr., or Colonel, Joram Heckler. The victory, to be sure, was not yet won. The valuable papers remained in the scoundrel's keeping. But my presence in New York would be unsuspected by him, and any overt act on my part would have the effect of a surprise. I was too exhausted to devote myself to spinning air-drawn schemes for outwitting the intriguer. I should have need of all my faculties when the tug of war began, and I must sleep now. Sleep I did, over miles and miles, over leagues and leagues, of the iron way: resting obstinately, and being as passive as possible.

"Massa get out? Dis New York, Sare."

Some one was shaking me by the arm: some one else held a lantern to my face. A black man and a white. The conductor and a negro porter.

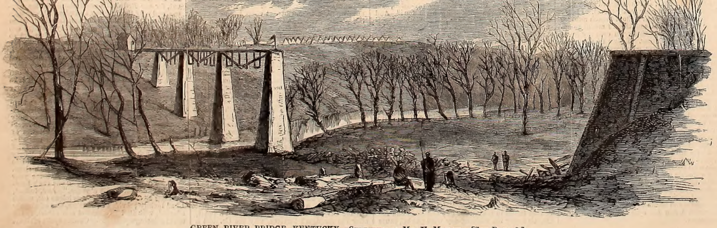
"I'm going to the Metropolitan Hotel. I want a hack: no luggage. Has the Californian mail arrived?"

"Yes, it has," said a news-vender, who stood by, with a heap of journals under his arm; "got all the news here. Herald, Tribune, Times. Which will you have?"

I bought one of the papers, and glanced at the list of arrivals via Panama. So much gold dust, so much bullion, distinguished European traveler, Postmaster-general, Signora Cantatini, Colonels Tom, Heckler, etc. The driver of the hack-carriage was an Irishman, as usual, and, luckily, not a new arrival. He readily conducted me (at that late hour all other stores and shops were closed) to the emporium of a Jew dealer in ready-made clothes, who was willing to turn a cent even at irregular time. I purchased a new suit, linen, a portmanteau, and so forth, and shaved off my stubbly beard with razors supplied by the Jew, and before the Jew's private looking-glass. My driver drove quite a trim, ordinary-looking gentleman to the Metropolitan Hotel, instead of the shaggy, flannel-shirted Californian who had first engaged him.

Before I engaged a room I civilly asked the book-keeper to let me look at the addresses of guests: I was expecting my brother, I said, from Albany. I took good care to say nothing of Heckler or California, and the book-keeper had no suspicion that my voyages had commenced at any more remote spot than Philadelphia or Baltimore. Yes—Heckler's name was down.

I had guessed he would put up at the Metropolitan, for I had heard him mention the house approvingly in conversation. I hung about the bar and the staircases until I happened to hear that he had gone to bed. Then I withdrew to think over my own plan of operations. I own I was puzzled. I tossed and tumbled uneasily on my pillow. While hurrying onward it had appeared as if I had but to arrive in time, and the difficulty was at an end; but now, what was I to do? The battle had yet to be fought. What should I do? In the morning, no doubt, Heckler would repair to the bank, to present the forged check, if not to get the bills discounted. I must stop him. But how? Should I go to the police, and return with the police myrmidons? Not to be thought of! Scandal, exposure, must follow such a step; nay, in the eyes of the law Heckler might seem an innocent man, and I a false accuser. I next thought of confronting him boldly, and forcing from him, with a pistol at his head, if need be, the property of the firm. But this was too Quixotic a proceeding to be adopted in a first-rate hotel in New York. I was at my wit's end.



Heavens! What a smell of burning, and how stifling and thick the air! Smoke! The house is on fire. Up I sprang, and flung on my clothes in hot haste. "It's an ill wind that blows no one any good." I thought of Joram Heckler as I rang my bell to alarm the people.

"Fire! fire!" The awful cry broke upon the ears of the sleepers like the trump of doom. Dark clouds of volleying smoke poured along the corridors, flecked here and there by thin ribbons of flame that licked the walls and floors like the tongues of fiery serpents. Shrieks were heard: doors were burst open; men, women, children, rushed out, half-dressed and screaming. There was panic, terror, and wild confusion. The fire gained ground, the smoke was blindingly thick, and all fled before it—all but myself. I steadily groped my way toward Joram Heckler's room. I knew the number, and where to find it. I knew that I risked my life, but the stake was worth winning at such a risk. I was very nearly suffocated as I pushed on, holding by the wall, into the thickest of the smoke. Some man, half-dressed, and winged by fear, came rushing by with extended arms, and nearly overturned me. He uttered a savage oath; the red glare of the fire fell on his face; it was Joram Heckler.

He did not recognize me, but dashed on, only mindful of his danger. Had he the papers with him? I thought not. I hoped not. That was his room then, the door of which was ajar, and into which the smoke was rolling. Not the smoke alone; I saw a thin red tongue of fire creeping in over the floor, beside the wainscot. I dashed in. My eyes smarted with the smoke, and I gasped for breath, but smoke and fire could not turn me now. Heckler's clothes and dressing-case were as he had laid them; the latter was open: no papers! His valise, too, lay open: no papers! I struck my forehead despairingly. He had them about him then! I was risking life idly. Emma was lost to me! The smoke choked me: the intolerably hot fire had gained the bed: valance and curtains were flaring high in a tall yellow pillar of flame. The subtle tongues of flame almost touched my feet. I must fly if I would not perish. Outside I heard the noise of the engines and the cheers of the mob, and then the dash of water, as prodigious efforts were made to extinguish the fire.

I was staggering away when I saw, peeping from under the bolster of the bed, a Russia-leather pocket-book. The rascal had forgotten it in his blind terror. The blazing curtains fell in fragments upon me, and my hands were a good deal scorched, but I rescued the precious prize. I tore it open. Yes, check and bills, all were there! Thrusting it into my breast-pocket, I left the room, and struggled as I best could down the passage. Dash after dash of water, flung from hand-buckets, had partially subdued the flames, and the firemen were gaining the victory. Half smothered, singed, blackened, but with a proudly-beating heart, I forced my way down the heated and crowded staircase—reached the outer air, and fainted.

I have little more to tell. I am a partner in the firm: Emma is my wife; her brother recovered from his illness, and is now, in another land, an altered and penitent man. The house of Spalding, Hausermann, and Co. (I am Co.) have granted a pension to the poor girl who was to have been the bride of the luckless Shem Grindrod. Of Heckler we heard no more.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER LV.

It seemed incredible that Lilian could go far without being observed. I soon received proof she had not gone away by the railway—by any public conveyance—had hired no carriage; she must, therefore, be still in the town, or have left it on foot. The greater part of the day was consumed in unsuccessful inquiries, and I hoped that she would return; meanwhile, the alarm of her disappearance had spread; how could matters fail to do so?

An acquaintance of mine met me under the archway of Monks' Gate. He wrung my hand, and looked at me with great compassion.

"I fear," said he, "that we were all deceived in that young Margrave. He seemed so well conducted, in spite of his lively manners. But—"

"But what?"

"Mrs. Ashleigh was, perhaps, imprudent to admit him into her house so familiarly. He was certainly very handsome. Young ladies will be romantic."

"How dare you, Sir!" I cried, choked with rage. "And without any coloring to so calumnious a suggestion! Margrave has not been in the town for many days. No one knows even where he is."

"Oh yes, it is known where he is. He wrote to order the effects which he had left here to be sent to Penrith."

"When?"

"Mr. Ashleigh was, perhaps, imprudent to admit him into her house so familiarly. He was certainly very handsome. Young ladies will be romantic."

"Oh yes, it is known where he is. He wrote to order the effects which he had left here to be sent to Penrith."

"When?"

"The letter arrived the day before yesterday. I happened to be calling at the house where he last lodged when at L——, the house opposite Mrs. Ashleigh's garden. No doubt the servant in both houses gossip with each other. Mrs. Ashleigh's maid shared in the folly of Mr. Margrave's address from her maid; and since servants will exchange gossip, they may also converse on other topics, you know, as your friend."

"Not from the moment you breathe a word against my betrothed wife," said I, fiercely.

I wrenched myself from the clasp of the man's hand, and left him to gaze still in my track. I mounted my horse: I rode into the adjoining suburbs, the neighboring villages; there was not, ever, I learned nothing till just as nightfall. In a hamlet, about ten miles from L——, a laborer declared that a young lady answering to the description I described, who passed by him in a path through the fields a little before noon; that he was surprised to see one so young, so well dressed, and a stranger to the neighborhood (for he knew by sight the ladies of the few houses scattered around) walking alone; that as he stepped out of the path to make way for her, he looked hard into her face, and she did not heed him—seemed to gaze, right before, into space. If her expression had been less quiet and grave, he should have thought, he could scarcely say why, that she was not quite right in her mind—there was a strange uncommon look in her eyes, as if she were walking in her sleep. Her pace was very steady—neither quick nor slow. He had watched her till she passed out of sight, amidst a copse through which the path wound its way to a village at some distance.

I followed up this clew. I arrived at the village to which my informant directed me, but might had no trace. Most of the houses were closed, so I could glean no further information from the cottages or at the inn. The only person I encountered was the district lived in the village, and to him I gave instructions which I had not given, and indeed would have been unwise even to give, to the police at L——. He was intelligent and kindly; he promised to communicate at once with the different police-stations for miles round, and with all delicacy and privacy. It was not probable that Lilian could have wandered in one day much farther than the place at which I then was; it was scarcely to be conceived that she could walk any great way in the practical skill of the police. I rested but a few hours at a small public-house, and was on horseback again at dawn. A little after sunrise I again heard of the wanderer. At a lonely cottage by a brick-kiln, in the midst of a wide common, she had stopped the previous evening, and asked for a draught of milk. The woman who gave it to her inquired if she had lost her way? She said "No," and only tarrying a few minutes, had gone across the common; and the woman supposed she was a visitor at a gentleman's house which was at the further end of the waste, for the path she took led to no town or village. It occurred to me then that Lilian travelled all night—all places, perhaps, in the neighborhood, where men congregated together. But where could she have passed the night? Not to forget the render with the fruitless result of frequent inquiries, I will but say that at the end of the second day I had ascertained with unerring that I was still on her track; and though I had had ridden to and fro nearly double the distance —coming back again by places I had left far to the—it was at the distance of forty miles from L—— that I had heard of her that second day. She had been seen sitting alone by a little brook only an hour before. I was led to the very spot by a woodman—it was at the hour of twilight when he beheld her—she was leaning her face on her hand, and seemed weary. He spoke to her; she —— out answer, but rose, and resumed her way along the banks of the streamlet. That night I put up at an inn: I followed the course of the brook for miles, then struck into every path that I could conceive her likely to have taken—in vain. Thus I consumed the night on foot, tying my horse to a tree, for it was tired out, and returning to it at sunrise. At noon the third day I again heard of her, and in a remote savage part of the country. The features of the landscape were changed; there was little foliage and little culture, but the ground was broken into mounds and hollows, and covered with patches of heath and stunted brushwood. She had been seen by a shepherd. He had made the same observation as the first who had guided me on her track, she looked to him "like some one walking in her sleep." I pushed on. Night fell. I was among the furze-bushes, I chanced on a knot of ribbon. I recognized the color Lilian habitually wore; I dismounted, and found a shoe. I had no doubt, having the utmost speed I could ascribe to her, she could not be far off. I still held on in the dark. The scene now was as solitary as a desert; I met no one on my way. At length, a little after sunrise, I found myself on the edge of a small town nestled below the cliffs, on which I was guiding my weary horse. I entered the town, and while my horse was baiting went in search of the resident policeman. The information I had received was brief. The policeman had reached him; he had acted on it, but without result. I was surprised to hear him address me by name, and looking at him more closely, I recognized him for the policeman Walby. This young man had always expressed to me a cordial sense of my attendance on his sister, and had, indeed, so natively evinced his gratitude in protecting with his own arm the injuries that terminated in the discovery of Sir Philip Derval's murderer, that his conduct had left on my mind a fine subject of my search. His face immediately became thoughtful. He paused a minute or two, and then said,

"I think I have it, but I do not like to say; I may pain you, Sir."

"No! Say quickly; you pain me by concealment."

The man hesitated still; I encouraged him, and then he spoke out frankly.

"Sir, did you never think it strange that Mr. Margrave could maintain such intimate relations in the hotel to a somewhat uncomfortable lodging, from the window of which he could look down on Mrs. Ashleigh's garden? I have seen him at night in the balcony of that window, and when I myself was passing I have heard Mrs. Ashleigh's house during your unjust detention, I own, Sir, I felt for you—"

"Proceed!" I said; and Margrave went to Mrs. Ashleigh's house as my friend.

"Sir, you will not think it strange that Mr. Margrave could maintain such intimate relations in the hotel to a somewhat uncomfortable lodging, from the window of which he could look down on Mrs. Ashleigh's garden? I have seen him at night in the balcony of that window, and when I myself was passing I have heard Mrs. Ashleigh's house during your unjust detention, I own, Sir, I felt for you—"

"Proceed!" I said; and Margrave went to Mrs. Ashleigh's house as my friend.

He began. What I had to do was to listen.

"Patience, Sir; hear me out. I was sent from L—— to this station (on promotion, Sir) a fortnight since. I found that I had to deal with a good deal of crime hereabout; it is a bad neighborhood, and full of smugglers—some days ago, I received orders to meet a boat which was to bring the owner as a suspicious character, down in my books, I was to watch his motions. If he came out of that house—come out of a private door in it, which belongs to a part of the building not inhabited by the owner, but which was formerly, when the house was a sort of inn, to be let to single rooms, where no questions were put to. I followed him; he went down to the seashore, walked about, singing to himself, then returned to the house, and remained within the same door. I soon learned that he lodged in the house, had lodged there for several days. The next morning a fine yacht arrived in the early convenient creek about a mile from the house, and there remained, the owner sometimes rambling down to this town. The yacht belonged to Mr. Margrave, he had purchased it by advertisement in London. It was fitted for a long voyage. He had directed it to come for him to this out-of-the-way place, where no gentleman's yacht ever put in before, though the creek, or bay, is handy enough for such craft. Well, Sir, I was thinking that a rich young gentleman should come to this unfrequented sea-shore, put up with accommodation that—but it is the wisest kind, in the house of a man known as a desperate smuggler, suspected to be worse? Or, is a yacht to be bought in London, and sent to Orange? But would it be strange if he were waiting for a young lady? And if a young lady were in sight from the house, and has come secretly along by-paths, which must have been very fully explained to her beforehand, and is now near that young gentleman's lodging, if not actually in it—if this be so, why, the affair is not my concern, Sir! And you will also forgive me, Sir?"

"Where is this house? Lead me to it."

"You can hardly get to it except on foot; rough walking, Sir, and about seven miles off by the shortest cut."

"Come, and at once; come, quickly. We must be there before—before—"

"Before the young lady can get to the place. Well, from what you say of the spot in which she has been seen, I think, on reflection, we may easily do that. I am at your service, Sir. But I should warn you that the owners of the house, man and wife, are both of villainous characters—would do any thing for money. Mr. Margrave, Sir, is their guest, his money flows, and if the couple choose to go away with Mr. Margrave, you know, I have no power to help it."

"Enough, all that to me; all look of you is to show me the house."

We were soon out of the town; the night had closed in; it was very dark in spite of a few stars: the path was rugged and precipitous, sometimes skirting the very brink of perilous cliffs; sometimes delving down to the sea-shore between ridges of rock or wave—and painfully rewinding up the ascent.

"It is an ugly path, Sir, but it saves four miles; and any how the road is a bad one."

We came, at last, to a few wretched fishermen's huts. The moon had now risen, and revealed the squalor of poverty-stricken ruinous hovels; a couple of boats moored to the shore; a morning fretful sea; and, at a distance, a vessel, with lights on board, lying perfectly still at anchor in a sheltered curve of the bold rude shore. The policeman pointed to the vessel:

"The yacht, Sir; the wind will be in its favor if it sails to-night."

We quickened our pace as well as the nature of the path would permit, left the huts behind us, and, about a mile farther on, came to a solitary house, larger than from the policeman's description of Margrave's lodging. I should have presupposed: a house that in the wilder parts of Scotland might be almost a laird's: but even in the moonlight it looked very dilapidated and desolate. Most of the windows were closed, some with panes broken, and filled with straw; there were the remains of a wall round the house; it was broken in some parts only its foundation left. I found myself approaching the house I observed two doors, one on the side fronting the sea, one on the other side facing a patch of broken ground that might once have been a garden, and lay waste within the inclosure of the ruined wall, encumbered with various litter —heaps of rubbish, a ruined shed, the carcass of a worn-out boat. This latter door stood wide open—the other was closed. The house was still and dark, as if either deserted or all within retired to rest.

"I think that open door leads at once to the rooms Mr. Margrave hires; he can go in and out without disturbing the other inmates. They used to keep on the side which they inhabit a beer-house, but the magistrates shut it up; still it is a resort for bad characters. Now, Sir, what shall we do?"

We acted separately. You wait within the inclosure of the wall, hid by those heaps of rubbish, near the door; none can enter but what you see them. If you see me, you will accost and stop her, and call aloud for me: I shall be in hearing. I will go back to the high part of the ground yonder, it seems to me that she must pass that way; and I would desire, if possible, to save her from the humiliation, the—the chance of coming within the precincts of that house. I shall hear you if you cry out more than hereafter. It is a great thing for the happiness and honor of this poor young lady and her mother, that I may be able to declare that I did not take her from that man, from any man—from that house, from any house. You comprehend me, and will obey? I speak to you as a confidant—a friend."

"I thank you with my whole heart, Sir, for so doing. You saved my sister's life, and the least I can do is to keep secret all that would give pain to the of blabbed about. I know what mischief folks' tongues can make. I will wait by the door, never fear, and will neither lose my voice nor strain all the legal power I possess to keep the young lady back from sorrow."

This dialogue was interchanged in close hurried whisper behind the broken wall, and out of all hearing. Waby now crept through a wide gap into the herbiness, and nestled himself silently amidst the wreck of the broken boat, not six feet from the open door, and close to the wall of the house itself. I went back some thirty yards up the road, to the rising ground which I had pointed out to him. According to the best calculation I could make—considering the pace at which I had cleared the precipitous rocks, and reckoning from the place and time at which Lilian had been last seen, she could not possibly have yet entered this house—I might presume it would be more than half an hour before she could arrive: I was in hopes during the interval, Margrave might absent himself, perhaps at the door, or from the windows, or I might even by some light from the latter he guided to the room in which to find him. If, after waiting a reasonable time, Lilian should fail to appear, I had formed my own plan of action; but it was important for the success of that plan that I should not lose myself in the strange house, nor bring its owners to Margrave's aid—that I should surprise him alone and unaware. Half an hour, three quarters, a whole hour thus passed—no sign of my poor wanderer; but signs there were of the enemy, from whom I resolved, at whatever risk, to free and to save her. A window on the ground floor to the left of the door, which had long fixed my attention because I had seen light through the chinks of the shutters, slowly unclosed, but remained fast back, the casement opened, and I beheld Margrave distinctly in his bold assembling in his hand that gleamed in the moonlight, directed not toward where I stood nor the path I had taken, but toward an open space beyond the ruined wall, to the right. Hid by a cluster of stunted shrubs, I watched him with a heart that leaped with rage, not with terror. He seemed so intent in his own gaze as to be inattentive or unconscious of what was near him. I crept from my post, and still, under cover sometimes of the broken wall, sometimes of the shaggy ridges that skirted the path, crept on, till I reached the side of the house itself; then, these scares from my eyes, should I in turn them, I stepped over the ruined wall, scarcely two feet high in that place, on—on toward the door. I passed it, kept on within the policeman's intended himself: he was seated, his back against the ribs of the broken boat. I put my hand to his mouth that he might not cry out in surprise, and whispered in his ear: he stirred not. I shook him by the arm; still he stirred not. A ray of the moon fell on his face. I saw that he was in a profound slumber. Persuaded that it was no natural sleep, and that he had become useless to me, I passed him by. I was at the threshold of the open door; the light from the window close by falling on the ground; I was in the passage; a glimmer came through the chinks of a door to the left; I turned the door, half-noiselessly, and the next moment Margrave was locked in my grasp.

"Call out," I hissed into his ear, "and I strangle you before any one can come to your help!"

He did not call out; his eye, fixed on mine as he writhed round, saw, perhaps, his peril if he did. His countenance lowered fear, but as a lightened my grasp that expression gave way to one of wrath and fierceness; and he, in turn, I felt the gripe of his hand, I knew that the struggle between us would be that of two strong men, each equally bent on the mastery of the other.

I was, as I have said before, endowed with an unusual degree of physical power, disciplined, in early youth, by athletic exercise and contest. In height and in muscle I had greatly the advantage over my antagonist, but such was the nervous vigor, the elastic energy of his incomparable frame, in which sinews seemed springs of steel, that had our encounter been one in which my strength, was less heightened by rage, I believe that I could no more have coped with him than the baron can cope with the bear; but I was animated by that passion which trebles for a time all our forces—which makes even the weak man a match for the strong. I felt that if I were worsted, disabled, stricken down, Lilian might be lost in losing her sole protector, on the other hand, Margrave had been taken at the disadvantage of that surprise which will half unnerve the bravest of the wild beasts; while as we grappled, reeling and rocked to and fro in our struggle, I soon observed that his attention was distracted—that his eye was turned toward an object which he had dropped involuntarily when I first seized him. He sought to drag me toward that object, and when near it, stooped to seize. It was a bright, slender, short wand of steel.

"IN A DELL AMONG THE FURZE-BUSHES, I CHANCED ON A KNOT OF RIBBON."

remembered when and where I had seen it, wheth-er in my waking state or in vision, and as his hand stole down to take it from the floor I set on with open eyes foot. I can not tell by what rapid process of thought and association I came to the belief that the possession of a little piece of blunted steel would decide the conflict in favor of the possessor, but the struggle now was concentred on the attainment of that seemingly idle weapon. I was becoming breathless and exhausted, while Margrave seemed every moment to gather up new force, when, collecting all my strength for one final effort, I lifted him bodily high in the air, and hurled him to the farthest end of the cramped arena to which our contest was confined. He fell with such a force, by which most men would have been stunned; but he recovered himself with a quick rebound, and, as he stood facing me, with his quivering grand as well as terrible in his aspect. His eyes literally flamed, as those of a tiger's; his iron hair, flung back from his knotted forehead, seemed to erect itself as an angry mane; his lips, slightly parted, showed the glitter of his teeth; his whole frame seemed larger in the tension of the muscles, and as gradually relaxing his first defying and haughty attitude, he crouched as the panther crouches for its deadly spring. I felt as if it were a wild beast whose rage was upon me—a wild beast, but still Man, the king of the animals, fashioned forth from no mixture of humbler races by slow revolutions of time, but his royalty stamped on his form when the earth became fit for his coming."

At that moment I stumbled over the weapon I rected it toward him, and, advancing with a fearless stride, cried,

"Now try if you feel, miserable sorcerer!"

To my own amaze, the effect was instantaneous. My vengeful antagonist sprang on the floor as a dog drops at the word of his master. The muscles of his frowning countenance relaxed, the glare of his mortified eyes grew dim, and, turning his limbs lay prostrate and unnerved, his head resting against the wall, his shoulders still drooping by his side. I approached him slowly and cautiously; he seemed cast into a profound slumber.

"You are at my mercy now!" said I.

He moved his head as a sign of deperating submission.

"You hear and understand me? Speak!"

His lips trembled forth "Yes."

"I command you to answer truly the questions I shall address to you."

"I must, while yet outside of the power that has passed to your hand."

"Is it by some occult magnetic property in this wand that you have exercised so demoniac an influence over a creature so pure as Lilian Ashleigh?"

"By that wand and by other arts which you could not comprehend."

"And for what infamous object?—her seduction, her dishonor?"

No! I sought in her the aid of a gift which would cease did she cease to be pure. At first I but cast my influence upon her that through her I might influence yourself. She decided your help to discover a secret. Circumstances steeled your mind against me. I could no longer hope that you would voluntarily lend yourself to my will. Meanwhile, I had found in her the light of a fatal knowledge that, in that of conscience, through that knowledge, duly heeded and cultivated, I hoped to divine what I can not of myself discover. Therefore I deepened over her mind the spells I command—therefore I have driven her hither as the loadstone draws into its steel, and therefore I would have borne her with me to the shows to which I was about this night to visit. I had spent the morning in her house, and all around it, into slumber that none might witness her departure; but I not done so, I should have summoned others to my aid, in spite of your threat."

"And would Lilian Ashleigh have passively accompanied you, to her own irretrievable disgrace?"

"She could not have helped it; she would have been unconscious of her acts; she was, and is, in a trance; nor, had she gone with me, would she have waked from that state while she lived; that would not have been long."

"Wretch! and for what object of unhallowed curiosity do you exert an influence which condemns its victim to the grave?"

"Not curiosity, but the instinct of self-preservation. I count on no life beyond the grave. I would deal the grave, not death, to her."

"And was it to lesen, through some ghostly agencies, the secret of renewing existence that you lured me by the shadow of your arm image on the night when we met last?"

The voice of Margrave here became very faint as he answered me, and his countenance began to exhibit the signs of an exhaustion almost mortal.

"Be quick," he murmured, "or I die. The fluid which emanates from that wand in the hand of one who exercises the fluid with his own hatred and rage will prove fatal to my life. Lower the wand from my forehead; low—low—lower still!"

"What was the nature of that rite in which you constrained me to share?"

"I can not say. You are killing me. Enough that you were saved from a participation in the apparition of the protecting image vouchsafed to your eye, otherwise you would—you would—Oh, release me! Away! away!"

The foam gathered to his lips; his limbs became fearfully convulsed.

"One question more: Where is Lilian at this moment? Answer that question, and I depart."

He raised his head, made a visible effort to rally his strength, and gasped out,

"Yonder. Pass through the open space up the cliff beside a thorn-tree—you will find her there, where she halted when the wand dropped from my hand. But—but—hasten! This fit will serve me yet, and through her! They said so that night, though you heard them not. Thro' and it!" Here his voice became dumb-like; he pressed his hand on his heart, and shrieked out, "Away! away! or you are murderer!"

I retired to the other end of the room, turning the wand from him, and when I gained the door, looked back. I perceived he had ceased, but he seemed locked in a profound swoon. I left the room—the house—passed by Wing's; he was still absorbed in his task. I said, and touched him with the wand. He started up at once, rubbed his eyes, and commenced his excuses. I checked them, and bade him follow me. I took the way up the open ground toward which Margrave had pointed the wand, and there, motionless, beside a gnarled fantastic thorn-tree, stood Lilian. Her arms were folded across her breast; her face, seen by the moonlight, looked so innocent and so infantine that I needed no other evidence to tell me that unconscious she was of the peril to which her step had been drawn. I took her gently by the hand.

"Come with me," I said in a whisper; and she obeyed me silently, and with a placid smile.

Roughly through the way, and unconscious of fatigue. I placed her arm in mine, but she did not lean on it. We got back to the town. A chair was waiting for me, and a pair of horses. At morning Lilian was under her mother's roof. About the middle of the next twilight I found the woman rapidly worse, and to all appearance, in imminent danger. Between six & 7 watched beside her night and day, supported by an inward conviction of her recovery, but tortured by the sight of her sufferings. On the third day a change for the better became visible, her sleep was calm, her breathing regular.

Shortly afterward she woke, out of danger. Her eyes fell at once on me, with all their old languish of tenderness.

"Oh, Allen, beloved, have I not been very ill? But I am almost well now. Do not weep; I shall live to—to—repay your sake." And she bent forward, drawing my hand from my streaming eyes, and kissing me with a child's guileless kiss on my burning forehead.

IMPORTANT FACTS.—Constant writing for six months is done cheaper with Gold Pens than with Steel Pens; therefore, if you write much, buy a Gold Pen.

The Gold Pen remains unchanged by years of continued use, while the Steel Pen is ever changing by corrosion and wear; therefore, perfect uniformity of writing is obtained by the use of the Gold Pen.

The Gold Pen is always ready and reliable, while the Steel Pen must be often condemned and a new one elected; therefore, there is great saving of time in the use of the Gold Pen.

Gold is capable of receiving any degree of elasticity, so that the Gold Pen is exactly adapted to the hand of the writer; therefore, the nerves of the hand are not at all injured, as is known to be the case by the use of Steel Pens.

The Christmas Gift.

ON Christmas had come, with his bright, merry face,
And bracing airs joyous and keen,
And while the gay holiday folks at each place,
Selecting their gifts, might be seen,
An old man wilted on, at a very brisk pace,
In search of a SEWING-MACHINE.

Perplexed he appeared—nay, bewildered in mind—
Amid all the vast moving scene,
Unable to meet with precisely the kind
Of thing he was seeking, I ween;
Indeed, it is not quite so easy to find
A really good SEWING-MACHINE.

For hours he posed up and down all Broadway,
With puzzled and sorrowful mien;
For all his researches, throughout the long day,
Entirely fruitless had been,
Till Fortune benignantly threw him in way
Of FISKLE AND LYON'S MACHINE.

"Ah, here!"—he exclaimed, as a happy smile graced
His features so bland and serene—
"Ah! here I have managed to find out, at last,
The very MACHINE that I mean:
Yes, yes—I forgotten the muse in my haste—
'TWAS FISKLE AND LYON'S MACHINE!

"Was ever invention like this 'neath the sun!
"What movements!—how rapid and clean!"
As he on his elbows did lean,
Behinding what wonderful things can be done
By FISKLE AND LYON'S MACHINE.

His choice of a gift was no longer delayed;
(And here his great wisdom was seen)—
That Christmas his daughter—a blooming young maid—
Was rendered as proud as a queen;
Next morn, when he rose, in her bosom there laid
A FISKLE AND LYON'S MACHINE!

THE SURRENDER OF THE TRAITORS.

THE traitor Mason, Slidell, Eustis, and Macfarland have been surrendered to the British Government. The country was prepared for the event, and gulps the bitter pill in silence. Mr. SECRETARY SEWARD has written a rather ingenious and extremely long justification of the act. It is to be hoped that it will so far help him abroad that British journalists will cease to represent him as the sworn foe of England and of peace.

Every body here knew a week ago that the traitors would be given up. Not because of any technical informalities in their arrest, but because it was infinitely better that we should endure a certain amount of humiliation at the hands of Great Britain than that we should jeopard the great cause of the Union by throwing the naval power of England into the rebel scale. The main point thus determined, it devolved upon Mr. SEWARD to decide the form and conditions of our compliance with the demand of Great Britain.

He might have said that the arrest of the traitors was right and proper, and that detention legal; but that, in the present circumstances, the country was not in a condition to go to war with England while the much more momentous question of the dissolution of the Union was being discussed in the battle-field, and therefore that Mason and Slidell were surrendered for the sake of peace.

Or he might have said that, while the general spirit of international law justified the arrest, no perfectly parallel case had ever occurred, and therefore a doubt existed as to the completed lawfulness of Captain Wilkes's act; and that as peace with Great Britain was at the present juncture absolutely necessary to this country, he would give England the benefit of the doubt, and would release the prisoners to please her and to appease the British mob.

Or he might have argued the case from a legal point of view, setting in bold relief the arguments of the British side, and concluding with him: the strong points of our case; and might thus have concluded, in the teeth of the expressed view of Secretary WELLES, and the sentiment of nine-tenths of the people of the United States, that the arrest was unjustifiable, the British claim reasonable, and our duty imperative.

Of those three courses the two first would here completely satisfied the people of the United States, and would not have lowered the fame of the Secretary. Whether the third will prove as satisfactory as the others to the great mass of our people is a question which it will take time to decide.

Mr. THURLOW'S dispatch, darkly hinting that France would be found on the side of Great Britain in the event of difficulty in this country, confirms the opinion we have had occasion to express more than once—that we have no real friends on the other side of the ocean. The logic of the French Minister is not worth examination. His strong point is that the Trent was sailing from one neutral point to another; a perfectly immaterial circumstance, in view of the fact that she carried dispatches and officers of the rebel Government. Mr. SEWARD Scout always held that the immediate point of departure and the direct destination were infinitesimal if the goods contraband of war actually came from belligerent ports, or were ultimately destined for belligerent uses. The practice, known to be learned from Mr. THURLOW himself, is that France will not be on our side in the event of trouble between England and ourselves. Mr. SEWARD's smooth manner must not delude nay one into imagining that our Government places the least reliance upon the benefactions flowing existing between our country and France; but that it relies, as it should do, on our own strength for the regulation of our own affairs.

It is to be hoped, at all events, that this extremely disagreeable business will secure the end proposed by so much Commission—namely, that we may be suffered to conclude the job of crushing out the rebellion without further foreign interference. At the present moment a piratical steamer—the Nashville—belonging to the rebels, half filled with the plunder of the American ship HARRY Bird, which she has sunk within sight of the British coast, is refitting in the harbor of Southampton: the British steamer Gladiator, filled with arms and munitions for the rebels, is lying in the British port of NASSAU, and has been supplied with coals to enable her to run into Savannah at any favorable moment, while the authorities of NASSAU refuse coals to our gun-boat, the Florida, which is watching for her: rebel British steamers are notoriously fitting out in England with like cargoes for the rebels; and British officials all over, from the Governor of Canada to the Governor of Havana, give palpable evidence on their sympathy with the rebels. It is to be hoped that this measure of unfriendliness and spite may suffice. We do trust that the British may be satisfied with equipping pirates to prey upon our commerce, and encouraging them with their plunder; with converting British ports into harbors of safety for our enemy's ships, and refusing to sell coal to our vessels; with permitting their officials to receive with honor and respect the emissaries of the rebels, and to visit with their high displeasure any British subject who shows a friendly spirit toward this country. As we have treaties of alliance with England, the members of the British Government are constantly receiving one of their high regard for us, perhaps these injuries may also be forgotten by the United States and for democracy. It is to be hoped, after the surrender of MASON and SLIDELL that they will.

SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

On 28th December the New York City Banks suspended specie payments. Their example will be followed by the Banks of Philadelphia and Boston, and by the Government of the United States.

The suspension is a consequence of the war. It has been evident for some time that the Government could not borrow money fast enough to defray the cost of so enormous a war as the one in which we are now engaged, and that a resort to issues of inconvertible paper money was inevitable. That resolved itself into the suspension of the Banks indispensable. They could not go on paying specie while the Government was issuing its paper by the million and a half a day, and declining to redeem it in coin. And it has been doubted whether the Banks would not have acted a more wisdom had they foreseen the crisis a month ago, and suspended with forty millions of coin on hand, than to have waited as they have done, until nearly half their reserve has been withdrawn from them.

The last time the Banks suspended, the danger which rendered suspension necessary was a drain of gold to Europe. No such danger exists to-day. The balance of trade is now in favor, and we are more likely to draw gold from Europe than Europe from us.

The suspension is necessary now in order to "ride over" the period intervening between the present time and the entire suppression of the rebellion, and then to take up the specie which out the paper money which shall have been emitted by Government will then be funded or redeemed out of the direct taxation of Government. There will then be no reason why the banks should not resume specie payments at once, and they will of course do so.

The extent of the changes which may take place between this and then must depend on the duration of the war, and the economy with which it is carried on.

If Congress passes tax laws sufficient to insure an ample fund for the due payment of interest upon the entire debt incurred for the suppression of the rebellion; and if Mr. Chase succeeds in the effort of sufficiently aiding financial administration, the new paper money to be issued by Government need not depreciate below one or two per cent., and gold need not rise above one or two per cent. premium. There can be no scarcity in this country better than that of the United States, with their growing wealth and resources, the whole of which are pledged for the redemption of this paper. Even if the immediate expenses of it were not paid the year 1862—which is more than can be needed without great extravagance somewhere—our debt at the end of the year will only be one-fourth that of Great Britain, and our means of payment fully equal, if not superior to hers.

Meanwhile let us trust that Government and our Generals will strain every nerve to accomplish the work before them without a moment's delay. Time now is precious indeed.

THE LOUNGER.

FOR THE CONTRABANDS.

ONE of the most practical questions of the rebellion is set forth in a recent Report of Dr. Robert WARE to the Sanitary Commission, how, properly to clothe and care for the "contrabands" at Fort Monroe. By the order of General WOOL those who are employed by officers and citizens are paid at the rate of eight dollars a month for men, and four dollars for women, from which sum is deducted enough to pay for proper clothing. Those not thus employed are employed in the service of the Government, and are paid ten dollars a month, with quarters, one ration, and clothing, the expense of the latter being deducted from the ten dollars. The old men and boys are paid five dollars a month, with rations and clothing. There are now fifteen hundred contrabands, of whom two hundred are women. The Government partly supplies their wants from a store with such articles as sugars, sheer, and hat; but furnishes none for women and children, and no under-clothing for any. The quarters are still insufficient, and these people are painfully crowded.

The chief difficulty—master of the post, who was charged with the care of the contrabands, was necessarily entirely occupied with the inevitable duties of an office—and Lieut. R. S. MORE, of Cincinnati, has been appointed chief Superintendent of contrabands, and he appeals to the generosity of all who can dispense with money the certificates of the sugars be sending old or new clothing for women and children, and under-garments for the men. Those who do not choose to send directly to Mr. MORE, at Fortress Monroe, may send to Mr. F. C. BARLOW, in the basement of 112 and 114 Broadway, who has been generously granted for the purpose by the New York Union Insurance Company.

It is one of the many ways in which every one who will may help on the good cause. And it is not only of the humane but the wise to aid in the end. As fast as our flag advances the necessity will be created. Deserted by their masters, or living on a flag which they believe to be the flag of liberty, the responsibility of caring for them is thrown upon us. We shall not have the right to avoid it. We must direct their industry, and we must see that they do not suffer. Our duty is not done when circumstances have freed them. The long arrears of injury to a race are not settled quite so easily. But the duty is manageable now, and it will be our fault if it becomes unmanageable. It is not the fault of the poor contrabands that they are cold and hungry. Let us clothe and feed them; remembering, at this holy tide, that "The King shall answer and say unto them: Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

THE LAST TRUMP IN THE HAND.

THE last trump card of the rebellion has been played. It is the last trump in the hand, the game is up. There were but three trumps in their hands. They were all loaves; and they are proving to be mere Jacks. The first was the negro. The rebel gamesters knew that the country did not sincerely believe in the negro as a political war, and they hoped to succeed before the nation could sufficiently recover from the shock of consternation to make an effective resistance.

The gamblers were mistaken. Their play only revealed to the country the depth and strength of its own resolution.

Then they hoped, and probably believed, that there should arise a desperate party cause in the loyal States; and that war would be made upon the Government by the Democratic party, and not exclusively by a slave-driving faction. But the smoke of Sumter cleared away only to show them their pitiful mistake. So far as the support of their treason was concerned, the great Democratic party in the loyal States had dwindled to such people as Mr. Benjamin Wood and Mr. V. Vallandigham, who thought they could harm their country more by remaining in it and trying to get control of the arm of the Government raised to smite traitors. Mr. Ben. Wood is long since silenced, and Mr. Vallandigham stands desperately by the old and amid the rebellion by an effort to plunge us into war with Great Britain. The people who were so clamorous for "peace" with rebels who were shocking down loyal citizens engaged in defending the liberties of the nation, are now vociferous to force war with England upon a fairly debatable point of international law, in which, if we are wrong, every honorable citizen will frankly confess it.

In this course these gentry are but helping the rebel leaders to play their third and last card—an alliance with England upon any terms, in order that the slave-holding confederacy may be recognized and protected, and that, if possible, this Government may be overthrown. And as this was their last, so it is their wrongest, play. The support of Great Britain has been their fond dream from the beginning. As long ago as the Charleston Convention, at which the first steps of rebellion were taken by YANCEY and his friends in forcing two Democratic nominations, the sympathies of Englishsympathy and assistance were openly discussed in private circles. In DeBow's Review, in which the philosophy and practicability of treason has long been debated—a Review which was precisely commensurate in "national" support—the fact has been constantly assumed that Great Britain would not permit trouble between the Government of this country and itself to arise from the exercise of the "Peace Congress," last February, Slidell and Hunter said, and consequently reiterated, the same thing. The theory was that Great Britain was a monarchy, and its king was cotton.

They have played their last card, and the result is still undecided. But if calmness, and sagacity, and most faithful patriotism and discretion can block the game of rebellion, and discredit treason by bringing this play also to naught, it will be done. And if it be done, of course it results in a clearer understanding than ever between the United States and Great Britain.

Should war then be avoided—should the third and last trump card fail—the reaction in the mind of the rebellious nation will be so signal that the conspiracy will be in great danger of sudden collapse.

MR. SEWARD AND ENGLAND.

A REPORT has been circulated, and at one time was widely believed, that a gentleman said that the Secretary of State wanted a war with Great Britain, in order that we might end the battle of our domestic difficulties by a compromise. The report only got into print, but it was privately received with a good deal of credulity and sympathy. Why a statesman so sagacious—whose great and just fame was forfeited upon a calm and wise adherence to principle—should desire a war having steadfastly maintained them in a day when he was the most unpopular statesman in the country whatsoever desert them at the very moment they had brought him into official power, and wantonly in effect should, was a supposition simply too insulting to be answered.

But the war has dwindled by success to an answer; for in the sense in which that word was used he was not successful, because "success" was the accomplishment of what was desired. To say that he was soured by disappointment was equally inadequate; because, under the circumstances, that word could not be applied, and nobody believed him a traitor. To say that he wanted a separation, in order that he might be the President of the Northern Union; or a compromise, in order that he might be President as the great Pacificator, was to screen the political sagacity of the man never doubted; or his sanity, which relieves him from censure.

But while th's report was circulated at home, the universal faith in England seems to have been that the war was a mistake which Mr. SEWARD was resolved was war with Great Britain. So much a matter of course was this, that the utterly silly and insulting letter of Lord LYONS to Mr. NICOLAY was at first believed to be the result of a deliberate purpose to insult, was gravely cited in the London Chronicle as a fact that carried its own evidence, and that was received in the lavishly empty style.

The precise points upon which this general impression of Mr. SEWARD's views was founded are not easy to indicate. They are probably a speech of two or three years since in the Senate; his remarks at the Astor House last year; his circular to the Governors of the coast States; and his letter to Lord LYONS in regard to the imprisonments of Messrs. MASON and SLIDELL. Points are explained by a faith which Mr. Seward probably shares with a great many other political leaders, that in the order of civilization, and the development of history, the provinces of Canada will become incorporated with this Republic, and not act necessarily in any convulsive or unfair manner. It is the philosophy of statesmen, the philosopher, and seems to have been regarded as the purpose or plot of the statesman. The circular was the augury of peace, and the letter was a calm expectation for a maritime power at war. It was the counsel of ordinary common sense—nothing more; while the letter to Lord LYONS was the simple vindication of policy, and a dignified rebuke of interference with the case pending.

But whatever may have been thought of the Secretary's feeling for England, and with whatever apparent reason, the publication of his dispatches to Mr. Adams in London puts him, and us, and all honest Englishmen there, in the right position whatever the highest courtesy, the greatest ability, the truest honor, and the sincerest sympathy could do for the cause of peace and the Union, Mr. ADAMS has been done by Mr. SEWARD. No one can understand in the least the wonderful ability with which he manages our foreign affairs at this most critical moment who does not read this correspondence. It is as spirit, but these extracts testify.

On the 19th of June he writes to Mr. Adams: "We are anxious to avoid all causes of misunderstanding with Great Britain and France. Intent instead of breaking the existing bonds of amity and friendship, we are anxious to draw them closer, if both nations may not expect to attain or effect if they may remain friends. It would be a hazardous day for both the branches of the English race when they should try how much harm each could do the other."

On the first of July he writes: "We, as you are well aware, have every desire for a good understanding with the British Government. It causes us no concern that the Government sends a naval force into the West Indies or a military force into Canada. We can have no designs hostile to Great Britain so long as she does not, officially or unofficially, recognize the insurgents or render them aid or sympathy. * * * Under present circumstances, the more effectually Great Britain guards her possessions and her commerce in this quarter, the better we shall be satisfied. If she should change her course and do us any injury, which we have not the least idea now that she proposes to do, we should not be relieved from vindicating our rights and our unbroken sovereignty against all the armies and navies she could send here."

Of all Mr. Seward's services to his country—and they are many and signal, unquestionably greater by far than any other of our living statesmen—none is more honorable to his country and himself than his correspondence with Great Britain during the last year.

THE "SATURDAY REVIEW."

THIS is the title of a London Weekly paper which has a bad eminence for hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness, especially toward America and Americans. The Saturday calls its London Review, from its affectation of universal superiority; and when Bright rises in the House perhaps from its universal smirility. But an American scholar, Henry James, in a note to his masterly address of last July, upon "The Social Significance of our Institutions," tells the truth of it in so trenchant and sparkling a manner that it should be put upon permanent record.

He says: "This able but unscrupulous paper is an invaluable test therefore now of the prejudices of the utter worthlessness, for all social purposes, of the sentiment culture of the head, which is moral culture, when weighed against the intellectual culture of the heart, which alone is spiritual culture. It seems to have had no more genuine reason than to show the rank and festering self-bness which has eaten out the vitals of the old European decency, coming now at last to the surface to corrode and consume every traditional usage of humanity and sympathetic literary art which has hitherto masked its presence and limited its action. If the Saturday Review fairly represent the scholarship amour of England—if its flippant, transparent Pharisaism, its puerile self-complacency, its wanton insolence, its truculent arrogance, exhibited toward every form of intellectual independence—except, as in the case of John Mill, where a great reputation sanctifies it—and toward every the most honest suggestion of social advance, fitly represent the academical consciousness of that country—one can only exclaim, Alas, how changed from the former self! A land (in an intellectual sense) of deserts and pits, a land of drought and the shadow of death, a land no man passes through, and where no man dwells. Certainly honest John Bull was never before so sophisticated—degraded from a fat, savory, succulent, juicy beef, to a lean, stringy, sinewy, tendinous veal—from the superb, contented, dilatital mastiff of broad muzzle and gilt, glittering streams, to the blatant and menacing and biting challenger of every innocent scarlet rag that flutters along private lane or public highway. It is in English middle-class manners made conscious of their own inanity and vulgarity, ready to covet it up under an affectation of cause and vulgar effrontery toward superior people."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"WELCOME AS WATERCRESS."—The Customs of the Bay of Naples tell of a Wopping caller in the Mediterranean, that he must not be his diligence on arriving, when there happened, after six months' clear weather, to be a slight fog. "Turn out, boys! turn out! Here's waiter as is weather; some of your everlasting blue sky!"

Sweetening one's coffee is generally the first stirring event of the day.

FATHER OF A FAMILY: "NOW, my JOHN, let me see! We've got the subscription, and the entry, and the railway tickets in one of a collection that is a great comfort to reflect, in case of any thing serious. The last of the speech is lost in the shriek of the railway engine.

"It is very curious," said an old gentleman to his friend, "that a watch should be perfectly dry when it has a running spring inside."

Love, Justice, and Fortune are said to have no eyes; but all three make no mistake upon rare pretty wide occasions.

"Sally, what time to your folks dine?" "Soon as you get away," that Master's orders."

EASY FOR MAN.—By the year two thousand it is probable that mankind labor will have utterly ceased under the idea that the occupation of the adjective "hard-fisted" will have gone to over. They have now in New Hampshire a machine-digging machine, which, driven by steam down two rows, digs the potatoes, separates them from the dirt, and loads them into the cart, while the farmer rides alongside, whistling "Hail Columbia!" with his hands in his pockets.

The boy who undertook to ride a horse-radish is now practising on a noddle of mutton.

A man, speaking of a place not West, says it is a perfect paradise, and that there's most all the people have the finest kind now, yet it is a great blessing, for it is the only earthly place I like.

FASHION.

A way to dress,
To be made, I guess,
Pick a husband's hours quite clean,
And your Mr. Spratt
Must cry "No fat!"
And his wife will cry—no fear.

"Now, then, my heartie," said a gallant captain, "you have a tough bottle before you. Fight like horse till your garden's green, then—run!" "I'm a little lame, sir," stammered.

The horse "warranted to stand without tying," which a man bought at an outside the other day, is described for sale by the purchaser, with the additional guaranty that "he has not move without whipping."

Ugly people are as anxious as handsome ones to perpetuate their features; probably, having lived so long with their ugliness, they have become attached to it.

"Is your father at home?" inquired a man of the little girl who admitted him. "Is your name Bill?" she asked. "Some people call me so," replied he. "Then he is not at home, for I heard him tell John, if any bill came, to say he was not to home."

A BRIGHT SCHOLAR.—"Did you ever see an elephant's skin?" asked a teacher in the infant school. "I have," shouted a sharper one at the foot of the class. "Where?" inquired the teacher, considerably amazed at his precocious. "On the elephant," shouted the prodigy, gleefully.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, December 24, in the Senate the House not being present, Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, rose to the consideration of eleven new processes. The Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the war vessels had been fitted out at the Navy-yards, ensures of great advancement having been obtained. A petition of citizens of Boston relative to the freedom of the press, and a memorial from Samuel Hale, asking a pension from the Senate adjourned.

On Thursday, December 26, in the Senate, Senator Hale offered a resolution requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit a copy of all dispatches which have passed between the United States Government and that of Great Britain, and all the correspondence of the relief envoys—Slidell and Mason—the duties on sugar, and demanded a decision. Senator Bayard supported the resolution. Senator Hale proposed his resolution be laid on the table. Senator Bayard opposed the motion. Senator Hale objected to the resolution. The subject, he said, was one in great part of which it would be better for the Senate to reserve themselves for facts, and not act upon a hypothetical case. The resolution was then laid upon the table. Notice was given of a bill to provide for the confiscation of the property of persons in arms against or rebellion against the Government. Senator Hale introduced a bill to authorize the appointment of an additional Associate Justice—a bill referred. Among the petitions presented was one from Mr. Seward, and he had received medical practice in the army, several for an armory at Springfield, Massachusetts, and one for the appointment by the military power. The Senate adjourned till Monday, December 30, when it resumed its duties after the recreative, no question being present. The House also adjourned till Monday.

THE SURRENDER OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

Considerable interest is felt at present upon the question between the Governments of France and England on the one hand, and that of the United States on the other concerning the question of international law, involved in the surrender of Mason and Slidell. Earl Russell has addressed a note from Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams, in which the British Government demands of Mr. Seward, 1. That the action of Captain Wilkes was without any hostile intent. 2. That the prisoners, and his dispatches, be set at liberty. 3. That the United States would consider the subject in a friendly spirit. 4. That the United States would offer no apology. 5. That Lords Seward and Lyons, acting for Lincoln, were not to be considered as agents, and he declined to receive communications from them. 6. That the British flag, and a salute, constituted how and announcing that the "liberation of the Commissioners" would be an act of security to the British flag, together with a suitable apology for the aggression, since could not be British subjects. To the Mr. Seward responds in a page, addressed to Lord Lyons, to the date of the 30th of December, in which he maintains that the principles of public law involved in the case, and arrives at the conclusion that the Government of the United States would be wrong in refusing to comply with the British demands; in the first place, because the principles that underpinned the persons captured. He closes by saying that the United States Government "will be cheerfully disposed, and "your lordship will please indicate a time and place for the delivery of them." The Times says that Mason and Slidell cause no offense was intended. To the Lord Lyons replies that the surrender of the persons will be considered by the Majesty's Government as a full satisfaction for the aggression complained of, and that the "case gentlemen" again be placed under the protection of the British flag. The documents here is a dispatch from M. Thouvenel, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, to M. Mercier, the "Minister of the Emperor at Washington," in which he expresses the hope that the United States Government will not, by its refusal to accept the terms with the British Government, and exchanges assurances of friendship.

THE BRITISH FLEET.

The following is the point of the dispatch of Earl Russell:

"HER Majesty's Government, bearing in mind the friendship which has long existed between the United States and Britain and the United States, are willing to believe that the United States would offer no unfriendly act, and that the aggression was not acting in compliance with any authority from his Government, or that, if he conceived himself to be so authorized, he greatly misunderstood the instructions which he had received. For the Government of the United States must be fully aware that the British Government could not allow any violation of what it considered the national honor to pass without full reparation, and her Majesty's Government are unwilling to believe that it is to the deliberate intention of the Government of the United States unnecessarily to force upon the British Government the necessity of a question of so grave a character, and with regard to which the national honor of England would be sure to entertain such unanimity of feeling. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, trust that, when the matter shall have been brought under the consideration of the Government of the United States, that Government will, of its own accord, offer to the British Government such redress as alone could satisfy the British nation, namely:

"The liberation of the four gentlemen and their delivery to your lordship, in order that they may again be placed under British protection, and a suitable apology for the aggression which has been committed.

"Should these terms not be offered by Mr. Seward, you will propose them to him."

MR. SEWARD'S REPLY.

The following passages contain the gist of Mr. Seward's answer. After stating the law and the facts in say:

"I trust that I have shown to the satisfaction of the British Government, by a very plain and natural statement of the facts and analysis of the law applicable to them, that this Government has neither instructed nor practised, nor approved, any deliberate wrong in the transaction to which they have called its attention, but, on the contrary, that what has happened has been simply an inadvertency, unaided by a departure by the naval officer—free from any wrongful motive—from a rule uncertainly established, and, probably, by neither party contemplated, either imperfectly understood or entirely unknown. For that error the British Government has a right to expect, in the same reparation that we, as an independent State, would require if a similar error had been committed by any officer of the British navy.

"If I decide that case in favor of my own Government, I must disavow its most cherished principles, and reverse and forever abandon its established policy. The country has not offered the sacrifice. If I maintain those principles and adhere to that policy, I must accomplish the object. This will be seen, therefore, that this Government could not have done the justice of the case more than it has done it against upon its merits. We are asked to do to the British nation just what we have always insisted all nations ought to do to us. * * *

"Putting behind me all suggestions of this kind, I proceed to express my satisfaction that, by the adjustment of the present case, the relations of the two countries will remain, and yet, I trust, mutually satisfactory to both of the nations. Conciliation is finally and rightly established between them which, heretofore exhausting not only all forms of peaceful discussion, but also the settlement of war itself, for more than half a century alienated the two nearest kindred nations, and perplexed with fears and apprehensions all other nations.

"The four persons in question are held in military custody at Fort Warren, in the State of Massachusetts. They will be thereby liberated. Your lordship will please indicate a time and place for receiving them."

THE FRENCH VIEW.

The following extracts contain the gist of M. Thouvenel's dispatch:

"Lord Lyons is already instructed to present the demand for satisfaction which the English Cabinet is under the necessity of ordering to form, and which consists in the immediate release of the persons taken from on board the Trent, and in the disavowing explanations. Your idea from this act its offensive character toward the British flag. The Federal Government will not refuse to do justice and exalted feeling in deferring to these requests. One must regard with wish to what end, in fact, interest, it would hazard to provoke by a different attitude a rupture with Great Britain.

"For ourselves, we should see in that fact a deplorable misunderstanding in respect of international right which the Cabinet of Washington has already to struggle, and a blow dealt at the principles of maritime law. Powers which could not consider of the existing contract to be neutral, and which would not be willing to submit to the consequences of the war, would be not permissible to be, however, in this condition of things, of our manner of seeing, granting, in principle, the right of search, the exercise of seizing yourself frankly to Mr. Seward, and, if an idle it, send him a copy of this dispatch."

AFFAIRS IN KENTUCKY.

No official information has been received of any action in Kentucky, but rumors state that 40,000 men, the advance of General Buell's command, have crossed O. on River, and are within a mile of Bowling Green, the Confederate advance point. A battle is therefore looked for in a short time.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

As soon as the intelligence of General Pope's cavalry having driven in the pickets of General Hallee reached the latter, a force of 5,000 men, with a battery of artillery, was immediately pressed, and a sudden flight took place in great confusion. The rebels left behind them their tents, baggage, and camp equipage. The rebel force, including that which left behind by General Fremont over the Osage River. The pursuit was continued for 20 miles, when the rebels, the day had passed hurriedly through Springfield en route for Arkansas, and abandoned it to the Union troops again in occupy.

On 28th ult. General Prentiss, with four hundred and fifty men, dispersed nine hundred rebels, under Colonel Mowery, at Bloomfield, Stoddard County. Several wounding on hundred and fifty, and taking thirty-five prisoners, among the latter Colonel Mowery and his son, with a loss on our side of only three killed and eleven wounded. The rebels were commanded by Jeff Thompson on the South Missouri Railroad. They have another force at Cape Girardeau, and the Government will destroy every one on the road.

SECESSION OF BLUFFTON.

The village of Bluffton, which is about the same size as Beaufort, was occupied by the United States Forces under Gen. Stevens, on the 14th ultimo. The rebels had previously abandoned it. The Union troops found it in a most confused manner, and found thirty feet of water there.

GOOD NEWS FROM NEW MEXICO.

Our news from New Mexico is of a cheering character. Colonel Canby, who is in command of the military department, has driven the rebels from the Territory, from Fort Craig and Stanton—and was, at last accounts, on the Rio Grande, in pursuit of the rebels, who were under the command of Major Lynde, who surrendered his troops in consequence. Colonel Canby is driving the rebel Texans before him, and intends to capture the entire force.

SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

At a meeting of the bank representatives, held in this city on 30th ult., a new decided movement in the suspension of specie payment on 30th. This decision was come to unanimously by the banks of this city, and they are drawing out coin and storing it away in order to sell it at a premium, thus realizing on the resumption of specie payments. The heavy drain upon the banks for the past few weeks has hastened the movement in question.

COLONEL CORCORAN NOT ESCAPED.

The statement of Mr. Hall respecting the escape of Colonel Corcoran, and the treatment of Union prisoners at Richmond, is denied by Mr. Hall himself. He says, in a laconic fable—at least as far as it relates to the asserted escape of Colonel Corcoran—that the whole thing, of this man Hurd; no such person has been heard of there. It is probable that the whole affair is a hoax.

PERSONAL.

Colonel Wilcox, the English officer, who distinguished himself during the Mexican war, under Garibaldi, has been appointed Brigadier-General, a very lively position in England. Previous to quitting the French capital, the General had a hearty interview with His Majesty the Emperor Napoleon III.

The Honorable Mr. Ely, who has so long been confined at Richmond, and who has been discharged for Mr. Faulkner, arrived in Louisville, where he had at once continued his journey northward.

General Buell, who has been confined to his bed for some days with a slight fever, has recovered, and is in the saddle again.

General Scott returned to New York on board the Arago. He first came from Fortress Monroe, and a very lively ovation in England. Previous to quitting the French capital the General had a hearty interview with His Majesty the Emperor Napoleon III.

Major Anderson has received a proclamation declaring the railroads of Missouri under martial law.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

THE WAR FEVER.

The war agitation is still at fever heat in England. Troops are being mustered and shipped for Canada, with ships, shells, cannon, and every thing requisite for a winter campaign in a Northern climate. War vessels are being fitted out, both steam and sailing, and even the new frigate Emerald is the latest departure from Plymouth.

NEW IRON-CLAD SHIPS.

The Shipping Gazette states that four new iron-clad first-class steam-frigates were to be built immediately, to serve also as steamers, the particulars of each of which were to be twenty feet long. They will each carry thirty-six Armstrong 100-pounders on the gun-deck and two pivot guns at the bow and stern, to throw 200-pound shot. They will be 6,000 tons burden, and will be driven by 1,000 horses-power, and their tonnage is to be 6,000.

DEATH OF PRINCE ALBERT.

The full report of the sickness and death of Prince Albert is effective. He was fatal with a "typhoid cold" on the 13 of December. This attack alarmed from mid to ensure and on Sunday night the physicians said, that when the case assumed the character of typhoid fever. The Prince gradually declined in strength until death struck the same night, when he died tranquilly, surrounded by the Queen and the other members of the royal family.

THE BAHAMAS.

BRITISH SYMPATHY WITH REBELS.

Letters from Nassau state that, while the United States gun-boat Florida is denied coal and other accommodations, it appears that the Gladiator has been allowed to run his her cargo of arms and ammunition to schooners from the shore, and to coal, under the full knowledge of the British officials. Four rebel vessels, laden with cotton and tobacco, had arrived at Nassau from Mobile and Nassau, among them the Theodora and Isabel with 1600 bales of cotton, under the rebel flag, and all having run the blockade of Charleston harbor.

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON, Bart.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER LVI.

LILIAN recovered, but the strange thing was this: all memory of the weeks that had elapsed since her return from visiting her aunt was completely obliterated; she seemed in profound ignorance of the charge on which I had been confined; politely, but with a certain air of the esteem of Margrave; she had, indeed, a very vague reminiscence of her conversation with me in the garden—the first conversation which had ever been embittered by a disagreement—but that disagreement and she did not connect together. Her belief was that she had been ill and light-headed since that evening. From that evening, up to the hour of her waking, conscious and revived, all was a blank. Her love for me was restored, no ill be itmed her memories broken. Some such instances of oblivion after bodily illness or mental shock are familiar enough to those versed in all medical men;* and I was therefore enabled to appease the anxiety and wonder of Mrs. Ashleigh by quoting various examples, more or less similar, of loss, or suppression, of memory. We agreed that it would be necessary to break to Lilian, though very cautiously, the story of Sir Philip Derval's murder, and the danger to which I had been involved. But we could not find the heart of those events from others. How shall I express how womanly tender—how loving, yearning, during pity—on hearing that story, Lilian listened as well as I could?

"And to think," said I (new nothing of this)" she cried, clasping my hands; "to think that you were in peril, and that I was not by your side!"

Her mother spoke of Margrave as a visitor—an agreeable, lively stranger, of whom she had been recollect his name, but she seemed shocked to think that any visitor had been admitted while I was in such circumstances as mine. I say that our engagement was renewed? Retrieved! To her knowledge and to her heart it had never been broken. Therefore at a moment's call, the malignity of the wrong would: Oh, that strange fatal struggling between the right and the seizes on hearts the least wantonly cruel! Let two idle tongues utter a tale against some third person, who is entirely offended, happy, and unconscious how the tale spreads, like fire, ignited nook know how, in the lodging of an unsuspecting victim. Who shall put it out? What business have we in the concern of other men's hearts? True or false, the tale is no less dangerous. But the concern of ours can at be? I speak not of cases to which the law has provided remedies, which law has sifted, on which law has pronounced. But how, when the law is silent, can we assume its verdicts? How, when the law itself implies, there can be no witness-box, no cross-examination, no jury? Yet every day we put on our ermine, and make ourselves judges—prejudge—we are accused, and on what evidence? That which no court of law will receive. Some whisper, some chit something to somebody, which somebody repeats to every body.

The gossip of L——had set in full current against Lilian's fair name. No ladies had called or sent to congratulate Mrs. Ashleigh upon her return, or to inquire after Lilian herself during her struggle between life and death.

How I should like Queen Caroline or Hill at this critical moment! How I longed for aid to crush the slander, with which I knew not how to grapple—aid, in her knowledge of the world, and her ascendency over its judgments. I had heard from her since she left Rome, a letter full of kindly expressing her amazement at the ineffable stupidity which could for a moment have subjected me to a suspicion of Sir Philip Derval's strange murder, and congratulating me heartily on my escape from implication in so monstrous a charge. To this letter no address was given. I supposed the omission to be accidental, but on writing to her I expressly asked her direction I found that her servants did not know it.

What, then, was my joy when, just at this juncture, I received a note from Mrs. Poyntz, stating that she had returned from Italy to Paris, and would be glad to see me!

I hastened to her hotel. "Ah," thought I, and I sprang lightly up the accent, "how the tattlers will be silenced by a word from her imperial lips!" But my pride and my gratitude met one difficulty—how to express them without offending her. Mrs. Poyntz was a woman—her who had, less ostensibly but more ruthlessly than myself, destroyed Dr. Lloyd for his belief in the unquestionable though mysterious facts of clairvoyance—all the mystical excuses for Lilian's flight from her home? How speak to her—or, indeed, to any ex—about an occult fascination and a magic wand? No matter: surely it would be enough to say that, at the time, Lilian had been light-headed, under the influence of the fever which had affected her nearly proved fatal. The early friend of Anne Ashleigh would not be a severe critic on any tale that might right the good name of Anne Ashleigh's daughter. So assured, with light heart and cheerful, I sprang over the steps into the great lady's pleasant but decorous presence-chamber.

CHAPTER LVII.

MRS. POYNTZ was on her favorite seat by the window, and her footstool, on which Margrave's classic task seemed done; but she was smoothing and folding the completed work with her white comely hand, and smiling over it, as if in complacent approval, when I entered the room. At the first sight of me she paused, suspending a merily-invented banterer; at another wiving, in the farthest recess of the room, stood Miss Jane Poyntz, with a young gentleman whom I had never before seen, but who turned his eyes full upon me with a haughty look as the servant announced my name. He was tall, well proportioned, decidedly handsome, but with that expression of cold and supercilious self-sufficiency in his very attitude, as well as his countenance, which makes a man of merit unpopular, a man of small talents ridiculous.

The he-colored, always punctiliously civil, rose from his seat to meet me, and, after a word or two, said, "Colonel Washington to-day; but we shall have rain to-morrow. Rainy seasons came in cycles. We have had a long cycle of cycle of them with heavy showers." He sighed, and exclaimed to his hostess:

Miss Jane bowed to me graciously enough, but was evidently a little confused, a circumstance which might well be from my notice, for I had never before seen that high-bred young lady deviate a hair's-breadth from the even tenor of a demeanor which, in its quiet and cold assortment tone, which one felt convinced would be matured to be those charms of which the Marquise Sevalgne swallowed one up an inch before her feet.

The young gentleman continued to eye me coldly, as he stood by Miss Jane's side, selected planet might eye an inferior creature from a well-informed which ordinary dropped upon his sublime and perfected star.

Mrs. Poyntz extended to me two fingers, and, with a slight bow, said, "Mr. Ashleigh, I am glad. How kind to attend so soon to my note!" Mo. Mrs. Poyntz was in a seat beside her, she here turned to her bookcase and took, from a heap, a couple of rain begins to murrow better secure your ride home." Ah, a young people with you. I want to talk with Dr. Fenwick."

The Colonel carefully put away his barometer, and saying to his daughter, "Jane, dear, and forth, Jane followed her father; the young gentleman followed slowly.

The reception I had met chilled and disappointed me. I felt that Mrs. Poyntz was changed, and in her manner to me. Jane also seemed changed. The very chairs looked civilly unfriendly, as if preparing to turn their backs on me. However, I was not to be the first mentioned of an intruder; I had been summoned; it was for Mrs. Poyntz to speak first, and I waited quietly for her to do so.

She finished the careful folding of her work, and then laid it at rest in the capacious table at which she sat. Having so done, she turned to me, and said:

"By-the-way, I ought to have introduced to you my young guest, Mr. Ashleigh Sumner. You would like him. He is a scholar—not shown, but solid. He will succeed in public life."

"So that young man is Mr. Ashleigh Sumner? I do not wonder that Miss Ashleigh rejected him."

I said this, for I was nettled, as well as surprised, at the coolness with which a lady who had professed a friendship for me recommended that fortunate young gentleman with so somewhat marked an air of disparagement that had once made his name painful to my ear.

He turn, my answer seemed to nettle Mrs. Poyntz.

"I am not so sure that she did not prefer; perhaps she remembered that a gallant compliments are not always proposals of marriage. However that be, his spirits were not much disturbed by the loss of Miss Ashleigh, nor his heart deeply smitten by her charms, for he is now very happy with Miss Jane, who is another young lady, to whom he proposed three years ago at Lady Delafield's, and, not to make a mystery of it, Miss Jane's mother will have before to-morrow, that young lady is my daughter Jane."

"Were I acquainted with Mr. Sumner, I should offer to his my sincere congratulation."

Mrs. Poyntz resumed, without heeding a reply more complimentary to Miss Jane than to the object of her choice:

"I told you that I meant Jane to marry a rich country gentleman, and Ashleigh Sumner is the very person to suit her. Jane is sensible, my thoughts. He is cleverer and more ambitious than I could have hoped; he will be a minister some day; he will be in Parliament, at once if he wishes it, in right of his lands. So that matter is settled."

There was a pause, during which my mind passed rapidly through links of reminiscence and conjecture. I had left Mrs. Poyntz in attentions of admiration for Mrs. Poyntz as a diplomatist and of interest for her as a friend. It was now clear why Mrs. Poyntz, who had so little disposed to approve my love, had urged me at once to offer my hand to Lilian, in order that she might depart affianced and engaged to the house in which she would meet Mr. Ashleigh Sumner. Hence Mrs. Poyntz's anxiety to obtain all the information I could afford her of the sayings and doings at Lady Haughton's; hence the publicity she had so suddenly given to my engagement; hence, when Mr. Sumner had gone away, a rejected suitor, her stern dismissal from L——; she had seized the very moment when a rain and proud man, piqued by the more brilliant success of his fellow lady, fain the easiest prey to the arts which allure his suit to mother. All was so far clear to me. But L—was my self-conceit less egregious and less readily duped than that of you gilded popinjays's! How skillfully this woman had played on the weak spot with the noiseless turn of her white hands! and yet, how much at least must the superior sense, my intellect, and phem all the fountains of Nature—I, who could not fathom the little pool of this female schemer's mind!

But that was no time for resentment to her or rebuke for myself. She was now the woman to whom I must appeal and save from shame my innocent, beloved Lilian. But how approach that perplexing subject?

Mrs. Poyntz approached it, and with her usual decision of purpose, which bore to deceitful a semblance of candor and truth.

"But it was not to talk of my affairs that I asked you to call, Mr. Fenwick," she said, interfered my name her voice assumed, and her manner took that maternal, caressing tenderness which had previously aroused and subjugated my misled me. "No, I do not forget that you have been to me very kind. I take, without scruple, the license of friendship. What are these stories that I have heard already about Lilian Ashleigh, to whom you were once engaged?"

"To whom I am still engaged."

Is it possible? Oh, then, of course the stories I have heard are all false. Very likely: no fiction is half so clever nor surprises me. But, dear Lilian, then, never ran away from her mother's house?"

I smothered the angry pain which this mode of questioning caused me; I knew how important it was to me to preserve to her the confidence and support of this absolute sovereign. I spoke of Lilian's long previous disrepose of mind; I explained it as my previous medical physician, unacquainted with all that I could not reveal, would account. Heaven forgive me for the veiled hints that I spoke of the mysterious charge against myself as enough to unhinge, for a time, the mind of a girl so acutely sensitive as Lilian; I sought to create that impression as to the origin of all that might otherwise seem strange in the recent scene of cowardly assassin she had wandered from home—but alone. I had traced her out of her way. I had found and restored her to her home. Arrived at that point had followed, from which she now rose, served in his daughter's name that those who could be a whisper against her name. And then, with all the eloquence I could command, and in words which I felt would move them to soften the heart of a woman, herself a mother, I implored Mrs. Poyntz to shield her sister from the shame of calumny, and extend her shield over the child of her own early friend.

When I had done, and I had taken, with caressing force, Mrs. Poyntz's reluctant hands in mine, there were tears in my voice, tears in my eyes. And the first sound of her voice, as I reply gave me hope, for it was unusually gentle. She was evidently moved. The hope was soon quelled.

"Allen Fenwick," she said, "you have a noble heart; I grieve to see how it is abused by reason. I can not aid Lilian Ashleigh in the way you ask. It would be to insult her unknowingly. Listen to me as patiently as I have listened to you. That when you brought back the unfortunate young woman to her poor mother's side mind was disordered, and because yet more dangerously so, I do not doubt. But that she has recovered, and thinks with shame, or refuses to think at all of her imprudent flight, I can believe also. But I do not believe, the World will not believe, that she did not, knowingly and purposely, run away from a roof, and in quest of that young stranger so mysteriously, so strangely admitted to her mother's house during the very time you were banished on the same charge of human accusations. Every one in the town knows that Mr. Margrave visited daily at Mrs. Ashleigh's during that painful period; every one in the town knows in what strange, out-of-the-way place Mr. Margrave found his friend himself, and that a yacht was bought, and lying in wait for them. What for? It is said that the cruise in which you, Mr. Ashleigh have been lost, and your home was hired at a village within an easy reach of Mr. Margrave's yacht—of Mr. Margrave's yacht. I rejoice that you saved the young lady from ruin: but her good name is tarnished, and of Anne Ashleigh's daughter I sincerely pity. I see my advice, I can but give her this: 'Leave L——, take your daughter abroad, and if she must to marry Mr. Margrave, marry her as quietly and as quickly as possible to some foreigner.'"

"Madam," I exclaimed, "is this your advice ship to her—to me! Oh, shame on you to insult thus an affianced husband! Shame on me that I have listened to you so long! Farewell."

"A heart, man!" she exclaimed, almost fiercely, springing from her reclining seat with a change in her countenance and voice. "And little you would have valued, and pitilessly have crushed this heart, if I had suffered myself to show it to you! What right have you to reproach me for it? Is it a strong interest in your career, an unusual attraction in your conversation and society. Do you blame me for that, or should I have moved my sympathies so little among brainless puppets, my dull occupation to pull the strings that moved them, it was a new charm to my life to establish friendship and intercourse with intellect, and spirit, and courage, Ah, I understand that look, half incredulous, half inquisitive."

"Inquisitive, no! incredulous, yes! You desired my friendship, and how does your harsh judgment of my betrothed wife prove either to me or to her mother, whom you have known from your girlhood, the first duty of a friend, which is surely not that of leaving a friend's side in the moment that he needs assistance in calumny, succor in trouble."

"It is a higher duty to prevent the calumny and avert the trouble. Leave aside Anne Ashleigh, a cipher that I can add or subtract from my sum of life and of peace. What is my duty to yourself? It is plain. It is to tell you that your honor commands you to abandon all thoughts of Lilian Ashleigh as your wife. Ungrateful that you are! Do you suppose it was no mortification to my pride of woman and friend that you never approached me in confidence except to ask my good offices in promoting your connection with another? No check to the quiet plans I had formed as to our family—no thought humbler influence, to hear that you were bent on a marriage in which my friend would be lost to me?"

"Not lost!—not lost! On the contrary, the regard I must suppose you had for Lilian would have been a new link between our homes."

"Pooh! Between me and that dreamy girl there could have been no sympathy, there could have grown no regard. You would have been chained to your bride, and—and—but no matter. I stifled my disappointment as soon as I felt—stifled it, as all my life I have stifled that which either destiny or duty—duty to myself as to others—forbids me to indulge. Ah, do not fancy me one of the weak criminals who can suffer a worthy liking to grow into a decaying love. I was not in love with you, Allen Fenwick."

"Do you think I was ever presumptuous a coxcomb as to fancy it?"

"No," she said, more softly; "I was not so false to my household ties and to my own nature. But there are some friendships which are as jealous as love. I could have cheerfully aided you in any project which my reason could have approved for you as wise; I should have been pleased to have found in such love my most intimate companion. But that silly child—absurd! Nevertheless, the foolishness and entirely of your love have touched me, and you may said, and I gave it—perhaps I did believe that with you sense and affection Ashleigh you would be cured of a fancy concerning which I—yes—I should have known better what dupes the wisest men can be to the witchcraft of a face and of eighteen! When I found your illusion obstinate I wrenched myself away from a vain regret, and left you to the scheme which I felt sure was wisest, and smiled bitterly to think that in pressing you to propose to my family to Lilian I made your mind passion an agent in my own plans. Enough of this. I speak thus openly and boldly to you because I am sure I have not the slightest that can interfere with the dispassionate soundness of your judgment. I repeat, you can not now marry Lilian Ashleigh; I can not take my daughter to visit her; I can not destroy the social laws that have fixed a barrier between the two."

"Be it as you will. I have pleaded for her while she is still Lilian Ashleigh. I plead for no more. I have been cruelly wronged in my name. Before the woman whom I have taken from the altar I stand with a shield sufficient, my strong breast of man. Who has so cruel a current in Lilian's purity as I have? Who so fitted to judge of the just truth of every whisper against her? Yet when I, whom you admit to have some reputation for shrewd intelligence—I, who have watched her—I, who have lived by her home—when I, Allen Fenwick, am so assured that I am ready to defy the world to speak out that I trust my honor to her keeping—surely, surely I confute the scandal which you yourself say is current, by the mere fact that I appeal not to annul it."

"You may deceive yourself, Allen Fenwick," said she, still standing beside me, her countenance now hard and stern. "Look, where I point. Look to the WORLD! The WORLD, as statists depreciate or as optimists extol its immutable characteristics, its all-pervasive authority. I am The World! And my advice is the World's voice when it thus warns you. Should you make this unfortunate alliance your career in any position would be gone!—if you look only to lucre and professional success, possibly they may not be impaired. But if you look to fame, which men need; their need may still draw patients to your door, but the patients turn away from you, but you have the pride as well as the birth of a gentleman, and the wounds to that pride will be deeper and more painful, and never healed, a strong breast of man no shelter to the frail name of woman. Lilian, if, in her health, will look down on your wife, though in sick she look up to you. This is not all. The World, in its prudent mood of intelligence, has its moments sincerely. 'Poor man! how weak, and how deceived! What an unfortunate marriage!' But the World is not often deceived, and when the mist to the motives most seen on the surface. And The World is not more frequently so much too clever a man to be duped. Mrs. Ashleigh had money. A good match to the man who liked gold better than honor."

I sprang to my feet, with difficulty suppressing my voice to a whisper, though it was a woman who spoke to me, "Farewell, Madam," said I, and I strongly grinded teeth. "Were you indeed the Person whose name I bear, I would not threaten you mouth so calmly, I could not disdain you more."

She made no reply, and left her still standing erect and menacing, the hard sneer on her resolute lip, the red glitter in her remorseless eye.

* Such instances of suppression of memory are recorded in most physiological, and in some medical works. But the Abercrombie notices some more or less similar to that related in the text. A young lady, who was accustomed to interrupt a husband, in which many people lost their lives by the fall of the gallery at a theatre, received a severe injury, but with the complete loss of the recollection of any of the circumstances which preceded or led to the accident, but to every thing that had occurred to her for a certain than before going to church. A lady whom I attended some years ago in a protracted illness, was seized with a violent convulsive attack, during the prostration of a period of about two or twelve years, but of which she had no recollection. Many such cases are on record. But Abercrombie observes, "So far as I have been able to trace it, the principle is the same in all these cases, that when the mental impression is in a certain degree, the law of it extends backward to some extent or some period by which a chain of association is formed, and here made upon the mind."—Abercrombie on the Intellectual Powers, pages 118, 119 (25th edition).

CHAPTER LVIII.

IF ever my heart vowed itself to Lilian, the vow was now the most trustful and the most sacred. I had relinquished our engagement before, but then her affection seemed, no matter from what cause, so estranged from me that though I might be miserable to lose her, I deemed that she would be unhappy in our union. Then, too, she was the gem and darling of the little world in which she lived; her whisper assoiled her; now I knew that she loved me. I knew that her estrangement had been wondrously, I knew that appearances wronged her, and that they never could be explained. I was in the one position of all men to unweave the subtle, the bulwark, the fearless, confiding protector! Design her enemies had, and behind the veil, because my career might be impeached—resign her, and, in that resignation, confess her guilt—they said against her! Could. I do so I should be the most craven of gentlemen, the meanest of men!

I went to Mrs. Ashleigh, and entreated her to hasten my union with her daughter by the first marriage day.

I found the poor lady dejected and distressed. She was not sufficiently relieved from the absorbing anxiety for Lilian to be aware of the change on the face of that Wild Indian, for whose man I had just spotted personified and conceived; she had listened the cause from the bloodless lips of Mr. Ashleigh.

"My child—my poor child!" murmured the mother. "Can she so grievously misunderstand? Could she know what it said it would kill her. She would never marry you, Allen. She would never bring ruin to you!"

"She never need learn the barbarous calumny. Give her to me, and assure her patients, fortune, fame, are not found only in Europe. Give her to me at once. But let me name a condition: I have a paramount reason—reasons I have assured large savings—I have my profession and my repute. I can not touch her fortune—I can not—never! Take it! Take it! Should I lose you die, leave it to accumulate for her children, if children she have, not to me; not to her—unless I am also buried!"

"Oh, Allen, what a heart!—what a heart! No, not heart, Allen—she had in its cage has a heart: soul—what a soul!"

CHAPTER LIX.

How innocent was Lilian's virgin blush when I knelt to her and prayed that she would forestall the date that had been fixed for our union, and be my bride that day week! How the moon had withered the pomp of the woodland and silenced the song of the birds. Meanwhile I was so fearfully conscious that the world took no shape of hearing, even of surmising, the cruel slander against her—how should mine? The moment was now locked—above all, should be safe from the barbed tolls of Mrs. Poyntz—that I insisted on the necessity of immediate leaving of the scene. I proposed that we should all three detart the next day for the banks of my own beloved and native Wyhenemo, where the mountain air Lilian's health would be soon reestablished, and where, meanwhile, we could tend the graves of my fathers our vows could be plighted. No calumny had ever cast a shadow over those graves. I felt as if I should there be safer in the neighborhood of my mother's tomb.

I carried my point: it was so arranged. Mrs. Ashleigh, however, was reluctant to leave before she had seen her dear friend, Mrs. Poyntz, whom I had not the courage to tell her what she might expect to hear from that dear friend, but, as delicately as I could, I intimated that I had already seen the Queen of the Hill, and contradicted the calumny that had reached her ear; and as yet, like other absolute sovereigns, the Queen of the Hill thought it politic to go with the popular stream, perceiving all others of her subjects till the rush of its torrent might slacken; and that it would be infinitely wiser for Mrs. Ashleigh to postpone conversation with Mrs. Poyntz until Lilian's return to Lo—as my wife: slander by that time would have withered. I had and Mrs. Poyntz (assuming her friendship to Mrs. Ashleigh to be sincere) would then be enabled to act with authority to Mrs. Poyntz's set in Fenwick alone knows the facts of the story, and his meeting with Miss Ashleigh refutes all the gossip to her prejudice."

I made, that evening, arrangements with a young and skillful practitioner to attend Lilian once on my patients during my absence. I passed the greater part of the night in writing up memoranda to guide my proxy in each case, however humble the sufferer. This task finished, I chanced, in looking for a certain memorandum, on the wonders of which I thought might interest and amuse Lilian, to open a drawer in my desk that kept the manuscripts of my cherished Physiological Work, and in so doing my eye fell upon the work which I had thought I had destroyed. I had thrown it into that drawer on my return home after restoring Lilian to her mother's home, and, in the anxiety that had subsequently preyed upon my mind, had almost forgotten that it was possessed in the world I required. There it now lay, the instrument of agencies over the mechanism of nature which no doctrine admitted by my philosophy could accept, side by side with the presumptuous work which had analyzed the springs by which affiure is moved, and decided the principles by which reason metes out, from the inch of its knowledge, the plan of the Infinite Unknown.

I took up the wand, and examined it curiously.

It was evidently the work of an age far remote from our own, scored with hieroglyphics literated characters in some Eastern tongue, perhaps no longer extant. I found that it was hollow within. A more accurate observation showed, in the centre of this hollow, an exceedingly fine, thread-like wire, the unattached end of which would slightly touch the palm when the wand was taken into the hand. Was it possible that there might be a natural and even a simple cause for the effects which this instrument produced? Could it serve to collect, from that great focus of animal heat and nervous energy which is placed in the palm of the hand, some such subtle latent fluid as that which Reichenbach calls the "od," and which Mesmer terms "the universal fluid through and pervades universal Nature?" After all, why not? For how many centuries lay unknown all the virtues of the mineral and the anbne? It is but as yesterday that the forces of vapor have become the seven-leaguer boots of more than those conjured up by Aladdin's lamp; and, as a touch, springs forth from invisible air, that thought had not conceived, the magic of the wings of the fabled Arfite. As, thus musing, my hand closed over the wand, I felt a wild thrill through every frame. Was it the new alarmed fear, according to the plain common-sense theory of Julius Faber, tingling the nerves of imagination to form and to credit its own illusions? Hastily I laid down the wand. But then it occurred to me that, in my profession, it might lead so served the purposes of the dread Rosicrucian from whom it had been taken, that he might absolutely seek to spy out the nature of a delicate instrument to enter my house in my absence; more prudent to destroy at once the mischievous and the incomprehensible instrument of incomprehensible arts. I resolved, therefore, to take the wand with me. But, as I laid down my pen to rest, I placed it in my travelling-trunk with such effect as I intended to make the excursion that was to commence with the morrow. I was then down to rest, but I could not sleep. The recollection of Mrs. Poyntz's interview with Mrs. Poyntz became vivid and haunting. It was clear that the sentiment she had conceived for me was that of no single passion, but a complex mass of something less—but certainly something else—than romantic love. Her nature was of too proud hard face, disturbed by a pang wrested against but not subdued, and that clear metallic voice, pervaded by the most unwomanly quality, perhaps, she had never analyzed to herself. I did not need her own words to assure me that the sentiment was not to be confounded with a love which she would have despised as a weakness, and repelled as a crime. It was an admiration of the intellect, not a passion of the heart. But still it admitted a jealousy little less than that which has love for its source. I saw that it is that jealousy is never absent where self-love is the master-key. I remembered, in the very ambiguity of sober friendship which had made the stern arbitress of a coterie ascribe to her interest in me her public judgment to counteract it. Strongly enough, with the image of this archetype of conventional usages and the haughty dame, the chief of the mysterious Margrave, surrounded by all the attributes with which superstition clothes the being of the unknown, I felt a relief at this addition? Both had entered into the record of my life when my heart was untouched by the sentiment of love. Through the aid of this cynical schemer I had been made known to Lilian. After hours I had heard the dark story of Margrave Lovely, with whom, in mocking spite of my reason, conferences (which I have very reason to doubt) myself before it could resolve into distempered fancies) identified the enigmatical Margrave. And now both she, the representative of the formal world most opposed to visionary creeds, and he, who gathered round him all the terrors which haunt the realms of fable, stood united against me —foes with whom the intellect I had so haughtily contemned had power to crush. Crush! Lilian was mine! I might expect from either I was unable to assail again. Alike, then, in this are the Sibylline and the Phantom—that they speak as most in their power over us is our impotence against them.

But my eye rose the sun, chasing the shadows from the earth, and brightening insensibly the thoughts of my mind. Ever all, Margrave and Sibylline had defeated, whatever the arts he had practiced and the secrets he possessed—it was, at least, beneficent to believe his evil vocation would be renewed. He had seemed so incapable of longcontinued malice to myself, that it was probable he was already in pursuit of some new agent or victim; and as to this commonplace and conventional agent, Mrs. Poyntz, surely, if it is every where to him whom it owes, it is nowhere to him who despises it. What was the good or bad word of a Mrs. Poyntz to me? Ay, but to Lilian? There, indeed, I trembled; but still even in trembling it was impossible that my new home would be her shelter—my choice her vindication. Ah, how unutterably tender and revering was my love for Lilian! Sacred from the follies of the guardian, and hallows its own heart into a sanctuary of refuge for the beloved!

CHAPTER LX.

THE beautiful lake! We two are on its grassy margin. Twenty days—twenty days—at the stern stealing forth, one after one. What a wonderful change is made within us when we come from our callings among men, chafed, wearied, wounded; gnawed by our cares, perplexed by the doubts of our very wisdom, stung by the adder that dwells in cities—Slander; nay, even if removed, fatigued with the burden of the very names that we have won; what a change is made within us when suddenly we find ourselves transported into the calm solitudes of Nature—into scenes familiar to our boyish thoughts, and, coming back from the dusty thoroughfares of our toil-worn manhood to the golden fountain of our youth! Blessed is the change, even when we have no companion beside us to whom the heart can whisper its sense of relief and joy. But if the One, in whom all our future is garnered up, be with us then, instead of that weary Void which has so magically vanished away from the eye and the thought, then does the change make one of those rare epochs of life in which the charm is the stillness. In the pause from all, that control, grief, and strife struggles for human trouble existence, we feel with a rapt amaze how calm a thing it is to be happy. And so as the night, in dawning, brightened, Lilian and I wandered by the starry lake. Conscious of no evil in ourselves, we saw no evil—we felt from it! A few days more—a few days more, and we two should be as one. And that thought we uttered not, but it was there in the brooding over it in the long intervals of enamored silence.

And when we came back to the quiet inn at which we had taken up our abode, and her mother, with her soft face, advanced to meet us, I felt as her child.

"Would that in these scenes we could fix our home for life, away and afar from the cold town we have left behind us, with the fret of its wearying cares and the jar of its idle babble!"

"And why not, dear?" Why not? But so, you would not be happy."

"Not be happy, and with you? Skeptic! by what sentence would you prove us that unpleasant conclusion?

"The heart loves repose and the soul contemplation, but the mind needs action. Is it not so?"

"Where learned you that aphorism, out of place as it is now to you?"

"I learned it in studying you," murmured Lilian, tenderly.

Here Mrs. Ashleigh joined us. For the first time I slept under the same roof as Lilian. And I forgot that the roof contained an enigma to solve or an enemy to fear.

CHAPTER LXI.

TWENTY days—the happiest my life had ever known—thus glided on. Apart from the charm which love bestows on the beloved, there was in Lilian's conversation much more than the delightful companion. Whether it was that in this nature there was a depth of power my mind could more plainly supple itself to her powerful imagination, or that her imagination itself was less vague and more subdued these recent years which realized in their loveliness and grandeur the long-conceived ideals than it had been in the days when, unchastened, it sported by the stir and bubble of the busy town, in much that it had once seemed to me unfeminine in the rapidness of undisciplined fancy I now recognized the sparkle and play of an intuitive genius lighting up many a dim subject to my interested thought. It is with some characters as with the earth on which we tread—the more we know of it, the more we find to admire and to love. To appreciate them we must suspend the course of artificial life. In the city we call them dreamers. On the mountains they would be philosophers.

In Lilian the sympathy with Nature was not, as in Margrave, from the joy and sense of Nature's beauty. That it was refined into mystic perception of the diviner spirit by which that beauty is shaped, I felt. Thus, like the artist, the outward forms of beauty she drew forth the covert types, lending to things the most familiar a transient meaning unconceived before. For it is truly said by a wise critic of old, that "the attributes of the beautiful are rarely more than moral expresses;" and such suggestions, passing from the artist's innermost thought into the mind that receives them, are not on that account the less of Ideas, as a moonlit wave struck by a passing oar impels wave upon wave along one track of light.

So the days glided by, and brought the eve of our bridal morn. It had been arranged that after the ceremony (which was to be performed by license in the village church, at no great distance, which obviated the paternal home now passed away to strangers), we should make a short excursion into the mountains. Mrs. Ashleigh to await our return at the little inn.

I had retired to my own room to answer some letter of business from patients, and having finished these, I looked into my trunk for a book I had left in the North, which I had brought with me. My hand came upon Margrave's wand, and remembering that strange thrill which had passed through me when I last handled it, I drew it forth, resolved to examine calmly if I could detect the cause of the sensation. It was the first moment of night in which the imagination is most liable to credulous impressions, nor was I over free from the influence of that state of mind in which such impressions may be the more readily conceived. The sun was slowly setting over the distant mountains; the air was still and serene; my thoughts collected; heart and conscience alike at peace. I took, then, the wand, and adjusted it to the palm of the hand as I had done before. I felt the slight touch of the delicate wire within, and again the thrill ran. I did not this time recoil; I continued to grasp the wand, and sought deliberately to analyze my own sensations in the effect. There came over me an increased consciousness of vital power, a certain elasticity and cheerfulness, such as a strong cordial may produce on a fainting man. All the forces of my frame seemed refreshed, redoubled; and as such effects on the physical system are ordinarily accompanied by correspondent effects on the mind, so I was sensible of a proud elation of spirits, a kind of defying superb self-glorying. All fear seemed blotted out from my thought, as a weakness impossible to the grandeur and might which belong to lofty-related Man. Then, as if I were a royal child light to secure Earth and its spirits, brave Hades and its spectres. Rapidly this new-born arrogance enlarged itself into desires vague but daring; my mind reverting to the wild phenomena associated with its memories of Margrave, I said, half aloud, "If a creature so beneath myself in constancy of will and completion of thought can work from Nature forces so marvelous, what could not he won from her by me, her patient, persevering seeker? What if there be spirits around, all unseen, visible to the common eye, but whom we can submit to our control; great as if this rod be charged with some occult fluid that runs through all creation, and can be so disciplined as to establish communication wherever the hand may touch to beings that live and think! So would the mysteries of old explain what perplexes me. Am I sane when I ask myself if I have duped themselves or their pupils? This, then, this slight wand, light as a reed in my powerful hand, was the instrument by which Margrave sent his irresistible will through air and space, and by which he himself, in the midst of his fiercest lives like wrath, into the helplessness of a sick man's torment! Can this instrument in the mere physical control him; if now meditating this, disarm and disable his purpose?" Involuntarily as I reached these ideas I stretched forth the wand, with a concentrated energy of desire that its influence should reach Margrave and command him. And since I knew not his abode—about, yet was vaguely aware that, according to the mysterious theory by which I was myself could be supposed to carry its imagined virtues to definite goals in distant space, it should be pointed in the direction of the object I wished to affect, so I slowly moved the wand as if describing a circle, and as I thus moved it round the circle—east, west, north, or south—the direction could not fail to be true. Before I had performed the circuit I was conscious of a vague relief, resting palpably the movement of my hand to impel it more rapidly. Had it, then, found the point to which my will was guiding it, obeying my will by some magnetic sympathy never yet comprehended by my research? I knew it not; but I had not held it thus fixed for many seconds before a dark air, well remembered, passed by me, stirring the hair of my head, and, reflected against the opposite wall, stood the hateful form of Mrs. Poyntz, with an aliment in its light than when before beheld, and the outline of the features was less distinct; still it was the same figure, or image, of Margrave.

And a voice was conveyed to my senses, saying, as from a great distance, and in weary yet angry accents,

"Have you summoned me? Wherefore?"

I overcame the startled shudder with which at first I beheld the Shadow and heard the Voice.

"I summoned you not," said I; "I sought but to impress upon you my will, that you should persecute with your ghostly influences, me and mine no more. And now, by whatever authority in this world bestows on me the right to send command you!"

The Shadow was a sneer of disdain on the lip through which the answer seemed to come:

"Vain and ignorant; it is but a shadow you have summoned. Had I was refined into spirit, and it knows not that the shadow is here; nor, were it visible, would it have the power to take reminiscence of the words that you utter or the words that you hear."

"What, then, is this shadow that simulates the body? Is it that which in popular language is called the soul?"

"It is not: soul is no shadow."

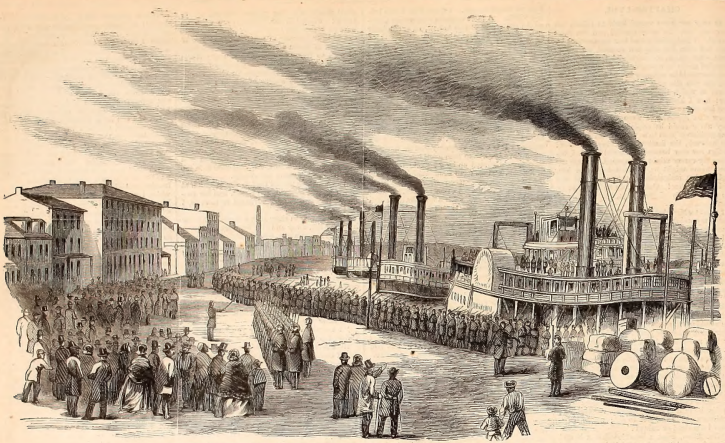
"What then?"

"Ask not me. Use the wand to invoke Intelligences higher than mine."

"I will do so."

"I will tell you not. Of yourself you may learn, if you guide the wand by your own pride of will and daring. But if in the hands in which you learned not the art the wand has its dangers. Again, I say you have summoned me! Therefore [illegible]

"Lying shade, I summoned thee not."



"So should thou say in thy dreams, did they come in their terrible wrath, when the burglar, who knows not the springs that he moves, and them up and unawares, and rouses with control our dupe!. Less revengeful than they, I leave thee ashamed, and depart!"

The shape, as above sayest, no command I address to thee—to thee, who art only the image of the beloved Lilian. Again I say, in the body and mind of the being whose likeness thou art, still thou canst tell me what passes now in his brain. Speak! or have other science than that through the woman I love? Answer truly!"

"Fool, I am not she. Yet, as even I am more than a likeness, though only the shadow. He thought speaks thus: 'I know, Allen Fenwick, that you are in the agent I have to-day leaving the end that I seek. Through the woman whom I love I hope to effect one. And then will harrow thy heart as at hand; when that grief shall befall thou wilt welcome my coming. I am not sure that I shall be pleased through me alone with thou seek a path out of thy sorrow. All ideals are worthless: they will make thee my soul and my slave!"

The Shadow waned—it was gone. I did not recall it. I did not, in my mind, believe that I have known by what process. But a new idea now possessed me. This shadow, then, that had once so appalled and controlled me, was, by its own confession, nothing more than a Shadow! It had spoken of higher Intelligences; from them I might learn what the Shadow could not reveal. As I still held the wand firmer and firmer in my grasp, my thoughts grew haughtier and bolder. Could the wand, then, bring those loftier beings? I was darkly referred to them! With that thought, intense and engrossing, I

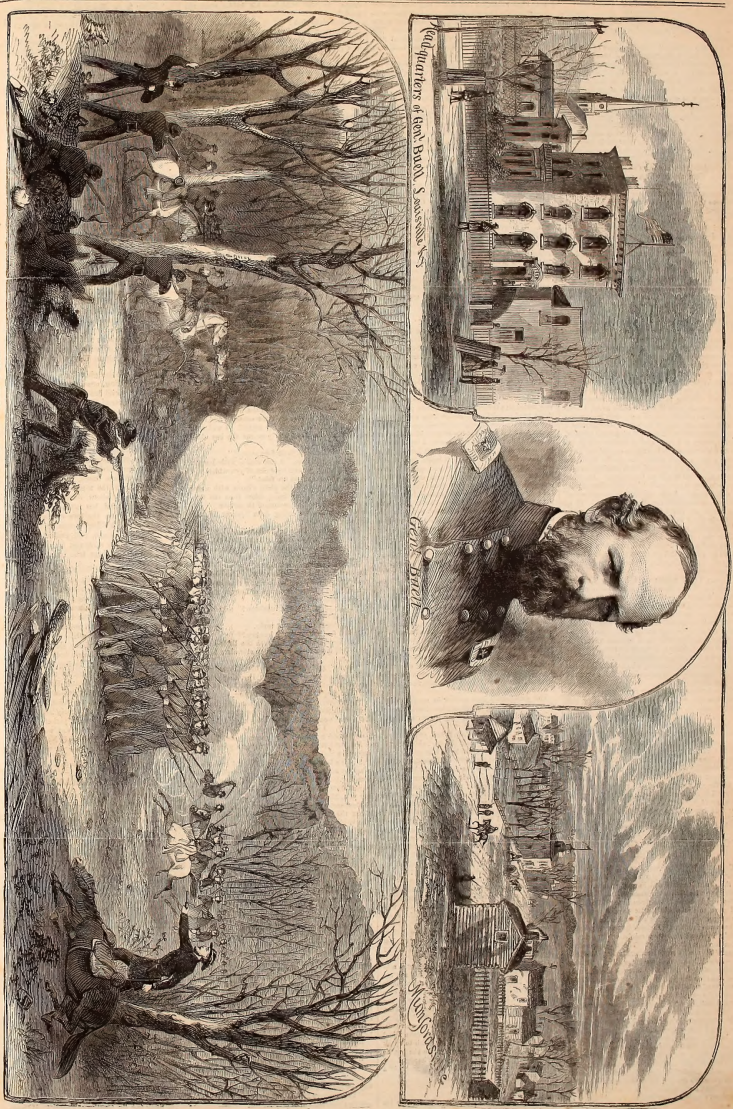
LANDING OF OHIO TROOPS AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.—[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

WE devote this and the following page to illustrations of the War in Kentucky.

We reproduce above a sketch by Mr. Henry Mosler, representing the ARRIVAL OF TROOPS AT LOUISVILLE. Mr. Mosler writes that regiments past counting are arriving at Louisville, and moving on no one knows where.

The picture below, also from a sketch by Mr. Mosler, represents GENERAL BUELL'S BODY-GUARD. Mr. M. writes that these are the finest body of men he has ever seen, being in truth and in fact the flower of the Pennsylvania troops. They are all from five feet ten inches to six feet in height, and were picked one man from each county of Pennsylvania.



The large picture on the following page represents the recent BRILLIANT SKIRMISH between a part of Colonel Wilich's Thirty-second Indiana Regiment and several rebel regiments—among others the Texan Rangers, under Colonel Terry. The official report from General Buell to the head-quarters at Washington, sent by telegraph, gives but few particulars of the brilliant resistance made by four companies of the Thirty-second Indiana Volunteers against a vastly superior rebel force under Colonel Terry. The rebel force consisted of one regiment of Texan Rangers, two regiments of infantry, and one battery of six guns; and that of the Unionists of but four companies, who occupied a point in front of the railroad bridge across Green River, a short distance south of Munfordville. The attack was made by the rebels at about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 17th December; and after a brief struggle, during which they lost Colonel Terry, of the Rangers—he, with thirty-three others, being killed, and about fifty others wounded—they ingloriously retreated. The Union loss was one lieutenant and eight enlisted men killed, and ten wounded.

On the same page we give a portrait of GENERAL BUELL, our Commander in Kentucky, and a view of his head-quarters. General Don Carlos Buell was born in Ohio, about the year 1819, and is consequently forty-two years of age. He entered West Point in 1837, graduated in 1841, and was appointed to the Third Infantry. He obtained his First-Lieutenancy in 1846, was brevetted Captain for gallant and meritorious conduct in several conflicts at Monterey, in September of the same year; distinguished himself greatly at the battle of Cerro Gordo; was brevetted Major for gallant conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, on 20th August, 1847. In 1848 Major Buell became Assistant Adjutant-General, and fulfilled the duties of that office till 1851, when he relinquished his rank in the line. On the outbreak of the rebellion Major Buell took an active part on the side of the Government, and was soon in command of a division under General M'Clellan. His division was remarked as the most thoroughly drilled in the service, and his soldierly qualities were so obvious, that when it became evident that General Sherman was not the man for the command in Kentucky it was given to General Buell.

GENERAL BUELL'S HEAD-QUARTERS are situated in one of the most aristocratic streets in Louisville—Fourth, between Green and Walnut.

guided the wand toward the space, opening boundless and blue from the casement that let in the skies. The wand no longer resisted my hand.

In a few moments I felt the floors of the room vibrate; the air was darkened; a vaporous, hazy cloud seemed to rise from the ground without the casement; an awe, infinitely more deep and solemn than that which the Scin-Loca had caused in its earliest apparition, curdled through my veins, and chilled the very roots of my heart.

At that moment I heard without the voice of Lillias, singing a simple carol used to lull the child learned at my mother's knees, and taught to her the day before; singing low, and as with a waking angel's voice. By an irresistible impulse I dashed the wand to the ground, and bowed my head as I had bowed it when my infant mother complained, without an effort, mysteries more solemn than those which perplexed me now, Death's very eyes, and looked round the vaporous, hazy cloud had passed away, or melted into the ambient rose tints outside which the sun had risen.

There, by one of those common reactions from a period of overstrained excitement, there succeeded to that sentiment of arrogance and daring with which these wild, half-conscious invocations had been fostered and sustained, a profound humility, a wearing fear.

"What!" said I, inly, "have all those sound resolutions, which my reason founded on the wise talk of Julius Faber, melted away in the reach of bargered, dissolving fancies? Is this my boast as intellect, my vaunted science? I—I, Allen Penwick, not only the believer, but the priest, the blundering practitioner, of an evil magic! Great what may be possible, however incomprehended—great that in this eccentric movement of antique superstition there be some real powers—chemical, magnetic, no matter what—by which the imagination can be strangely influenced, indeed, so that it shapes the things I have seen, speaks in the tones I have heard, creates what shall I keep ever ready, at the caprice of will, a constant tempter to steal away my reason and fool my senses—for, if on the other hand, I trust my sense to admit what all other men must reject —and I anchored myself to belief in the wind of my ear or my fancy informs me, grief—human grief—is about to befall me, and I, at the stage of impatient sorrow, have recourse to an aid which, the same voice declares, will subject me to a tool and a slave?—tool and slave to a being I dread as a foe! Out on these nightmares! and away with the thing that bewitches me! I will conceive them!"

I rose; I took up the wand, holding it so that its hollow should not rest on the palm of the hand. I stole from the house by the back way, in order to avoid Lillias, whose voice I heard still singing low, on the lawn in front. I came to a creek, to the bank of which a boat was moored, small in chain, moved on a drag of stone into the lake, and dropped the wand into its waves. It sunk at once; seemed a ripple formed on the surface, not a bubble arose from the deep. And, as the boat glided on, the star mirrored itself on the spot where the placid waters had closed over the tempter to evil.

Light at heart I sprang again on the shore, and hastened to Lillias, where she stood on the silvered shining sward, clasped her to my breast. "I will be a fool!" I muttered exultingly, "if enchantments for me but thine! Thine are the spells by which creation is beautified, and in that beauty hallowed. What though we can see not into the mysterious future from the verge of the moment—what though sorrow may come as while we are dreaming of bliss, let the future not rob me of thee, and a balm will be found for each wound. Love me and trust me, oh my Lilias; truth to truth, side by side, till the grave!"

"And beyond the grave," answered Lilias, softly.

JOHN SPENCER'S CHRISTMAS DINNER.

CHRISTMAS-DAY dawned clear and frosty. The snow lay deep in the city streets, but deeper still on the country roads and in rural districts, where then up to a levelwith the stone walls. Feathery flakes weighed down the branches of the trees, and gave to the whole landscape the appearance of dazzling white with which a New England winter makes us so familiar. Blocks of hay were so completely invested that they might easily be mistaken for mounds of snow. The ruddy-cheeked farmers' boys with their trousers tucked into their boots, manfully attacked the large drifts, and with shovels opened out a way through every obstacle. Now and then the jingling of bells announced the approach of a sleigh or pung making its slow way through the encumbered roads, the horses neighing and snorting with the exertion they were compelled to make.

In a two-story house, accessible from the main street by a narrow lane and full half a mile from any other dwelling, lived John Spencer. There was nothing remarkable about the house. It was a plain building of two stories, built after the usual want of taste which distinguishes the farm-houses of New England. In the main part of the house there were two rooms on a floor, one on each side of the front door, while an L part of later date contained a kitchen, and overhead a bedroom. It may appear singular that this L part was the only portion of the house which its owner chose to occupy. The other rooms, though furnished and ready for occupancy, had not been used for years. No fire had been kindled in the old-fashioned fireplaces since the last female occupant had been borne out in a coffin fifteen years before.

For fifteen years John Spencer had occupied the house alone. Such had been his choice, since at various times he had been invited to let the remaining portion, but had invariably refused. His life was the more singular, as in his solitude he had developed a strong passion for money, and in his own expenses had shown himself extremely ill to degree. Little was known of his housekeeping, and his purchases in the village were so scanty, that conjectures could readily be formed as to his style of living, which, so far as could be judged, would hardly have proved a feast even for a single man.

In the farmers' houses in the neighborhood Christmas received a noisy welcome. Young children danced with delight as they took from the mails to which they had suspended them the presents of Christmas stockings, and vied with each other in being the first to offer the good wishes of the season. Worse there are children Christmas is a festive season, and is greeted with joyful acclamations. The boys with the board grown with the weight of dainties, and for once the careful mother throws to the wind prudential considerations, and puts no check upon the appetite of young and lusty offspring. But in John Spencer's dwelling Christmas dawned gray in the city other day. It is doubtful if he would have known of its arrival, had not some adventurous urchin in the joy of his heart so far forgotten his usual awe of the house as to come to greet him with "Merry Christmas!" that very morning. John Spencer eyed the little fellow with some surprise, and muttered, that he did not know that it was Christmas-day, to the great amazement of the boy, who reported Mr. Spencer to be a queer saint in the calendar, and the day consecrated to him the most important of the year.

Quite opposite to the usual custom in the day, John Spencer had seated himself in the room which served him as a kitchen and dining-room. It was seated on a three-legged stool, such as is sometimes used in milking. Before him was a large pile of corn, which he was engaged in husking. A bushel-basket at his side received the ears of corn, while the husks were carried into another to serve for fuel. While he is at work let us glance at him. His figure, which is spare, is tall and somewhat stooping. His age is about sixty, and he has not spared him, and his strongly-marked features give the impression of a more advanced age. Like most who are long habituated to be solitary, then society he has an abstracted look. You can read in the rigid lines of his face that the love of his lives for himself, and is seldom called to sympathize with the joys and griefs of others.

For two hours he worked steadily at his self-imposed task; but when the last ear had been husked he rose from the stool and set about preparing dinner. That was no frugal fare which he is keeping with the day. A couple of sausages were placed on what he was pleased to call a spider, and a piece of bread were cut for toasting. These preparations completed, John Spencer was about to resume his seat when he was arrested from his purpose by an unusual circumstance.

A knock was heard at the door, and an in distinct sound, something like a moan, seemed to blend with it.

In great surprise John Spencer advanced to the door and opened it cautiously. He had hardly done so when a woman, holding a child in her arms by the hand, staggered in, and, shaking upon the very sat chair, murmured, "Help us, in Heaven's name We are perishing with cold!"

The unexpected host started in astonishment. He had acted so long in solitude that it was a novel feeling for him—that of compassion for others. He looked steadily upon the wife of the sailor, and then at the child, and his countenance softened. His cheek was the more singular, as in his solitude he had developed a strong passion for money, and in his own expenses had shown himself extremely ill to degree. The unexpected host started in astonishment. He had acted so long in solitude that it was a novel feeling for him—that of compassion for others. He looked steadily upon the wife of the sailor, then at the child, and his countenance softened. His cheek was something in the boy's robin that reminded him of his own. He gazed intently upon his face, and then laid his hand over his brow as if to recall some vague memory. With a degree of excitement unusual in a one usually so grave and self-contained, he advanced, and placing his hand on the boy's shoulder, shook him roughly. "Quick, boy, speak!"

The boy looked up in surprise.

"My name is Jack Halliday," he answered.

John Spencer started back as if the touch had stung him, and turned hastily to the woman, who was regarding him with a look of astonishment.

"It is true," she said, anticipating his question. "You see before you, John Spencer, one against whom you have had just cause of complaint. I am Margaret Evans."

"You have darkened my life, Margaret," said John Spencer, bitterly. "You have cut me off from joys I might have known. You have made me to differ from other men. Here for fifteen years I have lived a solitary life, finding little joy in my own companionship, yet averse to that of others. You have much to answer for, Margaret."

"I have suffered much, John," said the woman, sadly. "Too late I discovered the mistake I had made in giving you up. I do not wish to speak harshly of his father"—she pointed to the boy as she spoke—"but he did not make me happy."

"Where is he now?" asked John Spencer, in a constrained tone.

"He is dead!"

"Dead! How long?"

"A year since. Do not ask me to describe his death. It was terrible—he habits were not good."

"And since then?"

"I have submitted to much privation and much suffering. My husband left me nothing. I was in a great city, with no friends to care for me or help me. I kindled my strength to the utmost, but the world is a hard step-mother to her needy daughter. In my despair I at last bethought myself of you. I scarcely dared meet you, for I knew that you would fling away your heart, but I knew that you used to be generous, and I thought the sight of my distress might lead you to think kindly of her for whom you once professed to esteem."

John Spencer listened with downcast eyes and varying color. At length he looked up.

"You do not know the change that has been wrought in my character, Margaret," he said, "I was once generous—at least I think so—but later years have made me selfish. I had no one to care for, and for me what are called life's pleasures moved me little. So for fifteen years I have lived as you see."

He glanced as he spoke around the lonely furnished room.

"Do you know what they call me in the neighborhood, Margaret?"

She looked at him, half inquiringly, half timidly.

"They call me miserly; and though at first it made me angry, I soon came to feel that they were right. They never come to me for charity. I am generous."

"I have been greatly to blame, John," said Margaret, in a subdued tone. "I am the guilty cause of this great change in you. I feel that I have much to answer for, but I trust you have warmed ourselves we will go."

"Where?" demanded John Spencer, abruptly.

"I know not," said Margaret, turning pale. "But I think God will not suffer us to perish."

"Neither will I. For to-day at least you shall be welcome in this house. Stay, you must be hungry; is it not so?"

"We have eaten nothing since yesterday."

"Nothing since yesterday! And this is Christmas-day. No one should go hungry to-day. I must attend to that. But in the mean time you shall not wait. Here are some sausages and toast which I had just cooked for myself. You shall take them from the stove, and you and the boy shall eat them."

"And you cooked them for yourself."

"Do not mind me. I can wait a little longer. Besides, I have gotten a service of you which you can not perform if you are faint."

The boy watched the plain viands with eager eyes while they were being taken from the fire, and needed no second command to partake.

While they were eating John Spencer left the house.

It was half an hour before he returned. There was a large basket hanging from his arm. He came in stamping the snow from his boots, and set the basket on the floor.

"Margaret," he said, turning to the mother, "I must devolve my duties upon you. I have been accustomed to cook for myself, and not for others. I have something in my basket which goes beyond my skill. Boil these, I pray you."

He lifted the cover and displayed a plump turkey and a variety of groceries.

"I will see to it," said Margaret, but I think I remember that my mother used to have for dinner on Christmas-day. I will see how well she has done it. But to-day at least we will revive the old custom. What say you, Margaret?"

Margaret was already on her feet, ready to set about the preparation of the Christmas dinner. The boy's eyes sparkled with delight at the prospect before him. The lonely, gloomy mansion of one who, an hour since, had been a homeless wayfarer!

It was two hours after the usual time before the dinner was served. It was wonderful to see what interest John Spencer took in its preparation. now he assisted to the extent of his ability; and when the turkey was done to a turn, how he watched Margaret as she basted about.

Suddenly he left the house and returned with a large pitcher of cider, which he had taken from the open the door of the old sitting-room, which for years had been unoccupied. There was a bright fire blazing in the fire-place.

"We will have dinner here, Margaret," he said, quietly.

In due time the dinner was ready. The turkey was done to a turn, and for the pudding nothing could be more delicious. It was a merry party at the head of the table it seemed to him like a dream of his life rioting in the holiness of love, and he forgotten past became a reality. His heart was stirred by feelings long dormant, and the thought of returning to the long monotony, now so strangely interrupted, made him shudder.

"Margaret," he said, abruptly, "why should not this continue?"

"I do not understand you," she said, timidly.

"I mean to say that you will be my wife. You need a home which I can give, and I shall be the happier for your presence."

"You are very kind, John, but I can not let you sacrifice yourself out of pity for me."

"Listen to me, Margaret. I loved you many years since, and I find that in spite of all that has passed I love you still. Will you be my wife?"

"Yes, John."

That was all she said, but it was enough. So it was all arranged as they sat over the Christmas dinner.

The marriage took place on New-Year's Day. There seemed no good reason for delay, since John Spencer had already waited twenty years for his bride. Of course the neighborhood talked largely in gossip, but this concerned John and Margaret not. After long musing on the restless ocean they had at length found a quiet haven.

May they be happy, and all others who sit beside the Christmas fire!

STOCKINGS AND MITTENS.

THE summer's grain is harvested,
The yellow corn is housed;
The meadows now are tenantless,
The flocks are in the fold.
The rustling of the autumn leaves,
That flutter on the ground,
Proclaims the coming winter-day,
With a melancholy sound.
In the horror of the battle,
In the hurricane's madness,
Of the hissing rifle-ball;
In the toiling of the marching,
In the dread of death, exarching,
Ere our gallant soldiers fall:
There is pleading for the needing
Of the feet so sorely bleeding,
And the cold and blistered hands.
Of the hands so true and ready,
Of the feet so strong and steady
Of our gallant brave bands.

And a demon, fierce, unyielding,
In his hand, the sighd-dump wielding,
Walks he silent, deadly round.
Tortured, tried, but nothing fearing,
For they know his arm enclearing
Them to kindred hearts of steel.
There they stand, still patient waiting
For the future's earnest freighting
Soon from those dear hearts to come.

Still the thousand needies ringing
Make a music all their own,
Seeming like a low, sad singing—
Sad harmony in the time.
And the little Maltese kitten,
Gently playing with the ball,
Ordains it the sock and mitten
Mean to confiscate it all.
Now the cloud is rising slowly,
For a mission great and holy
From a thousand loving hearts;
Winds among the tangled mazes,
Where the soldiers' bivouac blazes,
Past the grimy powder-carts—
Past the danger of the rifles,
Past the smoke that curling rifles,
Through the guarded picket stakes.
There they stand, worn out with labor,
Father, Brother, Husband, Neighbor,
"Take and wear them for our sakes!"

THE BATTLE OF DRANESVILLE.

WE publish on page 29 an illustration of the BATTLE OF DRANESVILLE, from a sketch by an officer who was an eye-witness. The following is the official dispatch from General M'Call to General Marcy, recounting the facts:

OFFICIAL REPORT FROM GENERAL M'CALL.

HEADQUARTERS, DRANESVILLE, Dec. 21.

General Orb's brigade, with the First Regiment of Pennsylvania Reserves, and a battery of artillery, had a brisk affair with the enemy, consisting of four regiments and a battery of artillery, on the Leesburg road, on Saturday.

I arrived during the action, and sent for General Reynolds, who was in charge. The enemy's battery was defeated, and fled before General Reynolds arrived with the First Regiment of Pennsylvania Reserves.

The enemy's loss is two killed and three wounded. We have taken two colonels with the horsemen, the horses having been killed.

The regiment of rifles behaved finely. Lieutenant-Colonel Kane received a very slight wound, but is still in the field. I have collected the dead and wounded, and sent them to their lines to-day.

GEORGE A. M'CALL, Brig.-Gen. Commanding.

A correspondent of the Herald adds the following:

Meantime General Orl advanced to Thornton's House, near Dranesville, and the enemy's force suddenly fired upon by a force lying in ambush in dense woods adjacent. This was the signal of battle, and the engagement promptly opened.

General M'Call, who arrived a few minutes previously, took command. In a moment's time Easton's battery was planted alongside the Thornton House, and fired rapidly and with terrible effect in the enemy's ambush. Colonel Kane's 11th Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves, and Colonel Simmons's company also very much assisted the rebels, who had a battery of six pieces, returned the compliment with spirit, and for a time the contest was very hot. The firing was kept up some three-quarters of an hour, when the rebels retreated precipitately, the fire of the whole brigade, rifles and battery, being too hot for them. Our troops then started in pursuit, but the strategem of the rebels. Their steadiness was praised by General M'Call and his officers.

The rebels took the direction of Fairfax Court House.

leaving on the field a number of their killed and wounded. Our troops pursued them a short distance, but returned.

The arms in the works presented all the horrors of a sanguinary battle-field, and the ground was literally strewn in various directions. Forty dead bodies of the rebels were picked up, and fifteen wounded prisoners were taken and placed in Hooker's and other houses in Dranesville.

General Ord captured eight wounded prisoners and two colonels with commissions. In their haste the enemy left behind arms of all descriptions, clothing, etc.

Their loss is estimated at 150 killed and wounded. Among their killed was Colonel Tom Taylor, of Frankfort, Kentucky, and commander of the Fifth Kentucky Regiment of rebels. The forces of the enemy consisted of three infantry regiments, First and Eleventh Kentucky, and Tenth Alabama, with a cavalry regiment and a battery, all under command of General John B. Floyd. The First Tenth Alabama, acting Brigadier-General. The dead Colonel was also on the field.

The loss on our side was six killed and eight wounded, most of whom belonged to the Rockville. Colonel Kane received a slight wound.

THE STONE FLEET IN CHARLESTON HARBOR.

We publish on page 17 a view of the Sinking of the Fleet of Old Whalers, laden with stone, in the channel leading into Charleston harbor; and on page 18 a small Chart of the Harbor, showing the ship channels now closed by our vessels. The correspondent of the Herald thus describes the scene:

At half past four this afternoon (December 19), the tide being then half full, we removed the buoy and ran up into the bank Pendleton, of New London, which was to be the first victim, and towed her across the bar to the upper boat, on the left-hand side of the channel. When we had got her in position, Captain Dayton, of the steamer, a sprightly-tempered, elderly gentleman, called out to the captain:

"Ay, ay, sir," came back the reply: and the buoys we let go and manned in again on our deck in the twinkling of an eye. The trembling old bark, being under some headway, started slowly on for the chosen spot without her, and then struck the bottom; and her anchor dropped for the last time in the water, by which she resisted as gracefully as any chain might which had made its last run, and the old bark settled down into its own grave. The ship had been knocked out as the anchor dropped, and the water rushed madly and wildly in. In a moment the whole boats were lowered and alongside, and the steamer left the scene of action, and returned to the fleet for another victim.

We did not wait for them, but hurried out, to tow in another before dark. The first ship touched bottom and the sighing was drawn as the sun went down. Each had finished the course in the same manner; one by one the boats became as bright and glorious as ever, the other to waste away and go to places under the combined action of the element which it had braved as long and so well. Alas! that a single woman in the world should be made to weep and sad and cause to such an ignoble end.

The Talbot came next in our wood in and anchored at the other side of the channel, and the water soon filled her decks, and she settled slowly and gracefully down, resting unsteadily, to be sure, as the water poured in, but going down with every rope and spar in place, as if many days' sails in India, with no homes on.

The last ship on the port side of the bar clearly marked the course. The Fortitude boats were relieved from their unpleasant position, and the steamer proceeded to the next ship. She was reported by Captain Devin, and he reached the Pendleton and the Talbot just in the nick of time, as the ships they would alter for the moon had risen high enough to afford us light to see.

At eight o'clock we were again at work. We ran to and and took four more before the low water made it impossible for the low loaded ships to be got to position, and there we ran rest again and anchored outside the bar.

The steamer returned to the anchorage this evening. While we were at work the harbor was dotted with whole-boats, pulling about in various directions, and the sailors, carrying away their (the officers' and crew's) bearings: and the steamer was frequently boarded by the officers of the men-of-war boats were engaged in rowing the sunken ships, and have the pleasure of returning any thing they may wish to. From the "Home Journal."

"Of all the articles of the kind we have ever seen, no article combines so much of these two important things—beauty and utility—as the Adjustable Spring Dress Skirt Spring Saddle-tree, invented by Jesse A. Crandall. It is not fashioned in the form like a common hoop-skirt, to hang down from, can not be upset, does not wear carpets, but stands open in the back, and fits about as like the graceful folds of a live horse that the child never worries of it. This school of thinkers in every position, lying across the channel—some on their port, others on their starboard sides. Some were on their keels—others sunk. The ships sweep over some of them; others stood on upright keels, and rode out the storm in safety. The Talbot was raised then and dropped them heavily down upon the sand upon her starboard beam ends. She was the East Indiaman, brave Robin Hood, with her graceful, tapering masts towering aloft, and apparently still afloat.

SCENE IN THE PARLOR OF MR. BARNWELL'S HOUSE AT BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

FORT ROYAL FERRY.

We publish on the preceding page a view of FORT ROYAL FERRY, where the fight took place between our troops, under General Stevens, and the rebels. The following account from the Herald explains the affair:

We have received news of a victory over the rebels on the 1st inst., in a fight near Fort Royal Ferry, about twenty-five miles from Hilton Head. The expedition which achieved the victory was a combined military and naval one, and was under the joint command of Brigadier-General I. I. Stevens and Captain Quackenbush of the Pawnee. The troops engaged consisted of the Eighth Michigan regiment, Pennsylvania Round Heads, Fifty-Pennsylvania, Sixty-seventh New York Rifles, Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth New York Volunteers. The naval vessels consisted of the gun-boat Pilot, Seneca, Pawnee, and Ottawa.

A flank movement was made by the rebels, who desired possession of the ferry and burn the bridge, which operation the boat was allowed for that purpose, after which the rebels fell back upon the woods, and were followed by our troops, who, after a short advance, leaving behind them one large gun, which they had spiked. The rebel force engaged was estimated at eight thousand men, under the command of Ripley and Pope. The Federal force engaged was four thousand five hundred men. Our loss was one commissioned officer killed, Major Watson, of the Eighth Michigan Regiment, who has already died. The rebel loss is not positively known, but it is said to be pretty large.

We learn by telegraph, through rebel sources, that on the 30th inst. they our troops in full force, drove back the rebels, and took possession of a station on the railroad.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1862.

THE WEEK AND THE PROSPECT.

BY the time this Number of Harper's Weekly is laid before its readers the great and pressing the rebellion will have begun in real earnest. The long period of preparation will have ended, and the final tussle will have commenced.

There have been many among us who have complained of the long stage of inaction which has succeeded the battle of Bull Run. Many well-meaning but weak-minded and limp-backed citizens would have laid to see us march into our armies within a month after the Bull Run defeat; and have never ceased, since August last, to deplore the inaction of the Union forces, and the apparent progress of the rebellion. The fact is, that the Bull Run defeat was followed by a general disintegration of the Union forces. The bulk of the troops who fought on that disastrous day were three months' men, who went home directly after the battle. General M'Clellan, on assuming command of the army of the Potomac, found it to consist of raw levies, unacquainted with discipline, unprovided with arms, unable to move in masses, without military knowledge, equipments, or competent officers. It was a mere mob, in fact. His first duty was to convert this mob into an army. Jomini, quoting Napoleon, says that it takes six months to make infantry troops fit for service in the field, and twelve months to drill cavalry. If they are taken into action before this time, he adds, they are by no means likely to do harm than good. General M'Clellan's first orders, when he took the command at Washington were, first, a police order to put an end to the loose discipline which had previously prevailed among the volunteers; and, secondly, an order laying the foundation as fast as they arrived at the capital. General Burnside spent several weeks in the duty of brigading the regiments which poured into Washington, and daily brigade drills were ordered. When a sufficient number of brigades had been organized they were formed into divisions, and division commanders—Buell, Porter, Franklin, Heintzelman, Hooker, M'Call, Banks, M'Dowell, &c.—were placed in command and directed to train the men to move by divisions. All this naturally took time. The twenty-two weeks which have elapsed since the Battle of Bull Run are if any thing too short a period to perfect the officers in their duties, and the men in the various evolutions of company, battalion, regimental, brigade, and division movement. So far from complaining of McClellan's inaction experienced soldiers would rather advise his keeping his men in training for another month or two. No man would undertake to make boots, or coats, or books, or cotton cloth, or to sell merchandise or stocks, or to cure diseases, or plead lawsuits, after an apprenticeship of only five months and a half. If M'Clellan has educated his mob of volunteers to the proper pitch of military discipline in that period, all that can be said is that he has done wonders.

At any rate, we are led to believe that the real work is now about to begin in earnest. Before this paper meets the public eye, General Burnside's column will have commenced operations. It seems to be universally understood that it is to operate on the York, James, or Rappahannock rivers—being in fact a flank attack on the rebel army of the Potomac. General Magruder appears to be satisfied that it is to ascend the York River. Simultaneously with its operations, it may be expected that General Buckner will attack the rebel forces in Kanawha port, General M'Clellan will make a forward movement on the line of the Occoquan, and General Lander, who has taken the place of General Kelley, will move on Winchester, while General Banks moves on Leesburg. The assailed at all points, it is assumed that General Johnston will be compelled to give battle in the open field, and it is taken for granted that he will labor under heavy disadvantages that he can not but meet with defeat.

Meanwhile it may be gathered from the various contradictory rumors from Kentucky and the line of the Mississippi River, that, by the time these lines are read, the bulk of the army under General Don Carlos Buell will have crossed the Green River and will either have assaulted the rebel works at Bowling Green or will have turned the position. The new bridge over the Green River was to have been completed by 1st January. General Buell's antagonist, General Hardee, is described as a very capable officer, and was the commander of our army in Utah. He has seen active service in Texas and Mexico. Don Carlos Buell is to General M'Clellan's opinion that he will find his match in General Buell; and in numbers, equipment, arms, and discipline, our army is sure to be superior to that of the rebels. General Buell can not have for short of 70,000 fighting men under his command.

We look also, during the current week, for news of movements down the Mississippi. At the latest dates the whole of General Polk's force of gun and mortar boats had mustered at Cairo, and a land army of some 30,000 men was there to support them. It is expected that before these lines are read this army will be nearly doubled, and the flotilla will be ready for work. Opinion differ considerably more with regard to the policy General Halleck will pursue. Some authorities pretend that he will send his army in transports down the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers until a point is reached due east of Memphis, and that he will march on that city while his flotilla fights its way down the river. Others, again, look for a direct march from Cairo and Paducah upon Columbus, in conjunction with the advance of the fleet. If the former course be adopted, it is safe to expect that within a day or two the great Mississippi expedition will have begun its work, and that General Ulysses mem count upon success as reasonably certain.

We have made no allusion, in the above brief review, to the movements of our armies at the South. They will, however, naturally exercise a potent influence upon the grand result. At the time we write Port Royal, Beaufort, Savannah or Charleston, is in the hands of our forces, and we hold the railroad between those two cities. No force can advance on that from Savannah to Charleston, or vice versa, except by making a great detour. It is in our power to take either city at any time, and doubtless one or both will be captured very shortly.

Simultaneously the Butler expedition is operating vigorously in the Gulf. General Phelps, who is an excellent soldier, though a poor proclamation-maker, has occupied Ship Island, which commands the entrance between Mobile Harbor and Mobile, and also Biloxi, on the main land. The Constitution has since sailed with reinforcements, under orders for the general Butler in person, and it is well understood that his arrival will be followed by movements of great interest on the rebels in the Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana. The final operations against New Orleans will probably be deferred until Commodore Farragut's fleet, which is now actively fitting out, reaches the mouth of the river; but in the mean time it is likely that other places of scarcely less importance will fall into our hands.

The fate of battles rests with God alone, and no one can tell what fortune our brave volunteers may encounter. At the same time it generally happens that the heaviest artillery and the biggest battalions carry the day, and we believe we have the advantage in this respect. A few days now will tell the tale.

LOUNGER.

WHAT NEXT?

ALTHOUGH the immediate occasion of collision between this and the British Government has been removed, the manifest ferocity of the British feeling, as shown in the rhodomontade of the newspapers, is quite sufficient to apprise every sensible man that only the occasion, and not the cause, has been removed. Still further—the attitude of the British Government from the beginning of the rebellion has been passively hostile to the United States. Before Mr. Dallas left London, Lord John Russell explained himself very vaguely and unsatisfactorily with regard to the recognition of the rebels as an independent power; and the Queen's Proclamation, issued upon the very day of Mr. Adams's arrival in London, showed, beyond debate, the intention of the British Government to prejudge the question, and to act without authority together in regard to our conditions; and they informed other European states that they were expected to concur with them in whatever measure might be taken.

In the early summer began the movement of troops to Canada, and the shipping of great quantities of military stores to the same point, with the sailing of vessels of war. The refusal to offer of the United States made to Great Britain and France to accede to the Treaty of Paris was also significant, and the tone of the papers, accept upon condition of our assuming obligations which they declined to assume for themselves. The Mason intervention was agreed upon by Great Britain, France, and Spain, in the development of which a hostile fleet would be known last in the Gulf of Mexico. Meanwhile the British Government, through an agent here, but not officially, approached the rebel authorities to invite their virtual adhesion to the Treaty of Paris. The agent of this business was Robert Bunch, British Consul at Charleston. The letter proving the fact was found upon the person of Robert More. The removal of Bunch was instantly demanded by Mr. Seward. The matter was opened to Lord Russell by Mr. Adams, and the secret instructions to Bunch, "which are only now acknowledged because they have come to light," as Mr. Adams remarks, were communicated by the British Government with perfect coolness to Bunch. Mr. Seward, by the President's direction, very courteously withdrew his exequatur, notwithstanding the declaration of Earl Russell that his Government had not considered that the fact that what he did was the first step toward recognition.

The interior history of our relations with Great Britain since the outbreak of the rebellion fully authorize Mr. Seward to say, as he does in his dispatch of the 30th of December, that "the United States and Great Britain have assumed incompatible and thus far irreconcilable positions on the subject of the existing insurrection." The total absence of feeling which has ensued between the nations, the bitter expressions of animosity upon the part of England in the ludicrous drivel of the London Times, which calls the people of the United States "a people mad on cotton," the evil wishes of British hatred and insolence developed by the affair of the Trent—the unsteady assumption of the position of this Government; the open aid given to rebel ships and the common courtesies refused to ours, notwithstanding the claim of "belligerent neutrality" between an allied power and a faction of its citizens seeking to overthrow it—all these things are in sight now as they were in the rising cloud and the muttering thunder.

If in four or which ends in April the Government has not substantially suppressed the insurrection, or is not clearly suppressing it, Great Britain, France, and Spain will recognize the rebellion, the dependence of the rebellious section. As the rebel ministers are accredited to foreign courts and foreign fleets. Treaties between the two nation and the old will follow. It is to be reasonably supposed that the Treaty of Paris, perhaps waived by the French, will try to open the blockade. That act is war between us and those powers.

There would seem to be not a long time to complete so great a work. It can be done only by the most vigorous efforts. The Government must have a military necessity. The victory over rebellion must be overwhelming, radical, and final. Can we justly expect that Great Britain will allow the government to summon the insurgents to surrender under proof of losing the labor of their slaves in an unquestionable act of summoning them to do so under peril of loss of property and life. If such a measure be adopted, and the nation is saved, the endangered peace of the world confirmed, and the root of all our troubles is removed, will any honest citizen regret the great act of justice and mercy by the way? If such a measure be delayed, and the nation is dismembered, and reduced either to a foreign war and domestic disunion, will the Government, legislative and executive, have done all it ought to have done to avert so tragical a disaster?

MR. SEWARD'S LETTER.

THE enough has now elapsed to perceive that Mr. Seward's letter formed one of the most skillful and delicate tasks that ever devolved upon a statesman with such calmness, dignity, and consummate ability, that there is universal national assent. There are many who think that the surrender of Mason and Slidell was a mistake, to avoid a war for which we were not prepared; and they are glad that a humiliating necessity has been made so obvious that we others may be glad that the question was, at best, doubtful; and they are glad that, upon it, it has been decided to maintain ourselves. There are still others who think that the true American doctrine honorably required the surrender of persons who had violated the law and maintained its own principle even under the implied threat of war. "If I decide this case in favor of my own Government," says Mr. Seward, "I must disavow its most cherished principles, and must forever renounce my own opinions." If he therefore decige as an American statesman ought to decide. But national pride may be wounded, because pride always insists upon sticking to what has been done, right or wrong. But a national honor is eternally sustained, when the business of a statesman is to vindicate the honor of his nation, even at the expense of its pride.

We are not of those who regard Mr. Seward's letter as making the best of a bad case. On the contrary, if we were at perfect peace, and a similar case should arise, it would be the duty of the United States to take precisely the same ground. Some such declaration and such of conduct in the future events in universally conceded. That some things are contraband of war is equally recognized. That some persons may be contraband is not disputed. But the decision of what is contraband is property left to the discretion of prize courts; and the property must be so referred, how much more must persons? The judgment is too momentous to be left to a naval officer. If, therefore, in this case, the Trent had been taken into some prize port and condemned, and Slidell and Mason had not been restrained, we could not have released them without dishonor. If Mr. Seward could have answered the fifth question as easily and frankly as he did the first four, his conclusion, by his own reasoning and upon our usual principles, would have been that Mason and the British Government can not be granted. If we must follow, we have the fought that Government before upon the same question, and not unsuccessfully. We assert at the claim of Great Britain to make her own maritime law; that she could we have respected ourselves in fighting against the principle in 1812 that we fought so well for in 1812?

That Great Britain had what she called Captain Wilkes did, and with no provocation whatever. It was unjustifiable. But Great Britain set our model, thank God! in politics, in manners, or in nationality.

DO THE DOCTORS DISAGREE?

If we were so entirely in the right in the Trent affair as Mr. Everett and other eminent Doctors assured us, why do we consent to give up the two traitors, except because we can't help ourselves? Are Mr. Everett and the other Doctors of wrong? this is a question which a great many people are already asking.

Let us frankly grant, then, to begin with, that very few of us know any thing whatever about the legal rights or wrongs of the question. International maritime law are definitely settled only upon a few points, and on such, without exception attention to them, can say what those points are.

Now every thing that Mr. Everett asserts as and about international law in this case is asserted by Mr. Seward. They quote the same authorities, often the same words. Mr. Everett's only plausible consideration of the case is contained in his paper of the 7th December, published in the Ledger. He bases necessarily upon circumstances. He considers all the points of law that establish the right of a belligerent state ship, like the San Jacinto, to stop a neutral vessel suspected of carrying passengers and mails, like the Trent: and, in the words of Sir William Scott, "to stop the embassador of your enemy upon his passage."

Mr. Everett establishes the point beyond question. He describes, indeed, some arguments which Mr. Seward, as Secretary of State, can not admit. Mr. Everett, for instance, lays great stress upon the British proclamation of neutrality, forbidding subjects to carry dispatches, officers, etc., in a neutral vessel. Mr. Seward replies that he can not allow that mere rebels are belligerents. The English proclamation, in his view, is the declaration of an unfriendly purpose of the British Government; but this Government prefers to disregard its purpose and await the overt act of unfriendliness which is implied by the proclamation. When Great Britain follows the proclamation to its logical result, and recognizes the rebels as an independent Power, it will be time for this Government to act also. If Mr. Seward argued upon the ground of the proclamation, he would argue against the carrying of his own dispatches to our foreign ministers by England. Mr. Everett does not use the argument for his purpose, and he uses it ably, but the Secretary of State can not.

Mr. Everett's most fairly conclusive reasoning they reach the same result—namely, that Captain Wilkes had a right to stop the ship and the embassadors. There, however, Mr. Everett's argument ends and Mr. Seward's begins. He agrees precisely with Mr. Everett, that the ship was a case prohibited; that Captain Wilkes might lawfully stop the ship; that he did it properly; that having stopped the contraband he had a right to capture them; but that he did not exercise the right in accordance to the law of nations.

Therefore we were right, but not entirely right, and in such cases an incomplete right is not enough. We remind Mr. Everett that Britain the right of stopping the ship and the embassadors; but they none of them establish, because none of them has the Secretary discusses, the right of deciding the question as Captain Wilkes decided. Therefore, he says, we do not give up the trifle because we should have war if we did not, but because every part of the law is equally vital, and the act was not altogether lawful.

A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT.

TRUE, like Daniel, is a Daniel when it comes to judgment. For years, when we had no navy, when we had twelve ships and Great Britain had a thousand, we were constantly called to task by stopping our merchantmen and taking out whatever persons we pleased. Great Britain chose to call British subjects, although without any complaint against them. And this business was opened and approved by the Secretary of State.

A few weeks ago a loyal and brave captain in our navy, upon his own responsibility, takes from a British merchantman two American citizens plainly upon such a compulsory service as evidence of this Government. Great Britain trembles with rage, and so does all the Tory press that certain individuals have been actually taken from on board a British vessel, the ship of a neutral Power, while each vessel was pursuing a lawful and innocent voyage—an act of violence which was an affront to the British flag, and a violation of international law."

The demand is stern, but not to terms uncourteous. As the United States neither authorized the act nor justified the method, the certain individuals were "cheerfully liberated."

But now comes Mr. Seward, a Daniel come to judgment. If stamy time hereafter, in her Russopean or other wad, British cruisers should stop any neutral American ship and undertake to remove, or succeed in removing, any person claimed under any whimsey of owing allegiance to the British Crown, that Crown would instantly declare to Washington: "It thus appears that certain individuals have been forcibly taken from on board a United States vessel, the ship of a neutral Power, while such vessel was pursuing a lawful and innocent voyage—an act of violence which was an affront to the United States flag, and a violation of international law."

I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word.

FRANCE AND NEUTRALITY.

The letter of M. Thouvenel to Mr. Dayton Seward is interesting in itself, as showing the French doctrine of neutral rights. It is interesting historically, because thenceforward our troubles England and France have moved hand in hand. France asserts for herself the unquestionable right to carry, when neutral, to cover vessels and cargo between neutral ports, even although there be enemy's civil agents on board. The only doubt she raises, and that is but a doubt, is the case of "military people actually in the service of the enemy."

This ground, of course, concedes the right of search to ascertain that the flag is truly neutral, and not falsely borne; and that the vessel is making a neutral voyage but nothing further.

The United States, according to Mr. Seward's letter, takes the ground, that "whatever doubts may have existed concerning a right of visitation or search in time of peace, there is no question, has existed in modern times about the right of a belligerent in time of war to capture contraband in neutral and even in friendly merchant vessels." And the Secretary assumes, that, according to British maritime law, the fact of passage of the neutral "from one neutral port to another does not modify the right of the belligerent captor."

That country, of course, asserts the right of our cruisers to stop a French merchantman conveying dispatches or embassadors, and taking them before a prize court for condemnation. But under the doctrines advanced by France, if Breckinridge and Hunter should embark from Marseilles in a French mail-packet for a French port, the case of the Trent, mutatis mutandis, and the ship and passengers be seized for adjudication, would be brought into direct issue with France.

It is of the utmost importance to the peace of the world that the American question should be settled. The joint action of France and England, however, in the matter of our offer to assist the Mexican people at Paris, pure and simple—an action by which they proposed to impose a condition upon us which they did not accept themselves—produced a feeling here of any present adjustment. We must therefore all the more desire the direct complication of the kind may arise with France.

"MISTRESS AND MAID."

BOLWEN'S tale, "A Strange Story," regularly published in the Weekly, is about ended. "Hackaway's Philip," and Mr. Trollope's "Rachel Ray Farm," with its charming illustrations by Millais, are still proceeding amicably together in Harper's Magazine.

But the story-tellers never tire. Wilkie Collins, whose fascinating and famous "Woman in White" was read with such avidity, and mastered with such masterly skill by the author, is about commencing a new tale, of which the readers of the Weekly will have the earliest glimpses; while the author of "John Halifax," one of the most popular and delightful of late novels, begins in Harper's Magazine in February a story called "Mistress and Maid." The opening is most genial and charming. The Flemish detail of portraiture and scenery reveal the sharp eye and steady hand which the friends of "John Halifax" recall; while the sketches of the three sisters, the sedate elder, no longer young, the invalid second, and the younger, Hilary, only twenty, give promise of a tale of the truest interest, enlivened with the most smiling humor. It is a domestic story with a winning household voice in it, and yet even in the first chapter the rosy hue of romance invests it. The story is sure to be a delightful companion in these tumultuous times.

AGAIN!

A DAY or two before Mr. Seward's letter appeared, an English gentleman, rubbing his hands briskly, remarked to an American friend, "War! war! of course. You have insulted us, and we don't see just turn to and lay you down, and give you a good thrashing."

"What!" replied the American, quietly, scrawling carelessly upon the newspaper he was reading the figures 1775 and 1812, "What, again?"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AGRICULTURAL.—"I put outside my window a large hot, filled it with custard, and served it with seed. What do you think came up? Wheat, barley, or oats? No, a pound cake, who ordered me to remove it."

"First class in philosophy stand up. Thibeu, what is life?"—"Life consists of memory, a habit, and a faculty for wife." "What is poverty?"—"The reward of merit which genius receives from a discriminating public." "What is religion?"—"Doing unto others as you please, without allowing a return of the compliment." "What is fame?"—"A six-line puff in a newspaper."

An English gentleman once fell from his horse and injured his thumb. The pain increasing, he was obliged to send for a surgeon. One day the doctor was unable to visit his patient, and therefore sent his son instead.

"Have you visited the Highlanders?" said his father in the evening.

"Yes," replied the young man, "and I have drawn out a form which I ascertained to be the chief cause of his agony."

"Joel!" exclaimed the father. "I trusted you had more sense; now there is an end to the job."

A celebrated poet advertised that he would supply "lines for any occasion." A fisherman sought him soon after, and wanted "a line strong enough to catch a perch."

Somebody has said that "We ought always to believe less than we are told." This may be a safe maxim for general use, but when a woman informs you of a fact, for instance, of course—with her age, you may always believe a great deal more than you are told.

"What have you got to say, old Sinner-face?" said a commodore to a tarpaw at the late Cambridge Assizes, "why don't you answer the farmer." "I am thinking my face and your Cap'n-head would make a very good dish."

"James, my boy, take this letter to the post-office, and pay the postage." "Ha boy returned highly elated, and said, "Father, I took a bit of mea putting letters in a little place, and when no one was looking I slipped your in for nothing."

It is related of the French family of the Duke de Levis, that they have a picture in their chateau in which Noah is represented sitting on the ark, and contemplating with a small trunk on which is written, "Papers belonging to the Levis family."

"My family, surely, is the more ancient, for the killing of Abel by Cain was the first criminal case," said a lawyer to a medical friend. "Sure enough," replied the doctor "but notice that happened a rib was taken out of Adam's side, and that constituted the first surgical operation."

A lady, very fond of her husband, notwithstanding his ugliness of person, once said to Rogers, the poet, "What do you think? My husband has laid out fifty guineas for a baboon on purpose to please me." "The dear little beast!" replied Rogers; "it's just like him."

Some minds will always be slow till you cut them to the quick.

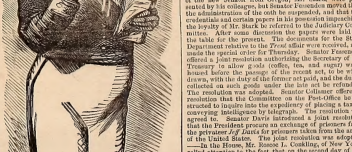
We suppose that there is quite as large an amount of cash upon the land as there is upon the water.

Swinging is said, by the doctors, to be a good exercise for the health, but many a poor wretch has come to his death by it.

A beggar boy applying to a lady at Boston for money to get a dose of castor-oil, was called in, and the oil was administered gratis, despite his grimaces.

"How are you to-day?" inquired a doctor of his patient. "A little better, thank you." "Have you taken any drops to-day?" "Yes, a little punch." "With aspirits?" "No, Sir, with applesauce."

Wanted to know—whether the volume of sound has yet been found.



A curate having been overhauled by his bishop for attending a ball, the former replied, "My lord, I were a parish" "Oh indeed," returned the bishop, "I did not see face on the affair."

The "don" who was told that the best cure for palpitation of the heart was to marry the girl he loved, said, "But that is the only remedy which can be proposed, I, for one, say let 'up palpitate.'"

It is a current belief that a wolf is never more dangerous than when he has shegrief.

A lawyer once asked a backward lad before the following question: "If a man gave you a hundred pounds to keep for him, and then, on his return, he asked you to give it back." "No, Sir," replied the latter; "I pay for another like him."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 9th, in the Senate, a number of petitions were presented in connection with the manner the war power were prosecuted. A communication was received from the Secretary of War, stating that the contract made with the public interest to furnish the correspondence relating to the case of Fremont. Several bills and General Patterson relative to the conduct of the war. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, introduced a bill to confiscate the persons enemies, and for sanctioning their property for the use of the United States Government. Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill to provide for the better organization and discipline of the militia. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Wilson introduced a resolution to gain into creating ports of entry. Mr. Potter offered resolutions calling upon the President and Secretary of the Interior to furnish the cabet commission appointed to investigate the alleged illegal acts of government employes with certain information, in order to make the investigation. Mr. Wilson moved to take up the bill relative clerks in the public employ who are disloyal to the Government. The resolutions were adopted, and the bill itself were not acted on.

On Tuesday, January 2, in the Senate, petitions were presented for the emancipation of slaves under the war power, and for the establishment of a line of steamers between San Francisco and China. Senator Kennedy presented a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for information relative to the Indian Department. Senator Wilson offered a resolution, which was adopted, that the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate the correspondence relating to the surrender of the Congress laid at Paris in 1856, relating to neutral and belligerent rights on the ocean. A bill, providing for the appointment of sutlers for the volunteers, and defining their duties, was introduced by Senator Wilson, and referred. Senator Wilson offered a resolution directing inquiry with reference to the organization of the military force; also a resolution calling for information as to the number of cavalry regiments now in the service of the United States they are stationed, and if it would not be advisable to convert them into infantry regiments. The bill introduced by Mr. Harris—both adopted. The Secretary of War was requested to furnish the reports of the Surgeon-General, Paymaster and Sanitary Commission on the health of the army. Senator Wilson introduced a resolution requesting the Secretary of War to furnish information why certain Massachusetts and Delaware officers were transferred and removed. Mr. Trumbull offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information respecting the national debt, which was adopted, but it was amended and was not received.

On Monday, January 6, in the Senate, the credentials of the new Senator from Oregon, Mr. Stark, were presented by his colleague, but Senator Collamer offered a resolution that the Committee on the Post-Office be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing a lot on conveying intelligence by telegraph. The resolution was agreed to. Senator Davis introduced a bill declaring that the President procure an exchange of prisoners from the prisoner of Libby for prisoners taken prisoners of the United States. The joint resolution, adopted by the House, relative to the Bank of the State of New York—of the safest alternative to the bill, that on the record of the Senate. The resolution was adopted requesting the Secretary of War to inform the House whether any officer has been taken to ascertain who are responsible for the defeat of the Union forces at the battle of Bull's Run. To the resolution the military authorities made answer to the effect that the proposed investigation would be incompatible with the public interests. This answer Mr. Cushing, Mr. Lovejoy, and others denied. Considerable discussion ensued upon the management of the Bull's Run affair, and the conduct of the war generally. In the course of the day, Mr. Cushing offered a resolution declaring that the action of the War Department in withdrawing General Stone from obedience to the House, and that the House be requested to furnish a copy of the order. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 79 against 54. A joint resolution was introduced by a vote of 79 against 54. A joint resolution, relative to the payment of duties on coffee, and copies from bonded warehouses on the 1st of August, was adopted. Another resolution, relative to the payment of duties on sugars, was adopted.

SKIRMISH IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Our troops in Western Virginia had a brisk skirmish with the rebels at Hunterville on Saturday morning. Rebels reached a company of scouts. A body of our men, numbering seven hundred and forty, and consisting of a portion of the 47th Ohio, Second Virginia, and Ohio cavalry, made an attack on Hunterville, which was occupied by four companies of rebel infantry and three hundred and fifty infantry, and after an attack of an hour drove the rebels, who were defeated with a loss of eighty killed and wounded. No one was killed on the Union side. The enemy retired from the town, leaving eighty thousand dollars' worth of army stores and clothing in the hands of our troops.

DEPARTURE OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

Messrs. Mason and Slidell have taken their departure for England in the British war steamer Rinaldo, which arrived at Provincetown on the 8th December. They were taken from Fort Warren by the tug-boat Starlight at eleven o'clock on 1st January, and put on board the Rinaldo, together with their secretaries, Eustis and M'Farland. The Rinaldo left Boston at eleven o'clock on the morning of New-Year's Day, the wind at that time blowing a perfect hurricane.

RELEASE OF UNION PRISONERS.

Two hundred and fifty Union prisoners were brought to Fortress Monroe on Friday, who were released from Richmond. They were brought down by James River by the rebel steamer Northampton, and put on board the steamer Baltimore, which had been sent from after Savannah by Baltimore.

A LANDING IN MISSISSIPPI.

A rumor was published in the Richmond Dispatch of Friday, December 27, that the Federal troops had landed on Ship Island, in the Mississippi Sound, to Biloxi, a small town on the main land, where they found the flag was a thousand men, and that the Union troops would soon occupy that place. The rumor is thus in that vicinity, and inland to push on to Jackson.

TRIBULATION ON THE YORK RIVER.

It was learned yesterday, from contrabands and the small canoes off Back River, in the Chesapeake Bay, last week, that the inhabitants of Yorktown are in a state of great trepidation, fearing that the destination of General Burnside's expedition is to that place. Many of the poor whites are said to be under an Yorktown by fire, and that he was directed not to spare a single house in the event of his approach.

The steamboat Jamestown, which left Fortress Monroe on the 2d inst. for Yorktown, with a flag of truce to convey a number of citizens of that town to Fortress Monroe, although in the service of the rebel government, was fired into by a gunboat of the Union troops. Upon the arrival of the steamer the captain of one of the gunboats came on board to search the mail. Breast-works extending for nearly a mile, pierced for twelve guns, were erected during the fall of 1861.

BATTLE EXPECTED IN KENTUCKY.

Information from Green County, Kentucky, represents that a battle had been fought at Munfordville, the fighting force of the Union and rebel armies are in close juxtaposition—the rebels on the south and the Union forces on the north side of the river.

THE CHARLESTON BLOCKADE RUN AGAIN.

It is stated in a passenger of the steamer Fingall arrived on Friday, and by the assurance of gentlemen who arrived at Fortress Monroe from Savannah, that the steamer Nashville, Burley tommy the Rebel, which arrived at Nassau, from Charleston on December 23, ran the blockade of Charleston at daylight on Tuesday, the 24 inst., and entered that port with a valuable cargo of cotton, specie, ammunition, and other stores, principally drugs. How she succeeded in doing so is not known to those in Nassau. It is also said that the rebel vessel had on board a Mr. Trenholm, a member of the Rebel Treasury to the rebel government.

THE NEGROES' WORK.

Within the past three weeks some of the Southern cities have suffered fearfully from conflagrations. Savannah is paralled. We give below the most disastrous fires, with the loss of property attending:

December 12—Charleston,	$6,000,000
December 23—Savannah,	50,000
December 24—Nashville, Tennessee,	800,000
January 1—Richmond,	50,000
Total,	$6,900,000

DISCONTENT AMONG THE REBELS.

The Richmond Examiner of the 3d instant has an exultant article on the schism of the rebel Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Memminger. The Examiner says that the rest, due on Confederate bond out of specie for which 50 per cent forty per cent. The cessation of the rebel army to picture by the rebel papers as almost hopelessly demoralized, and the rebel leaders as in a state of despair and disease. Drunkenness is said to be prevalent throughout the rebel army, and the rebel leaders are described generally as a terror and dread to the citizens of South generally.

THE RESISTANCE OF SAVANNAH.

The British steamer Fingall attempted to run the blockade of Savannah, but was foiled. She was fired at, and her way through Warsaw Sound; but information having been received that she was on the coast, the vessel was dispatched to the Sound, and on her arrival the rebel megaphone fleet of Tatnall came down to attack her. A brisk engagement is said was put through Commodore Goldsborough's fleet of vessels. The escape of the Fingall was thus frustrated.

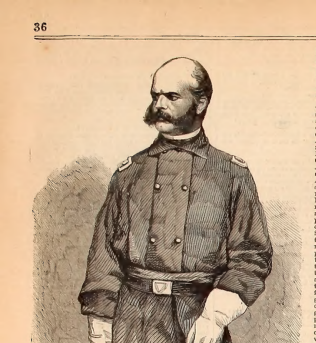
PERSONAL.

Mr. Greenlow, the female rebel, has been detected in carrying on a secret correspondence with the enemy, in spite of the close watch kept upon her house in Washington. It has, therefore, been decided to send her at once to Fort Lafayette, where she will have no opportunity of communicating information to the rebel leaders.

The Court of Inquiry, in the case of Colonel Miles, charged with habitual intoxication at the battle of Bull Run, has honorably acquitted him of the charge. The decision is furnished in a report of Reverdy Johnson and E. M. Stanton left.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.



WAR PREPARATIONS GOING ON.

The preparations for carrying on war under the pressure of a very intense and general excitement, stimulated and promoted by the daily effusions of the ministerial and aristocratic press. At latest date troops were still pouring in from the provinces. Regiments of artillery, Action, Pericles, Aeschylus, Fusiliers, and other regiments of infantry, were ordered, filled with the most efficient regiments in the British army. The Mediterranean squadron, the available vessels in the British Mediterranean fleet had been ordered to the American station to proceed, as was supposed, to the same destination.

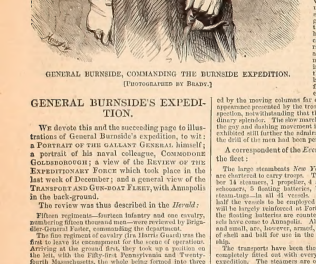
FRANCE.

SPANISH OCCUPATION OF VERA CRUZ.

The first hostile step of the allied expedition against Mexico was taken on the 7th inst., when the Spanish troops occupied the fort landed at Vera Cruz, took possession of that city and the fort of San Juan d'Ulloa. The Spanish flag was hoisted on the city and on the fort. The rejoicings in Havana on the receipt of the news were most enthusiastic.

GENERAL BURNSIDE, COMMANDING THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION.



We devote this and the succeeding page to illustrations of General Burnside's expedition, to wit: a PORTRAIT OF THE GALLANT GENERAL himself; a portrait of his naval colleague, COMMODORE GOLDSBOROUGH; a view of the DEPARTURE OF THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE which took place in the last week of December; and a general view of the TRANSPORT AND GUN-BOAT FLEET, with Annapolis in the back-ground.

The review was thus described in the Herald:

Fifteen regiments—fourteen infantry and one cavalry, numbering fifteen thousand men—were reviewed by Brigadier-General Foster, commanding the Department.

The troops were at seven o'clock this morning under the command, respectively, of Brigadier-General Foster and acting Brigadier-Generals Colonel Morse and Colonel Heywood. The parade-ground is situated about two miles from the city, on the railroad line, and afforded a fine opportunity for a good display of division, brigade, and regimental evolutions, as it embraced some two thousand acres of smooth ground, with graceful, swelling undulations, which served to add considerably to the picturesque character of the review. There were some fifteen thousand men on the ground, and the scene was one of the most interesting which has ever occupied the attention of the people of the vicinity of Annapolis, who flocked by thousands in vehicles, on horseback, and on foot to the parade-ground, every available point around which was taken possession of by them.

At about eleven o'clock the reviewing party, consisting of Brigadier-General Foster, Brigadier-General Hatch, Inspector-General Hendrick, Assistant Adjutant-General Richmond, and Aid-de-Camp Lieutenant D. C. Pell, of General Burnside's staff; Assistant Adjutant-General Hoffman and Aids on General Foster's staff; Captain E. R. Goodrich, of the Commissary Department; and various members of the division and brigade staffs of the post. Following on fast came the Governor of the State and the members of the Legislature, which by now in session at this place. Commencing at the right of the column they minutely inspected the different regiments, and, of the expression elsewhere highly pleased with the admirable good order and discipline of the troops. The brigade commanders, accompanied by their staffs, next reviewed their respective commands, and the reviewing party then took up their position at the southern extremity of the ground, at the right of the troops. Every thing being in readiness, the clear tones of command rang along the whole line, and steadily, solidly regiment after regiment passed into battalion column. At the word forward the whole body got in motion and filed by the reviewing general. The scene presented was one to inspire a soldier with enthusiasm. The glorious old flag floated proudly in the breeze, and the bands played inspiring martial airs, while the glistening bayonets and the gay and dashing movement in "double quick," which exhibited still further the admirable precision with which the drill of the men had been perfected.

A correspondent of the Evening Post thus sketches the fleet:

The large steamboats New York and New Brunswick are chartered to carry troops. There are now in the harbor 14 steamers, 1 propeller, 4 ships, 2 barks, 1 brig, 11 schooners, 3 floating batteries, besides a little flotilla of steam-tugs—in all 41 vessels. These are, perhaps, not half the vessels to be employed in the expedition, which will be largely reinforced at Fortress Monroe; for, unless the floating batteries are towed, they will be of little use. All of the transports, with the exception of the tugs, are armed, and carry large supplies of shell and ball for use in the field as well as on board ship.

The transports have been thoroughly overhauled and completely fitted out with every thing necessary for the expedition. The steamers are of light draught, and are capable of carrying from four hundred to six hundred men each, besides stores and ordnance, and when loaded will draw but from six to eight feet of water. There is no particular difference in these vessels, and every captain thinks his own, of course, the best. Every inch of space is devoted to use. Bunks have been erected and thoroughly put up, which can be taken down at short notice, if necessary to clear the ship for action, or an unpleasant thought to afford room for a sick one. The two steamboats New York and New Brunswick will each carry a whole regiment. The propeller Pioneer (formerly the Alabama) carries six guns, two of them formidable Parrotts, which speak with (not for) "vengeance" in the shape of 30-pound bolts. She is a good vessel and a good sea boat. She carries comfortably five hundred troops. Most of the steamers are equally well armed. The Highlander (once the Clermont, a confiscated vessel belonging to William Allen, on the James River) is a schooner of 500 tons, armed with two 12-pound Parrott guns, and capable of carrying, besides her crew of twenty-five men, four hundred troops and eighteen officers.

The ships can carry a much larger number of men, but will be loaded mainly with provisions and ammunition, and all the sailing vessels will be towed by the steamers to Fortress Monroe.

The Pickett, a handsome little propeller of four hundred tons, is the flag-ship of the transport fleet, and is appropriated by General Burnside and his staff. She carries two 12-pound rifled guns on deck, and but six feet of water. It is not unlikely that when the expedition reaches the point of attack General Burnside will leave the Pickett, and use the Cossack as a flag-ship. The Cossack is a fine steamer, formerly the Western City, plying between Boston and St. Johns, New Brunswick, and the new-paper man are already comfortably quartered on board of her. If she is struck by a shell the reporters will receive the credit of having intelligence of the same.

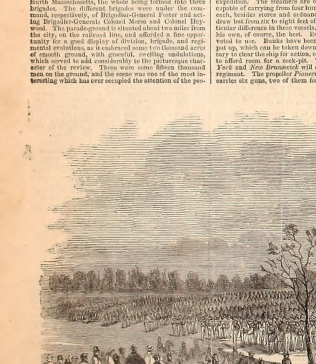
The two floating batteries are large canal boats, as strong as timber can make them, and divided into five compartments, so as to be beyond the danger of sinking by any ordinary casualty. The Zouave and Grenade each carry three 32-pound rifled cannon on deck, and the Lancaster, Lafayette, and Funkehill each carry two guns of the same calibre. They will go into action, and will be valuable auxiliaries to the naval part of the expedition.

This general description of a vessel of each class of those connected with the expedition is sufficient to give an idea of the completeness of the whole outfit. It seems as if nothing was wanting to render the fleet as formidable as it necessary, and, with the soldiers of the naval vessels now lying at Fortress Monroe, it is believed that the expedition, in size and strength, will far surpass the one sent to Port Royal.

THE ARMIES OF THE UNION.

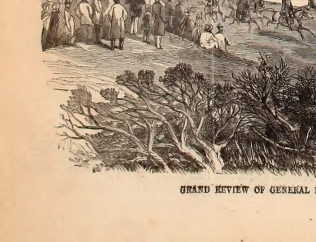
FROM Maine's deep-wooded hills to far Pacific's Golden Gate,
They gather to the battle with the plow, sure step of fate.
They ask not who their leaders be, they only know the enemy
Old feuds are hushed as each one round the sacred banner draws.

They come not here to plunder foes, they are not urged by hate,
Nor lured by hopes of conquest, nor by glory's glittering bait;
No conscripts they, contented to fight at any master's nod,
But each man is a freeman, who bows down alone to God.



Each claims the nation as his own, from distant shore to shore;
To each belongs the starry flag his patriot fathers bore;
And each has sworn no rebel knave shall rend the land in twain,
Or strike one star from off that flag, so long without a stain.

Full many a soldier's grave there'll be, full many a darkened home,
Where wives and mothers sickening wait for those who ne'er shall come.
Yet for each one who nobly falls another stands prepared
To take his place, to wield his arms, and dare all he has dared.



If fate should frown, and treason's flag, o'er many a stricken field,
Should proudly wave, there is a blood that knows not how to yield;
But gathering strength with each reverse, three stubborn ranks would grow,
As the torrent swells amid the rocks that vainly check its flow.

O could they fail, man's hopes would fall of freedom ever. more!
The peaceful reign of unarmed law and equal rights were o'er.
Then close your lines, and strike home deep amid the traitor clan—
No nobler cause the world has seen since man first warred with man!

GRAND REVIEW OF GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITIONARY FORCE AT ANNAPOLIS, DECEMBER, 1861.

THE VESSELS OF GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION AT ANNAPOLIS.—[Sketched by our Special Artist, Mr. Angelo Weber.]

BUILDING HUTS FOR THE ARMY ON THE POTOMAC.—[SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VA.

On pages 40 and 41 we publish a large view of the CITY OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, the capital of the pretended rebel Confederacy.

Richmond is situated on the James River, 23 miles north of Petersburg, 113 south by west of Washington, and about 150 miles from the mouth of the river. Its population in 1854 was 30,000; its exports about $9,000,000, chiefly wheat and tobacco. A gentleman who visited Richmond last summer gave the Herald an account of what he saw, and we subjoin the following extracts from his narrative:

The principal feature that strikes every one who sees Richmond for the first time is its curious topography. From the James River, which, tumbling over its rocky bed, makes a wide bend here, with its convex face to the city, rise, without any regard to uniformity of direction, some half-dozen hills, of gravel formation and of pretty considerable elevation. There has never been any attempt to grade them into level streets, but the city is scattered promiscuously up and an and over them, just as fashion, taste, or business may have happened to dictate. The principal part of the city, however, occupies actually only one of these elevations, and the garden spot of that one is the Capitol Square, where stands the building of which Jefferson procured the design in France, but which, however magnificent it may have been in the days of its comparative unostentatious days in which it was built, is certainly not to be lauded nor either for its beauty or for its adaptation to the wants of a State Legislature, much less to those of a Congress of Confederate States. In the centre of the Square is the beautiful equestrian statue of Washington, looking as calm and serene and commanding as if the city which he overlooks was not the centre and hot-bed of the rebellion treason that ever showed itself in the light of day. Around the base of this are the taller statues of distinguished Virginians, but those of which there are most are in their places. These are Jefferson, Henry and Mason—not the arrogant, self-conceited blockhead who recently represented the State in the Senate at Washington, and has now gone seeking recognition at London as the diplomatic representative of secessiondom, but a far purer, wiser, and more patriotic namesake of his. Here also is a small statue of Henry Clay.

THE WAR IN VIRGINIA—A RECONNOISSANCE IN A LAUREL-BRAKE.

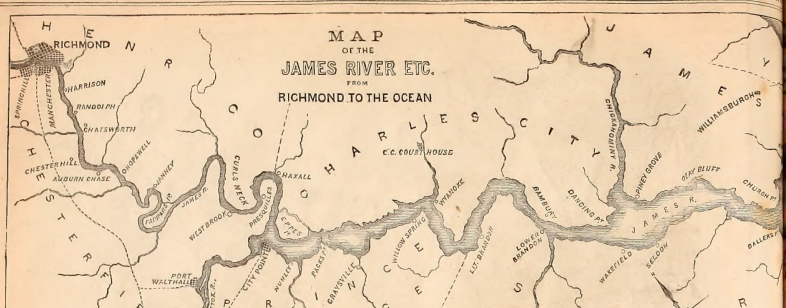
Richmond has really but one business thoroughfare. That is Main Street. Most of the hotels, banks, newspaper offices, and stores are located on it. It extends northward into the open country, and southeastward to a suburb called Rocketts. In this latter section of it are situated some of the tobacco warehouses where our Union prisoners are now confined. These are large old brick edifices, of squalid, dilapidated appearance. They stand three together on one side of the street—which here is of a most dingy character—and two nearly opposite. These on the north side are overlooked by the bluffs in which Church Hill here terminates, and which supply gravel for the city, while those on the south side of the street have the James River and Kanawha Canal, and the river itself immediately in their rear.



Near the summit of the elevation known as Church Hill is a large, old-fashioned brick building known as the almshouse. It has been converted from its original purpose, and now serves as a hospital for our sick and wounded. Sisters of Charity come and go, untiring angels of consolation, and the benevolent ladies of Richmond, so great is the mortality that prevails here, have opened the private houses in the vicinity are also converted into temporary hospitals. As a general thing, the former residents of this part of the city have gone elsewhere since the location of the hospitals here; and now on every tenth house or more you see waving a little dirty, whitish-yellow flag, denoting a lazarette. The 63d Fellows' Hall, on Broad Street, is also used as a general hospital. On the most commanding part of Church Hill still stands, in good preservation too, the church in which Patrick Henry made the famous speech at the commencement of the Revolutionary struggle, where he used that memorable and eloquent phrase, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" Around the church are the graves of the last generation of the people of Richmond, and I was no little disgusted to observe that few of the head-stones had escaped the profane Vandalism of some secessionist, who, as a proof of his wit, cut the figure "1" before the figures recording the age of the deceased, making it appear that those who rested here from their labors had enjoyed incredibly patriarchal length of years.

Between this hill and the rickety suburb known as Rocketts there is a large encampment, and I believe there are also batteries here, for the defence of the river. I know that there certainly are batteries on the bluffs, above and beyond Rocketts. Near here the ice steamers and sailing craft that used to trade to Richmond had their mooring-places, and here also the James River and Kanawha Canal has its southern outlet into the river. This is a great work of internal improvement, so far as the design is concerned; but, unfortunately for Virginia, her execution does not keep pace with her plans, and the canal, though open for many years, does not come within a long distance of the Kanawha River, which it was intended to tap. If it ever will do so, it must be after secession is crushed and the Union restored.

Richmond is not, as seems erroneously to be considered, garrisoned by a large army. There are only troops of instruction maintained here. The recruits are sent for drill and equipment, and when they are considered tenable in those respects they are forwarded to other points.

VIRGINIA.—[SEE PAGE 38.]

BUN'S HAPPY NEW YEAR.

"Well, I believe this is the end for to-night. Yes, that is the package of bills on the left. And you will communicate to Grede and Seyne first. The sooner it's over the better. Heigh-ho!"—and a long yawn exhaled with the cloud of cigar-smoke, and the face of the smoker seemed to assume a gray tinge in the grey light of the smoke.

The lawyer, drawing forth the package of bills on the left, remarked something pitifully to his wife on the other returned, between short, energetic whiffs,

"No, I don't think my creditors will give me cause for any great unfairness. I believe I have been, as you say, Mr. Waring, strictly honorable."

A slight pause, then a little shuttily, "But I wish it could have been deferred, at least. Bun will lose her Happy New Year now. Poor little Bun!"

The lawyer glanced up from his occupation, and as he fondled a soft arm across at the table, there was just the least surprise visible in his impassible face. What was it? What did he see in John Baylie to surprise him?

There was nothing strange to be seen. Only a man, young, lively, and going thoughtfully as he smoked into the blazing fire of sea-coal. A cool grave man to the world of business; some said a hard man, and at least to weigh carefully all the nice chances in the mercantile balance. Not less cool, not less grave now in seeming, but very pale indeed; and it might be that the shade of gravity had deepened to a shadow, and that a softer one than usual; or it might only be the shadow of thought that arose from the cigar. Who could tell? Not Mr. Waring with his one swift glance. Not especially the wife, dear John Baylie to whom tenderly. Who then? Little Bun could have told.

But after that one rapid glance the lawyer's interest in the matter appeared to subside, and the exclamation and the shadow went out of his mind together, for the matter of a few minutes, and passed quietly in business talk—cool, clear-headed recognizings on both sides, and no surprise. Only, as you would have said, a callous recognition and acceptance of certain bitter truths: so brave that when lawyer Waring walked home to his well-lit discomfort midnight he said to himself, "The man has splendid courage!" And on the still December midnight while losing home this man of splendid courage kept thinking, sometimes aloud, "Poor little Bun!"

As he turned to ascend the marble steps of his Fifth Avenue palace a carriage, with its span of blood-horses, dashed up, and immediately after a gas-light, dashed up to the curb-stone. It would seem as if the carriage and the horses were already in the lock, and a moment more he would have been out of sight, when a dear treble voice called,

"Papa, papa! I wait for—"

He stopped, hesitated just the fraction of a minute, then turned to meet Miss Waring's daughter, self-christened "Bun" in the days of her babyhood, out of some baby whim, which baby whim had clung to her for the last twenty years.

"You are back early," he said.

"Yes, and for such a funny reason. That clumsy Keyes—Clumsy Keyes, you know—caught my lovely thread-lace flounces in his ugly regimental sense way, and broke such a lot of them, I feel to come home. But I didn't mind, 'twas a stupid party. All my fun is in her box, and that isn't mine, but yours, papa, for I shall wear it only once to renew me for New-Year's night."

So, chattering in a bright, brilliant way, she had led him into the drawing-room, and now, under the full light of the chandelier, stood revealing the unlucky "fun" in a cloak of fur, trimmed, and torn, and cut by that "clumsy Keyes." In the midst of which revealing she gave a gay laugh as she recalls the unfortunate Captain, telling papa how absurdly he looked "flying down the room encwound in the long flounces of the thing," and papa smiles absently all the time, saying never a word; for all the time he is thinking, "This will lose her Happy New Year! Poor little Bun!"

Once at twelve he opened his lips to tell her about it; but she looked, a gay rustling creature, shook him, and then one o'clock struck from the French timepiece on the mantle, and rubbing a little while hand into the opulent gray in the head of the simplest little Bun goes yawning up to bed, dragging an ormolu clock by the hair. She is no doubt soon asleep, and smiling as she sleeps, very likely, over that "clumsy Keyes," while downstairs sits the man of splendid courage who hadn't courage enough to tell little Bun why she would lose her Happy New Year.

"I will tell her to-morrow," he promises himself. "I, for I will tell her to-morrow. She ought to know of course."

But when to-morrow came Bun was out when he was in. "Out driving, Sir," Ludemeuille Allen, her French maid, informed hi ::

"Out driving!" This was not pleasant to hear for John Baylie, and another sheet of paper that it violated a sense of propriety that his daughter should be "out driving" on the day when her fortunate was tinging with its new title of bankrupt. Much he regretted his cowardly "putting off" the night before.

"You will tell Miss Baylie," he said to Madelonsiele Allen, "that I wish to see her when she returns, and not to suffer her to go out until I see her."

It was late when the young lady returned. Her father would not be home till evening, the butler told her. But no one told her of his message; for only Madelonsiele Allen ever interrupted her in the out of that giddy French head the message went in fifteen minutes after it was communicated.

So in her ignorance Miss Baylie commenced her toilet for another party, under the supervision of the faithful Allen. It would seem that some untoward fate must have presided at that toilet; for never had Madelonsiele Allen succeeded so well in her mistress so brilliant—nay, almost gorgeous, in adornings as on this special evening. A dress of sheeny rose, liberally sown with pearls, whose rare, pale lustre gleamed with a fiery whiteness that seemed to absorb all light, and warmth, and color. Pearls, too, in her hair—splendid Persian pearls—and dropped like moon-spray on her neck and arms, where through mists of costly Flemish lace they sent out their subtle sparkle.

Madelonsiele Allen, who was not given to ecstasies, clasped her hands in a French order of admiration as she regarded her.

"Ah, ciel, you will kill somebody to-night, Mademoiselle!" she exclaimed; and Mademoiselle laughed, looked movies unwilling to fulfill the auspicious prophecy, and then, with a parting glance at her, and so ran down to the carriage, singing as she went the opening bars of Giacamento's Ero stella dal mattino. Beautiful like the star indeed, and as she ran all the hundred little stars, set in moonbeam spray upon her dress, danced out like fireflies.

It was fashionably early instead of late, and the ball-room was filled as she entered the dazzling room—Mrs. Vercleyne, who had rushed back from the Opera in the way to greet her some early. Was the dull stupid again so night?" Always mindful of the dignity of reserve; as haughty in her reticence as Beauharnais Waring, he was ten times as sensitive a regard to its breach. So his greeting in the hall of Wilton was plain-cool while a fire was raging within his breast. A nod beckoned her into the library, and he closed the heavy door before he spoke to her in the outside world. He knew why she had gone, for Allen's neglect of his message had transpired. Now what did she say?

Her first words thrilled him with surprise—with dread.

"Oh, papa, why did you not tell me?"

"Tell her—what?" he uttered, in his amazement. "Good Heaven! what did she have told? who had told her? I left a message for you at noon to remain in until I saw you, and Mademoiselle Allen forgot to deliver it."

"Oh!" faintly uttered, with nose relief in the tone, "I am glad of that. I am so sorry, papa, for you, I mean. I don't mind, you know."

He thought he would have to close with tears and terrors and, like Waring, he had been fortifying himself; and here she were, calm-eyed, unutterably puzzled, and glancing wonderingly at him. "I assument he could not see; a mist came over his vision; and he could find no words to answer her.

"I cannot think why you should have told me before she told her to untying the tassels of her cloak, and shaking away, with a little rounded kiss at her cheek, she replied, "Mr. Waring told me."

"Waring!" why had he told her?

It was a strange question—they two together. He eager, determined, expectant—and of the worst; she, laughing, and unbuttoning away from a cloak that haughty pride invaded, open to the world, and quivering with a double sense of suffering. She turned, tossed, and wore caressed, and wept, and lay scorned, insulted almost, and aching with the rude blow, but covering it over with a mask of calmness to save the pride of Beauharnais Waring.

Thus for a few moments they waited, hesitating, until he asked her in a husky voice,

"Why did Mr. Waring tell you, Rosamond?"

A moment more she hesitated; then, quite low in tone—not from delicacy at revealing—"He thought it wouldn't be pleasant for me to be there. He was much kinder to you, papa; and—and—he told me you were ill at first."

He rose and came before her. His voice was momentary quite gentle—so still, tender, deep for her. "Rosamond, was it not pleasant to?"

She trembled visibly, hanging her head at the unexpected question, and with gentle shame, yet caring more even than for the hurt to him.

"Not pleasant as usual, papa," she lastly laughingly answered.

All his suspicions were confirmed. The world had found out her secret, and hatred for years had struck back upon him in his only vulnerable spot—now his little Bun! This blow was more than he could bear calmly. Through his cool ease of manner vehement passion and tenderness proclaimed itself. Why did—why did—that was plain to an imprecation he took her to his breast.

"Child! child! how exclusive I have been to dare to insult you with neglect—with coldness!"

She had never seen her father moved before—her gay, trifling father, whose very touch was a kind word or a jest—and she trembled against his breast without a word.

By-and-by she said, as if in explanation, "It was not so strange, perhaps, papa, when you remember how I—I—" and she dropped the cloak from her shoulders, disclosing that sumptuous Princess Royal raiment.

His hand came down him as he regarded her. What might be not have saved her by an earlier confidence?

"Bun," he said, suddenly, "who was there that you know well?"

"Oh, every body almost! Henri Seyne, and—"

"Henri Seyne! was Seyne there?"

"Yes."

"What did he say to you, Bun?"

"Nothing, papa." He ground his teeth, and pressed something up and down the room. "The fools!" he muttered, "not to perceive at once that it was a child's ignorance. And Waring," he went on, "you did well, Waring, however, eh?"

She told him of his introduction, and all that followed.

As in a glass he saw every shade of this chivalrous conduct.

"God bless him!" he murmured, heartily, "Waring is a man!"

"And you think you will not mind, Bun?" turning again to her.

"Oh no, papa; you will be with me, and I shall like it."

"Like what, Bun?" he asked, smiling dreamily. "Oh, by-the-by, about what you were talking of. You mustn't think, papa, because I look so fine at night that I am thoroughly engrossed in the vanities of my dress. Aunt Anne ordered this for me, and I have thought very little about it indeed, papa, until to-night."

"And that was a sorry thought, wasn't it, Bun?"

"Oh, don't fret about it, I shan't! I shall be quite happy if I can see you cheerful, papa. It makes me ache so to think of you," she said, with a real ache in her voice.

He bent down and kissed her. "Child," he said, with much emotion, "the world has no power to make me suffer but through you. If I can carry you where its shafts can not reach you—if I can make you happy, I shall be happy. God bless you, Bun!"

The conference was ended, and they two alone in the world—father, yet not father, and child, yet other, separated with a new bond of sympathy that night.

A low, wide room, simply furnished—its view from two slender windows, the southwestern side of the country. To the north-east the Hudson—bay-head, showing greenly underneath a light glare of a January sun; to the west a light of hills, and flowering all, the level sweep of the sea. The wind howled savagely down the distant hills, and roughened the waters. The sun shone merrily through the murky scudding clouds; but within this low, wide room, a great fire roared and sang up the great chimney, and in the centre of the floor a table spread for two sparkled cheerily its plain dinnerservice in the light of the fire.

This was the home of Rosamond Baylie; and here, in this room, she—now her father—returned from town. A small, plain house for a palace of luxury. A single servant in place of a dozen obsequious attendants, and the rent reckoned by hundreds. This was the change that a week had brought to Rosamond Baylie. It would seem a hazardous experiment to transplant such an exotic to the loneliness of country-life in mid-winter; but John Baylie knew what he was about well. He had calculately educated, had the pure tastes of a gentlewoman. The simplicity of this stern country-life would strike her painfully than the gorgeousness of a fourth-rate city residence. For companionship he would see to it himself, and for the rest a couple hundred associates, and save her from utter loneliness.

So on this first day of January she awaited him. It was the day he had dreaded for her.

He comes in at length with his old, gay, brilliant manner, with a smile on his face, and pleasant words on his lips, but a stone at his heart. Throughout the dinner he was watching what they guessed but that he was the most contented of men.

At no grand entertainment had he shone so agreably by no more brilliant table-talk than that. The elegant dame at splendid festivities had he ever exerted all his powers of pleasing to charm more than the young girl sitting opposite to him. Books and people he discussed with her with a flattering deference he had never shown to the fairest among bits of gossip, stray reminiscences of his younger days, were thrown in as illustrations, while night settled down without and the fire flickered. Tea was heaped on, candles were brought in, and in the midnesses that followed they played a game at cribbage, with scattles of old songs, recitations of rare poems, etc., until the ancient clock in the hall proclaimed that the old year sat on the year in. Rising to bid her good-night, he risked the question which had been in his mind, putting it in a gay and careless manner:

"Well, has little Bun had a sorry New Year out here in the wilds?"

Her face grew radiant as she exclaimed, "Oh, papa, I never had such a Happy New Year in my life!"

"And you don't pine for the gay gallants you have left behind, with no one but an old rusty fellow like me, eh?"

"Pine!" She gave a little smile of ineffable amusement at connection with scorn. "Why, you are worth a hundred of them; and I shall never marry until I find one like you, papa—never!" And laughing lightly in a bright tinkle of merriment, she went up the narrow stairway to her tiny room, singing as she went that very Ero stella del mattino.

And this was Bun's Happy New Year he had thought she would lose.

So winter passed, and spring found them keeping excellent house-keeping—Bun's phrase.

Whatever of care or discomfort, and hard, bitter struggles John Baylie encountered fighting his way up again, he escaped them out of sight. Here he entered his home, and was only in the presence of his daughter the most agreeable companion she had ever met.

Whatever of inconvenience, of deprivation Rosamond Baylie endured, the same loving pleasure every night compensated.

But one thing a knowledge came to her which broke up the serene repose of her life. The servant they kept was an old nurse—Rosamond's foster-mother.

As Mr. Baylie went out that morning she looked after him, muttering, "He's growing thin under it!"

Her young mistress overheard her.

"What's that you say, Kathie? Who's growing thin under it?"

Kathie, thus surprised, answered, "Your father, Miss Rosamond dear. He's so afraid you will want for any thing he sits up o' nights working, writing till almost sunrise."

A flush passed over Rosamond's face. In her ignorance she had not seen that even so small an establishment required considerable money to keep it up. And here she had been idle while he was wearing himself out! What could she do? Who could advise her? Suddenly she remembered one who had proved himself a true gentleman, if not a friend, on that painful night. He was a lawyer. She had been told that lawyers employed a vast amount of copying; and Rosamond at once thought she dressed herself, searched out the lawyer's address from the directory, and started for the cars. It waited but five minutes to the time of leaving, but she reached the dépôt in season, and was soon whirling over the road to New York.

"A lady, Sir, to see you," the clerk communicates carelessly, and returns to his desk outside. Mr. Warling goes on writing, finishes his document, then touches the spring of the bell.

"Here," to the clerk, "file this with No. 30. Oh, James, did you say some one wanted to see me?"

"Yes, a lady, Sir."

"Show her in, I will see her now;" and Rensbaw Warling yawns rather wearily over the expected interview with some one of the numerous clients.

Simply dressed as she is, he does not recognize the young girl before him; for the little Bun he remembers was clothed like a fairy princess. A word startles.

"Miss Baylie! I beg your pardon."

With the same composure as another occasion she states her errand. Perhaps Renshaw Waring had fifty just such applications every day. He was obliged to disappoint fifty and grant fifty, if not more. He did not disappoint Rosamond Baylie, however, but made up a roll for her which would keep her employed a week.

"So you are out of town, your father tells me," he remarks to her as he is making up the package.

"Yes."

"It is a pleasant old place—Warehill."

"Do you know it, Mr. Waring?"

"I was born there, Miss Baylie. The property used to be called Waring Hill. It was afterward re-Warehill, which the country people shorten to "Ware."

She laughed a little, remembering Kathie's very pronunciation.

Presently rising to go, thanking him with a cool dignity which she might have given had he done her some service of gallantry at a party, she adds, "We should be pleased to see you, Mr. Waring, at Warehill."

He thanked her courtesy, smiling a moment when she said, "I think papa must feel better society than I am to him. I fancy he gets lonely."

Clearly she put him entirely out of the question.

"But you," he resumed, "do you not get lonely with only 'papa?'

I believe for the space of a second Rosamond Baylie thought Renshaw Waring was the stupidest man she had ever met. Then she answered, a little coldly,

"I don't think any body could be lonely with papa."

Mr. Waring bowed, with a pleasant compliment for "papa," and his visitor went out mollified. "That's Miss Baylie's way," he mused, when the lawyer sat he resumed his papers. I shouldn't like to tell him to be more kind to Rosamond. But it's a brave little girl. This work will ease her heart. I'm glad I gave it to her."

Many times after this he thought he would accept her frank invitation to call upon "papa," but one thing and another got in it off, and thus spring went and summer deepened.

Regularly, however, she made her calls at his office for "copying," and as regularly was it duly plied.

Meanwhile life at Warehill moved on more smoothly than before. The little fund which was paying in so secretly had lightened the load.

"Kathie, you must be very economical," Mr. Baylie half jestingly observed one day. "Your housekeeping bills are wonderfully reduced."

"Bless you, Sir," answered the little Kathie to whom Rosamond's secret was as sacred as death, "summer, you know, is all the difference in the world. There's the fires you know, and the vegetables."

So Mr. Baylie was lovingly deceived.

It was toward the latter part of the summer that Mr. Waring, out riding, under the call he had been contemplating so long, in which he understood between himself and Miss Baylie that her father was to be ignorant of her business connections with him; so he must put this call upon the list of accidents, for John Baylie in his sensitive pride had never invited him.

The sound of a flute came to him with a piano accompaniment as he rode up. "Miss Baylie has a visitor," he presumed.

The presumption was incorrect, for the door stood wide open, and while he waited for the song he saw it was only "papa."

Mr. Baylie? "Pleased to see you, Mr. Waring," was somewhat stiff and haughty of tone, but beyond-by his old love of genial society warmed up under Mr. Waring's sympathizing manner, and when Mr. Waring left, there was as cordial an invitation to repeat the visit from the host as from the hostess. The ice once broken, he found a habit of dropping in upon them quite frequently, and Rosamond enjoyed her father's improvement in his new and valuable acquisition to his isolated life more than any thing else.

Into all their brilliant talks—and there were few more brilliant talkers or deeper thinkers than John Baylie and Renshaw Waring—Rosamond, bringing her delicate thread of thought, let on by her father, who never for one moment forgot her. In such pleasant ways the summer evenings passed away. Then winter brought again the great roaring fire, but still Kathie's housekeeping was as mysterious, by economical as ever. Mr. Baylie couldn't see into it, he said; but Kathie's ingenuity here again beguiled him.

"I'm getting used to the ways of the house, you see, Sir, and that makes all the difference in the world," she said. This ambiguous sentence amused him somewhat, but he thought Kathie knew what she meant better than he did. Indeed she did.

One day in December Rosamond came in, cheeks and lips aglow, and eyes sparkling with the news: "Oh such splendid skating down to Warehill pond. Will you try it with me, papa?"

It grieved John Baylie to refuse the least pleasure to one whom pleasures were so limited; but he never shirked. She had set him Mr. Waring as she entered; but hearing what she said, he came forward and offered his services. If Miss Baylie would allow him he should like to try his skill once more. He could skate very well years ago. Miss Baylie was frankly delighted, and the next time Renshaw Waring appeared he was ready to attend her.

Now it must be confessed that Bun was an awkward little skater; she was only trying, you know; but Mr. Waring was as firm as she was unsteady, and many a tumble he saved her by his steady guidance. Leaning his daughter in such good hands, John Baylie was content to remain with books or writing indoors. But in those hands she was learning a new lesson. And Renshaw Waring?

Renshaw Waring had for years disdained general society. Once he had been a leader in it, brilliant and admired. Some experience had changed the man, and he himself knew it, when he was him at forty, a profound and successful lawyer. The society he disdained said he was a disappointed man. But now he was—what was he—Was Renshaw Waring learning a new lesson too?

After much careful teaching Miss Rosamond determined to try her accomplishment alone. One afternoon just at sunset, a cold still day, and the pond was like a surface of glass. Away she went, skimming over its smoothness in a very creditable manner; but at last she turns a false step, and she wavers, and in a moment more comes to.

"Oh, Mr. Waring!" she exclaims. Mr. Waring did not see her tumble, for he was engaged in swift movement, and as she wavers again, with outstretched arms he approaches, and as she falls he catches her, and for a moment just presses her to his heart.

"Little Bun, you couldn't do without me, could you? I wish I could always be as necessary to you. Will you trust yourself to me for life, my darling?"

Then, as he spoke, thrilled his heart with happiness.

Then loose to look her straight into the presence of John Baylie, with these direct words: "Mr. Baylie, will you give me your little Bun?" For a brief moment the father felt a sharp pang. His little Bun! all he had in the world! Then the sure safety, the happiness for her triumphed; and he said to Renshaw,

"Mr. Waring, I believe you are worthy even of little Bun. I hope you love her half as well as her father does."

"Do I can not leave my father, Mr. Waring, when, where—"

"You blessed child, you never shall! I do not think I could leave your father, Bun."

"Papa!"

Again it is the first of January, and in a low white room, where the fire burns and blazes up in great chimney, Rosamond Baylie sits a bride—the wife of Renshaw Waring. Once more little Bun in her father's arms. The present of the year before a year ago scorned her new finds out its mistake, and opens its arms to her; but there are fewer arms within whose sheltering fold to nestle happiness.

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER LXII.

OUR vows are exchanged at the altar—the rite which made Lilian my wife is performed—we are returned home—we are alone. I look on her in which my fathers had worshiped, the joybells that rang for my marriage had pealed for my birth. Lilian had come from Rome to prepare for our bridal ceremony, while the carriage we have lately purchased is sent for. Late in obtaining her mother on the lawn, seeking to cheer and compose her spirits, painfully affected by the sudden change in the manners and habits of the parent which makes itself suddenly felt by the parent's heart, I leave that sorrow to the child another heart on which to lean.

But Mrs. Ashleigh's was one of those gentle natures which, though full of feeling, are not easily consoled. And, already smiling through her tears, she was about to quit me and join Lilian, when the voice of the old man waits came to me with some letters, which had just been delivered by the post-boy. I took them, and asked the servant, Mrs. Ashleigh asked if there were any letters for her? She expected one from her daughter Emily, implying an answer to her in her absence, and about whom the kind mistress felt anxious, for the young woman's health was no letter for her, but one directed to Miss Ashleigh, which he had just sent up to the young lady.

Mrs. Ashleigh did not doubt that her housekeeper had written to her daughter, well known from the cradle, and to whom she was tenderly attached, instead of to her mistress, and my curiosity was roused to that effect, quickened her steps toward the house.

I was glancing over my own letters, chiefly from publishers, with a copy, when a cry of agony, a cry as of one suddenly stricken to the heart, pierced my ear. It came from the house. "Heavens! was not that Lilian's voice?" The same doubt struck Mrs. Ashleigh, who had hurried on before me. She turned pale, dis-appearing within the threshold, and calling to me to follow. I bounded forward—passed her on the stairs—was in Lilian's room before her.

My bride was on the floor, prostrate, insensible. So still, so colorless! that my first dreadful thought was that life had gone. In her hand was a letter, crushed, as with a convulsive soft grasp.

It was long before the color came back to her cheek, before the faintest sound escaped her lip. She woke, but not to health, not to sense. Hours were passed in violent convulsion, in which Lilian tossed on her bed. To these succeeded stupor, lethargy, not benignant sleep. That night, my bridal night, I passed as in some chamber to which I had been summoned to save youth from the grave. At length, at length, life was rescued, was assured! Life came back, but the mind was gone. She knew me not, nor her mother. She spoke little and faintly; in the words she uttered there was no reason.

I pass hurriedly on; my experience here was in vain, my skill was in vain. Lilian lingered on, and no ray came back to the darkened brain. Then came, by gentle stages, to London. I was sanguine of good result from skill more consummate than mine, and more specially devoted to the disease of the mind. I summoned the first advisers. In vain !—in vain!

CHAPTER LXIII.

AND the cause of this direful shock? Not this time could it be traced to some evil spell, some phantasmal influence. The cause was direct, and might be produced often by as simple cause. Lilian's nature, though not deficient in her own nature of stronger fibre if compounded with it was delicately sensitive, an honor as exquisitely pure.

The letter found in her hand was without name; it was dated from Rome, and bore the post-mark of that town. It conveyed to Lilian, in the biting words which female malice can make so sharp, the tale we had sought anxiously to guard from her ear—her flight, the consequent fate of the unhappy girl. It offered for my blind infatuation a contemptuous pity; it asked her to pause before she brought on the name of Ashleigh an indelible infamy. If she do decided, she was warned not to return to Rome, as by no other there for the stranger who would exclude her from the society of her own sex. I can not repeat more. I have not minute recall, but the letter expressed or implied, in either the strange blossoms in a work of breath. The heart that it reached was struck as by poison on the brain, and the mind fled before the presence of a thought so deadly to all the ideas which its innocence had hitherto conceived.

I knew not whom to suspect of the malignity of this mean and miserable outrage, nor did I much care to discover. The handwriting, though evidently disguised, was that of a woman, and, therefore, had the discovered the author, my blood would have forbidden me the idle solace of revenge. Mrs. Poyntz, however resolute and pitiless her temper when once roused, was not without a certain largeness of nature irreconcilable with the meanness of all the envenomed hate that hatred or envy can supply to the vile. She had too lofty a self-esteem and too decorous a regard for the common proprieties of life to stoop, she typified, to do, or connive at, an act which degrades the gentlewoman. Putting her aside, what other female friend had Lilian ever made? No matter! What other woman at L——— was worth the consideration of a conjecture?

After listening to all that the ablest of my professional brethren in the metropolis could suggest to prevent the mind trying its own remedies, I brought back my charge to L——, abandoning my practice and my fame to other patients, I engaged, for the privacy of my home, a house two miles from the town, secluded in its own grounds, and guarded by high walls.

Lilian's mother removed to my mournful dwelling-place. Ashleigh House, in the centre of a fatting coteria, had become distasteful to her, and to me it was associated with thoughts of anguish and of terror. I could not, without a shudder, have entered its grounds—could not, without a stab at the heart, have seen again the fatal gates of Ashleigh Monks' Well, and the dark cedar-trees under which Lilian's hand had given pledge of love to the unconscious remembrance, banished while Lilian's angel face had heightened the fatal precincts, now revived in full force. The very name was abhorred and it not been fulfilled.

A new contract for the old house was found within a week after Mrs. Ashleigh had written from London to a house-agent at L——, intimating her desire to dispose of the house. Ere before we had gone to Windermere Miss Ashleigh had received a visit from Mr. Mural Ainsworthy bequeathed to her by her uncle, Sir Phelim. Her means thus enabled her to move, and the commodious and humble lodging of the hitherto occupied, to Abbots' House; but just as she had there commenced a series of ostentatious improvements, implying an intention to rise to dispute with Mrs. Poyntz the sovereignty of the Hill, Miss Ashleigh was seized with a malady which appeared complicated with spinal disease, and after my return to L——— none of the skill of the spacious pantheon of the Hill, drawn along slowly in a Bath chair, by the two peering and sallow faces of Indian shawls and Siberian furs, and the gaunt figure of Dr. Jones stalking by her side, taucium and grave to assume sincere mourner with the crowd to the grave the patron on whose life he had conveniently lived himself. It was in the dismal return of February that I returned to L——, and I took possession of my blighted nuptial home on the second anniversary of the very day on I had passed through the dead dumb world from the naturalist's gloomy death-room.

CHAPTER LXIV.

LILIAN'S wondrous gentleness of nature did not desert her in the suspension of her reason. She was habitually calm—very silent; when she spoke it was rarely on earthly things—on things familiar to her during one single conversation-hend. Her thought seemed to have quitted the earth, seeking refuge in some imaginary heaven. She spoke of meetings with her father as if he were living still; she called me husband, not to sense.

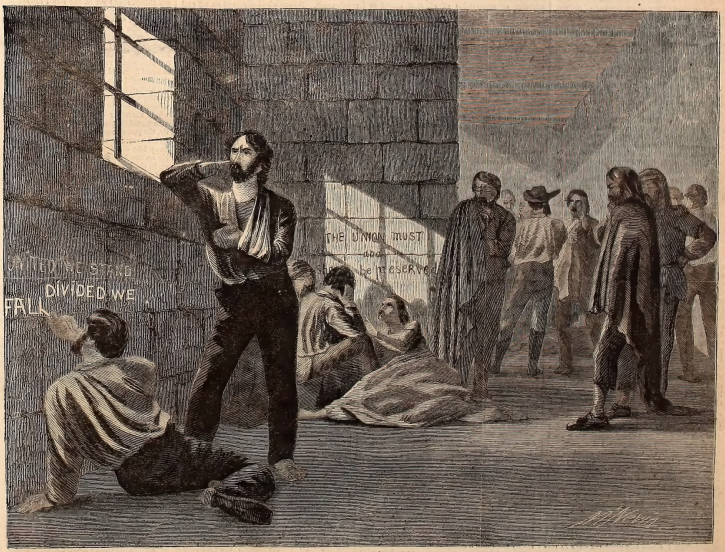
THE SKATING SEASON.—1862.



SURPRISE OF REBELS BETWEEN HURRICANE AND LOGAN, WESTERN VIRGINIA, BY A DETACHMENT OF COLONEL PIATT'S ZOUAVES (THIRTY-FOURTH OHIO VOLUNTEERS), UNDER LIEUTENANT ROWE.—[SKETCHED BY SERGEANT HILLES.]

SKIRMISH IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

We publish herewith an illustration of the surprise of a party of rebels in Western Virginia by a detachment of the Thirty-fourth Ohio Volunteers. The officer who sent us the sketch appended the following note:

Herewith I send you a sketch by our color-bearer, Sergeant Hilles. It vividly represents the utter rout of a party of rebels who were encamped in the mountains between Hurricane Bridge and Logan Court House, Western Virginia. A detachment of Piatt's Zouaves, under command of Lieutenant Richard Rowe, numbering 90 men, surprised on six o'clock in the morning, December 31 309 rebels, whom they gallantly attacked and routed, wounding several and taking three prisoners, our side sustaining no loss.

THE UNION PRISONERS AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

who had been detached from the crowd by the profession of friendship—those who, when the slander was yet new, and might have been awed into silence had they stood by my side—to the pressure of their hands now I had no response.

Against Mrs. Perrute, above all others, I bore a remembrance of unreleased, unmitigable indignation. Her schemes for her daughter's marriage had triumphed: Jane was Mrs. Ashleigh Sumner. Her mind was, perhaps, softened now that the object which had dampened its worldly faculties was accomplished: that it was, on the hearing of my affliction, had this she Machiavel owned a humane remorse, and, with all her keen comprehension of each fleeting shot circumstance gave to her will, availed herself of the general commotion to strengthen the popular reaction in favor of Lilian's assaulted honor—in vain had she written to me to ask the gentleness of sympathy for her husband's unfortunate politics—in vain besought me to call on her—in vain waylaid and accosted me with a supplicating look that implored forgiveness; I vouchsafed no reproach, but I could imply no pardon, put between her and my great sorrow the impenetrable wall of my freezing silence.

One word of hers at the time that I had so pathetically besought her aid, and, on the parrot-block that repeated her very whisper in noisy shrillness would have been as loud as if uttered as it had been to defame; that vile letter might never have been written. Whoever its writer, it amply was one of the baleful who took their malice itself from the jest or the nod of their female despot; and the writer might have recalled herself to saying she did but coarsely proclaim what the oracle of worldly opinion, and the early friend of Lilian's own mother, had forbidden her to believe.

By degrees the bitterness at my heart diffused itself to the circumference of the circle in which my life went its cheerless mechanical round. That cordial brotherhood with the unfortunate that is the true physician's happiest gift and humanest duty, forsook my breast. The warning words of Mrs. Poyntz had come true. A patient that monopolized my thoughts awaited me at my own hearth! My conscience became tenderer, but it felt that my skill was lessened. I said to myself, "The physician who, on entering the sick room, fails, while there, something that is among the finest powers of his intellect from the sufferer's ease, is unfit for his calling." And my resolve to be passed once by fatal wedding-day before I had formed a resolution to quit London, and abandon my profession; and my resolution was confirmed, and my goal determined, by a letter I received from Julius Faber.

I had written a line to him, not many days after the blow that had fallen on me, stating all circumstances as calmly and clearly as I could, and would allow, for I held his skill at a higher estimate than that of any living brother of my art, and I was not without hope in the effect of his advice. The letter I now received from him had been begun, and continued at some length, before my communication reached him. And this earlier portion contained animadvi and cheerful descriptions of his Australian life and business, which contrasted with the sorrowful tone of the supplement written in reply to the tidings with which I had wrung his friendly and affectionate heart. In this, the letter, part of his letter, he suggested, or that if time had brought no counsel of comfort for the better, it might be advisable to try the effect of foreign travel. Scenes entirely new might stimulate observation, and the consideration of things external withdraw the sense from that brooding over images decisively focused within which characterized the kind of mental alienation I had described. "Let any intellect create for itself a visionary world, and the unreasoning built on it are fallacious; the visionary world vanishes in proportion as we can arouse a predominant interest in the actual."

This grand authority, who owed half his consummate skill as a practitioner to the extent of his knowledge as a philosopher, then proceeded to give me a hope which I had not dared, of myself, to form. He said, "I should imagine the case you so minutely detail from that insanity which is recent; here it seems evident that no reason held in suspense. Where there is hereditary predisposition, where there is organic change of structure in the brain, nervous system, there is that kind of insanity which takes the epithet of moral, whereby the whole character becomes so transformed that the prime elements of understanding, conscience itself, is either erased or warped into the execution of crime. In healthful state, it would most disapprove, it is only charlatans who promise effectual cure. But here I assume that there is no hereditary taint. Nor do I am convinced, from my own observation, that the mischief is in the organs, all things are in the vigor of youth, would rather submit to death than to the permanent overthrow of their equilibrium in reason; here, where you state the character preserves all its moral attributes of gentleness and purity, and the contagion lies in one early habit of estranged contemplation; here, without deceiving you in false kindness, I give you the guarantee of my experience when I bid you 'hope!' I am persuaded that, sooner or later, the mind, too, has its natural cure, will right itself; because here, in the course of the malady, we do but deal with the nervous system. And that, once righted, and the mind once disciplined in those practical duties which conjugal life necessitates, the malady itself will never return; never be transmitted to the children, on whom your wife's restoration to health may permit you to count hereafter. If the course of travel I recommend and the prescriptions I conjoin with that course fail you, let me know; and though I would fain close my days in this land, I will come to you. I love you as my son. I will tend your wife as my daughter."

Foreign travel! The idea smiled on me. Julius Faber's companionship, sympathy, healing skill! The very thought seemed as a raft to a drowning mariner. I now read more attentively the earlier portion of his letter. There he described, in glowing colors, the wondrous country in which he had fixed his home; the joyous elasticity of its atmosphere; the freshness of its primitive pastoral life; the strangeness of its scenery, with a flora and a fauna which have no similitudes in the ransacked quarters of the Old World. And the strong impulse seized me to transfer to the shores of that Hesperian and barely Nature a spirit no longer at home in the civilized regions of men, and a heart-sick that shrunk from all social eyes, and would fain have found a wilderness for the desolate hearth, on which they had ceased to be sacred if unveiled. As if to give practical excuse and reason for the idea that seized me, Julius Faber mentioned, incidentally, that there was every prospect of a wealthy speculator in his immediate neighborhood coming on sale at a price very moderate to me alluringly trivial, and, according to his judgment, far below the value they would soon reach in the hands of a more wide capitalist. He wrote at the period of the agricultural panic in the colony which preceded the discovery of the earliest gold-fields. But his geological science had convinced him that strata within and around the property of which he was now speaking and his intelligence enabled him to predict how inevitably man would be attracted toward the gold, and how surely the gold would enrich the soil and enrich its owners. He described the house that was to be sold—in our terms, a gentleman's purchaser; it had been built at a cost unusual in those early times, and by one who clung to English taste amidst alien scenes, so that in this purchase a settler would escape the hardships that had been ordinarily the commencement of his life, in short, a home to which a man, more luxurious than I, might bear a bride with some key to the position to which I was entitled for my darling Lilian.

This communication dwelt on my mind through the sweetness of the day on which I received it, and in the evening I read all, except the supplement, aloud to Mrs. Ashleigh in her daughter's presence. I desired to see if Faber's description of the country and its life, which in themselves were extremely specific in detail, would arouse Lilian's interest. At first, she did not seem to hear what I read. But when I came to Faber's loving account of little Amy, Lilian turned her eyes toward me, and evidently listened with attention. I saw that the child had already become the most useful person in the simple household. I also watched the quick frown of the mother had made the service of the eye; all their associations of comfort had grown around that child as the companionship of a man who she had contrived to monopolize the management or supervision of all that added to Blame the nameless infant whose image her eyes the rude furniture of the log-house grew incongruous with. Rightly she might deem that where the dairy; she had made the garden gay with flowers selected from the wild, and suggested the unfledged which the mother's fancy had left very omit a refreshment in the weariness of daily labor. Lilian sighed as I laid down abruptly. I wrote the old man, with the enthusiasm which no time had roth from his hearty, healthful generosity—How all that is best and beautiful is here opening last into flower from the bud of the infant's soul! That child's companionship to suit it—the child-woman in the child-world!"

I heard Lilian sigh; I looked toward her features closely; I could see that a change in her face was quivering. Presently she began to rub her right hand over the left—over the wedding-ring—at first slowly, then with increasing rapidity.

"It is not here," she said, impatiently; "it is not lost."

"What is not here?" asked Mrs. Ashleigh, hanging over her.

Lilian leaned back her head on her mother's bosom, and answered faintly:

"The child's wedding-ring! there was a stain on this hand. I do not see it—do you?"

"There is no stain, never was," said I; "the hand is white as your mother's—as white as the fro which you take your name."

"Hush! you do not know my name. I will whisper it. Shall—my name is Nightshade. Do you want to know where the lily is now, brother? Ah, no! I will tell you. Lily is dead —you call her Amy—she is the lily—take her to your breast—hide her. Hist! what are those bells? Marriage-bells. No, no, I see them there. For there is a cruel wind that whispers the bells, and the bells ring out what it whispers, louder and louder.

'Stain on lily,
Stain on lily,
Wither lily.'

If she hears what the wind whispers to the bells, she will creep away into the dark, and then she too, will turn to Nightshade."

"Lilian!" said I, sternly. You have been in a long, long dream: it is passing away. Lilian, my beloved, are you awaking?"

Never till then had I heard from her even so vague an allusion to the fatal calumny, and its dreadful effect upon her. Those words now pierced my heart, it beat, among its pangs, with a thrilling hope.

But, alas! the idea that had gleamed upon her had vanished already. She murmured something about Circles of Fire, and a Veiled Woman in black garments; became restless, agitated, and unconscious of our presence, and finally sank into a heavy sleep.

That night (my room was next to hers with the intervening door open) I heard her moaning. I hastened to her side. She was still asleep, but her face expressed intense laboring oppression on her young face, and yet not an expression wholly of pain—for her lips were parted with a smile—that glad yet troubled smile with which one who has been revolving some subject of perplexity or fear greets a sudden thought that seems to solve the riddle, or prompt the escape from the danger; and as I softly took her hand she returned my gentle pressure, and inclining toward mine, said, still in sleep,

"Let us go."

"Go, Lilian?" I answered, under my breath, so as not to awake her; "is it to see the child of your friend, and the child that is blooming out of the earth's childhood?"

"Out of the dark into the light; where the leaves are green always; where the night is short day, and the winter our summer. Let us go—let us go!"

She will go. Dream on undisturbed, my bride. Oh that the dream could tell you that you have but awaked from a dream more painful and deeper than on the day in which our vows were exchanged! In you still all my hopes fold their wings: when you arise, there still I myself have my dream-land!"

The day after, grew bright as I spoke: all trouble left the smile; softly she drew her hand from my clasp, and rested it for a moment on my head, then, as if in blessing.

I rose; stole back to my own room, closing the door, lest the sob I could not stifle should mar her sleep.

CHAPTER LXVII.

I RECEIVED my new prospects to Mrs. Ashleigh. She seemed easily persuaded to listen to them. I could have supposed, judging by her blushes, sighs, and trembling hands, that answers to all that disturbed their even tenor. But the great grief which had befallen her had roused her from a dangerous lethargy which lies dormant in all hearts that are capable of loving another more than self. To her full consent I wrote to Faber, communicating my intentions, requesting him to purchase the property he had so commended, and charging my bankers to remit the amount on an Australian firm. I now announced my intention to retire from my profession; made over my practice to a gentleman with a moderate, but practice; disposed of my two houses at L——. Read the last sentence in picture. Whatever dread within me, or I might have been gratified by the sensation which the news of my design created. My faith has compelled me to describe my mental qualities as I might possess were exaggerated. The public regret vented and consoled itself in a few complimentary lines in the local journal; and my patients insisted on the privilege to contribute, in a round robin, to a testimonial which was to have served for the epitaph on some great man's tomb. No one who has served an art and strives for a name is so wise to himself as to others; and sweet indeed would such honors have been to me had not publicity itself seemed a mocking to the humiliation that afflicted the name of Lilian apart from the movement and the glories of the world.

The two persons most active in "getting up" this testimonial were, nominally, Colonel Poyntz and Mr. Vigors, the latter a solicitor, junior to Vigors! It is long since my narrative has referred to Mr. Vigors. But it is right that I should state that, in his capacity of magistrate, and in his own way, he had been both active and delicate in the investigation of the foul slander upon the unhappy time in which she had wandered, spell-bound, from her home. He alone, of all the more influential managers of the town, had upheld her innocence against the gossip that asserted it; and when, after the trial, he called on me at my residence at L——, he had sought me, with frank and manly confessions of his regret for his former prejudice against me, and expressions of the respect in which he had held me ever since my first professional attendance on Mrs. Ashleigh. He had then, strong in his ruling passion, besought me to consult his clairvoyants as to her child's fate. I declined that test, but I was not the less affected by his kindness, and, as I should once have done, but with no word nor look of irrepressible disdain. The fact was, that I had conceived a solemn terror of all practices and pretenses of the human mind that touched on science. Perhaps in my refusal I did wrong. I know not. I was afraid of my own imagination. He testified not less friendly in spite of my refusal. And, such are the vicissitudes in human feeling, I parted from him with a kindly regard for my most bigoted foe with a warmer sentiment of kindness than for any of those on whom I had formerly lavished my love. He had loved and pitied Lilian. It was not so with Mrs. Poyntz. I would have said ten-fold the value of the testimonial to have avoided it from the lips of those who subscribed to it, her husband's name.

The day before I quitted ——, and some weeks after I had, in fact, renounced my practice, I received an urgent entreaty from Miss Blakeston to see her. She was ill, and could not be blurred that I could with difficulty decipher them, that she was very ill, even over by Dr. Jones, who had been attending her. She implored my opinion.

CHAPTER LXVII.

On reaching the house a formal man-servant, with indifferent face, transferred me to the guidance of a hired nurse, who led me up the stairs, and, before I was well aware of it, into the room in which Dr. Lloyd had died. Widely different, indeed, the aspect of the walls, the character of the furniture. The dingy paper-hangings were replaced by airy muslin curtains, the rose-colored ground through their fanciful openwork; luxurious fauteuils, gilded wardrobes, full-length mirrors, a toilet-table tricked out with lace and ribbons, and glittering with an array of silver gewgaws and jeweled trinkets—all transformed the sick chamber of the simple man of science to a boudoir of death for the vain coquette. But the room itself, in its high lattice and heavy ceiling, and its spacious—as the term itself has the same confines whether it be rich in velvets and bright with blazoning, or rude as a trapper's shell.

And the bed, with its silken coverlet, and its pillows edged with the thread-work of Lovisa stood in the same relative place to the window had flickered the frowning smoke-rock above the dying remnant of fire. As I approached, a man, who was seated beside the sufferer, turned round his face, and gave me a silent kindly nod of recognition. It was Dr. Jones, the village doctor of the town, the one with whom I had the most frequently consulted in the progress of the physician resigns to the priest the language that bids man hope. Mr. Clinger, as a preacher, was renowned for the unction of his manner. As a nurse, revered for his benignant piety; as friend and neighbor, beloved for a sweetness of nature which seemed to temper the fierce elements of a mind eminently masculine by the best of a nature tender as the gentlest woman's.

This good man, then whispering something to the sufferer which I did not overhear, stole toward me, met me by the hand, and, said, in a whisper, "Be merciful as Christians are, for the bed may be beholden, there left me, went out, and closed the door.

"Do you think I am really dying, Dr. Fenwick?" said the sufferer, in a voice that Dr. Jones has misunderstood my case. I wish I had called you in at the first, but—but I could not—I could not! Why am I dying? Do you think you think you could do me good?"

I laid my hand on the pulse in that skeleton wrist; the aspect of the face sufficed to tell me that death was drawing near.

Bechadnezzar, Never, I went through the blackened formula of professional questions. This vain mummery done, as gently and delicately as I could, I gave the true expository of concluding, if not yet settled, those affairs which relate to this world.

"This duty," I said, "in relieving the mind from care for others to whom we owe the forethought of affectionate duty, is one of the holy duties of many a drawing pain, and sometimes, to the surprise of the most experienced physician, prolongs life itself."

"Ah," said the old maid, peevishly, "I understand! But I have no duty, no troubles me. I should not be left to a nurse from a hospital if my relations did not know that my property dies with me. And I handed it in furnishing this house, Dr. Fenwick, and all these pretty things will be sold for what the horrid tradesmen!—very hard! so hard!—just as I had got things about me in the way I always said I would have them! Very hard, very cruel! It always said I would have my bedroom hung with muslin, like dear Lady L——; and the drawing-room in green-colored silk—so pretty! You have not seen it: you would not know the house. Dr. Fenwick. And just as I had got settled, to be taken away, and thrust into the grave. It is so cruel!" And she began to weep. Her emotion brought on a violent cough, which, when she recovered from it, had produced one of those trembling exhaustions of mind and body sometimes witnessed before death: changes whereby the whole character of a life seems to undergo solemn transformation. Like the dying Roman general, the proud meek, the frivolous earnest. That awful moment when the things of earth pass away like dissolving views, and the spiritual visible on the back-ground by the glare that shoots up in the last flicker of the lamp.

And when she lifted her haggard face from my shoulder, and heard my pitying, soothing tones, it was with the look of one who sees in the face of fondest toys that spoke in the falling lines of her lip, in her eye, in her pleading eye.

"So this is death," she said. "I feel it hurrying on. I must speak. I promised Mr. C. that I would. I promised. Do you mean you? That letter—that letter to Lilian Ashleigh, I wrote it! Oh, do not look at me so terribly; I never thought it would do such harm. And I am not punished enough? I truly believed, when I wrote, that Mrs. Poyntz had given authority, and once I was silly enough to fancy that you might have liked me. But I had another motive: I had been so poor all my life—I had become rich unexpectedly; I set my heart on this house—I had always thought it pretty—I thought if I could prevent Miss Ashleigh marrying you, and secure her and her mother from coming back to L——, they would leave it cheap. And I did get it. What for?—to die. I had not been here a week before I got the hurt that is killing me—a fall down the stairs—coming out of this very room: the stairs had been polished. If I had said this to the coroner, he would not have believed me. I shall say it now, and he may be sure I say it, even if you do not feel you can! Say it! And the murderer will be punished, and not by the arm as Dr. Lloyd had grasped me.

I shudder as they exerted with my hand: my heart leaved with the agony of my suppressed passion. A wrong, however deep, only to myself, I could have pardoned what value effort! such a wrong to Lilian—no! I could not say I forgive."

The dying wretch was perhaps more appalled by my silence than she would have been by my reproach. Her voice grew shrill in her despair.

"You will not pardon me! I shall die with your curse on my head. Mercy! mercy! That good man, Mr. C., assured me you would be merciful. Have you never wronged another? Has the Lord Jesus never forgiven you?"

Then I spoke in broken accents: "Me! Oh, heal it been my own offense—but a young creature so harmless, so unoffending, and for so miserable a motive!"

"But I tell you, I swear to you, I never dreamed I could cause such sorrow; and that young man, that Margrave, put it into my head!"

"Margrave! He had left London long before that letter was written."

"But he came back for a day just before I wrote: it was the very day I met him in the lane yonder. He asked after you—was Miss Ashleigh; and when he spoke he laughed, and I said, 'Miss Ashleigh had best look to her game away;' and he laughed again. And I thought he knew more than he would tell me, so I asked him if he supposed Mrs. Ashleigh was coming back, and said how much I should like to take this house if she did not; and again he laughed, and said, 'Birds never stay in the nest after the young ones are hurt,' and went away singing. When I got home his laugh and his song haunted me. I thought I saw him still in my room gossiping me to write, and I sat down and wrote. Oh, pardon, pardon me! I have been a foolish poor creature, but never meant to do such harm! 'The Evil-One tempted me!' There he is, near me now! I see him yonder! there at the door-way! He comes to claim me! As you hope for mercy yourself, free me from him! Forgive me!"

I made an effort over myself. In naming Margrave as her tempter the woman had suggested an excuse echoed from that innermost cell of my mind which I dared not even plead into, for there I should behold his image. Inexplicable though the injury she had wrought against me and a little child, the woman was less than—fellow-creature—like myself; but not?

I took in both my hands the hot head that still pressed my arm, and said, with firm voice,

"Be comforted. In the name of Lilian, my wife, I forgive you for her and for myself, and as fully as we are enjoined by Him against whose precepts the best of us sin, to-day. Go, give—no children of wrath—to forgive one another!"

"Heaven bless you!—oh, bless you!" she murmured, sinking back upon her pillow.

"Ah!" thought I, "what if the pardon I grant for a wrong far deeper be pleaded on him whose imprecation smote me in this chamber, should, indeed, be received at once—and this blessing on the lips of the dying annul the dark curse that the dead has left on my path through the Valley of the Shadow?"

I left my patient sleeping quietly—the sleep that precedes the last. I went down the stairs into the hall I saw Mrs. Poynte standing at the threshold speaking to the man-servant and the nurse.

I would have passed her with a formal bow, but she stopped me.

"I come to enquire after poor Miss Brabazon," said she. "You can tell me more than the servants can: is there no hope?"

"Let the nurse go up and watch beside her. She may pass away in the sleep into which she has fallen."

"Allen Fenwick, I must speak with you—nay, but for a few minutes. I hear that you leave home—to-morrow. In such uncertain circumstances of life that we should meet again." While thus speaking she had moved me gently down the path that led toward her own home. "I wish," said she, earnestly, "that you could part with a kindlier feeling for me; but I fear I can scarcely expect it. Could I put myself in your place, and be moved by your feelings, I know that I should be implacable; but I—"

"But you, Madam, are The World! and the World governs itself, and abides by laws, by laws which seem harsh to those who ask from its favor the services which the World can not render, for the World admits favorites but not friends. You did but act to me as the World ever acts to those who mistake its favor for its friendship."

"It is true," said Mrs. Poynte, with bitterness; "and we continue the world's identity at length she said, abruptly, "But do you not rashly deprive yourself of your own privileges, I know?"

"Whom the heart suffers does you still admit any remedy like occupation to the mind? Yet you abandon that occupation to which your mind is most accustomed; you desert your career; you turn aside, in the midst of the race, from the fame which awaits at the goal; you go back from civilization itself, and dream that all your intellectual powers can find content in the life of a herdsman, amidst the monotony of a wild." No, you will repent, for you are untrue to your real self."

"I am sick of the word 'mind!'" said I, bitterly. And therewith I quitted the enchantress.

The enigma which had foiled my intelligence in the unraveled Sibyl Book of Nature were mysteries strange to every-day experience: a piece of thought, even if reducible to the fraudulent impressions of outward sense: For illusions in a brain otherwise healthy, suggested by music in our human organization which the college that record them rather guess at than solve. But the blow which had shattered my life had been dealt by the hand of a fool. Here, there were no mystic enchantments, however the most commonplace and paltry, suggested to a brain as trivial and shallow as that of a mere frivolity of woman a theme for the satire of poets, had sufficed, in devastating the field of my affections, to blast the rose for which I had cultured my mind; and had my intellect been as great as Heaven ever gave to man, it would have been as vain a shield as mine against the shaft that had lodged in my heart. While I had, indeed, been preparing myself more and more fortitude to meet such perils, weird and marvelous, as those by which tales round the winter hearth scare the credulous into fear, reverence so vulgar and hackneyed that not a day passed but what some hearth is vexed by an anonymous libel—had wrought a calamity more dread than any that my dark guess into the Chaldean Land, unpierced by Philosophy, could trace to the prompting of malignant witchcraft. So, ever this truth runs through all legends of ghost and demon—through the uniform records of what wonder accredits and science rejects as the supernatural—to! the dread machinery whose motive will through Bodies! What need such awful engines for such mean results! The fire blockhead we meet in our walk to our grocer's can tell us what it is to be burned at the stake; the poorest envy we ever aroused hurts us more than the demon! How true an interpreter is Genius of Hell to be Earth. The Fiend came to Jesus, the tired seeker of knowledge; Heaven and Hell shake their wings in Milton's mortal's presence. And what does the Fiend to astonish the Mortal? Turn wine into fire, turn love into crime. The need and longings of the human creature are marvels every day!

Thus when, thinking, I walked by the side of the world-wise woman; and when she next spoke, I looked up and saw that we were at the Monks' Well, where I had first seen Lilian gazing into heaven.

Mrs. Poynte had, as we walked, placed her hand on my arm, and, moving abruptly from the path into the glade, I found myself standing by her side in the secrecy of the wood in which she had first disclosed to my sight the hues with which Love, the passionate beautifier, turns into purple and gold the dull hues of commonplace life. Thus, when romance has ended in sorrow, and the Beautiful flies from the landscape, the trite and positive forms of things vanished into new respect, and deepen our mournful remembrance of the lovely illusion that has fled. the Woman of the World, finding how little I was inclined to respond to her when she had talked of myself, began to speak of her husband's claim, ringing accents of her own social schemes and exercises:

"I shall miss you when you are gone, Allen Fenwick, for though, during the last year or so, all actual intercourse between us has ceased, yet my interest in you gave some occupation to my thoughts when I sat alone, having lost my most objects of attention in settling my daughters, and having no longer any one in the house with whom I could talk of trivial things. Ah! there I could form a project. It is so wearisome to count the changes which pass within us, that we take interests in the changes that pass without. The sun still has his weather-glass; I have no longer my Lilian."

"I can not linger with you on this spot," said I, impatiently, turning back into the path; she following me, treading over fallen leaves, but unheeding my interruption, she thus continued her hard talk:

"But I am not sick of my mind as you seem to be of yours: I am only somewhat tired of the little cage in which it is lodged. I can feel that it ruffles its plumes against the flimsy wires that confine it from wider space. I shall take up my home for a time with the new-married couple: they want me. Ashleigh Sumner has come into Parliament. He means to attend regularly to his work, but he does not like Jane to go into the world by herself, and he wishes her to go into the world, because it seems a wife to display the wealth for the improvement of his position. In Ashleigh Sumner's house I shall have room to range for my energies, such as they are. I have a curiosity to see the few that perch on the wheels of the State, and see how they go over the wheels!' It will amuse me to learn if I can maintain in a capital the authority I have won in a country town; if not, I can find scope in my small principality. Wherever I live I must have my court. If I succeed—as I ought, for in Jane's beauty and Ashleigh's fortune I have materials for the woof of ambition, wanting which here, I fall asleep over my knitting—if I succeed, there will be enough to occupy the rest of my life. Ashleigh Sumner must be Prime Minister, and I must be presented and enjoyed by my child, and created and maintained by me! Allen Fenwick, don't look so. Be world-like, as I am, and it will only be in moments of spleen and chagrin that you will sigh to think that the heart may be void when the mind is full. Now, have you envy me while you listen.'

"Not so; all that to you seems so great, appears to me so small! Nature alone is always grand, in her terrors as well as her charms. The World for you! Nature for me. Farewell!"

"Nature," said Mrs. Poynte, compassionately. "Poor Allen Fenwick! Nature indeed—intellectual solitude! Nay, shake hands, then, if for the last time."

So we took hands and parted, and there the wicket-gate and the stone stairs separated my blighted fairy-land from the common thoroughfare.

The Queen of Story Writers!

Mrs. Mary J. Holmes!

The Inestimable lady and

UNIVERSAL FAVORITE,

whose name is become familiar as household words throughout the length and breadth of this country and in Europe, has written another of her indescribably charming stories for that

GEM OF ALL STORY AND SKETCH PAPERS,

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

through the columns of which popular journal it will be commenced on Thursday, January 16, 1862.

It is entitled,

Rose Mather

and

Ann Graham;

What Women Can Do for the War.

☞ This is a new field for Mrs. Holmes, and those who have read her "Marian Grey," "Darkness and Daylight," &c., can imagine how ably she will explore it. This story can be finished in no other way than through the columns of

as the stories published in that paper are never issued in book form. We therefore advise all admirers of Mrs. Holmes, as well as all those who love realities—husbands, lovers, lords, and ladies—in the great army of the Union, to commence buying the paper at once, so that they may forward it to the army.

Our word for it they will not regret it!

RETIREMENT OF SECRETARY CAMERON.

SLAVERY BLOCKING UP THE WAY.

Two Christian knights, brothers, in the great army which had undertaken to rescue the sepulchre of Christ out of the hand of the infidel, departed from their tent early one morning in search of a diamond of rare beauty and great price, which they knew to be concealed in a neighboring castle, and which these pious brothers had promised to their mother as a token of filial love. As they rode along they began to discuss the setting of the jewel. The elder would have it set in plain massive gold, but the younger insisted upon its being surrounded by a chain of fine pearls. As neither would yield, and each waxed hotter and hotter as the debate was prolonged, they finally came to blows, and both soon lay prostrate, faint and bleeding, at the gate of the castle. An Arab passing that way, humanely dressed their wounds, and inquiring the cause of the quarrel, bade them cease their strife. "The diamond is mine, and now, at last it should give rise to further quarrels, I will take it with me at once to Damascus." So saying he departed, leaving the helpless brothers great-fallen.

It would seem that these Christian brothers must have been the lineal ancestors of some of our politicians and statesmen. The record of our Congressional debates at the present time contains little else than a succession of quarrel between emancipationists and others with regard to the disposal of slaves whom we haven't got, and whom we are not likely to get very soon, from present appearances. One honorable member proposes to emancipate all the slaves in the South in a lump, leaving the ultimate question of their disposal to be decided hereafter. Another is for transporting them to Africa. A third demands that Nicaragua, or some other tropical region be acquired, and the negroes (sent thither to build up a great tropical empire. A fourth insists that they be sent to Hayti as settlement service. All this time, be it remembered, the slaves about whom these gentlemen are fighting are calmly looking cotton and boiling corn on their masters' plantations, and we see no more get at them than we can at the inhabitants of Jupiter.

Then, on the other side, we have another practical party which is furious with every body who doesn't damn and worship the divine institution of slavery. The Legislature of Kentucky, which has been so long on the fence that it requires an effort to believe that it is now fairly on the loyal side, demands that the treasury of slavery be allowed to remain in the Cabinet. The Legislature of Maryland, reeking with treason, protests against the least interference with the splendid institution. Newspapers here and there bellow daily that the racially abolitionists are the cause of all the trouble; that Wendell Phillips seized Sumter, and Lloyd Garrison commands Confederate States. The telegraphic dispatches from Richmond teem with accounts of "abolitionist conspiracies." If there are to be believed, our representatives are on the point of cutting each other's throats and that of the President on account of minor differences of opinion touching the disposal of questions which can not arise when the rebellion has been fairly crushed out.

It is not good to be jealous of Providence. It is well that we should take every possible care, and exercise every possible forethought in our daily transit; but something may safely, may must always, be left to Providence. Generals and members and galleries are very wise, no doubt. But Providence is a good engineer too. This slavery question is just the one upon which Providence is apt to solve well. In the Revolutionary war Providence took care of one or two things which our leaders were disposed to, and they were not the least important of the war. Let us trust the same power now.

Practically, wherever our armies advance slavery will disappear. Generals may order the return of fugitives, but the run and the rule won't execute the command, because they can't compel us at doing so. Proclamations may be issued prohibiting slavery; but the slaves won't pay much attention to them, and the masters will not have the power, nor the troops the time to enforce them. To flourish, or even to exist, slavery requires perfect peace, and the most strict and thorough execution of municipal law; it can no more thrive in the midst of civil war than gunpowder can be manufactured in a blacksmith's shop. This implies no abolitionism among officers of our army. General Sherman, at Port Royal, made his début with a proclamation which, so far as slavery was concerned, suited the stomach of the Charleston Mercury. Yet neither Garrison nor Phillips, nor all the abolitionists together, ever dealt so deadly a stab at the institution as Sherman did when he directed that sea-island cotton be picked by free negroes only, and the negroes paid a penny a pound for all they brought in. He could not help himself. Others will do the same. Men may go out at the head of our armies with preconceived opinions on the slavery question that would be relished by Tyrant and Lowery; but they will find, and if they know their trade as soldiers, they become active abolitionists by the necessity of the case.

The people of the North have an abiding faith in the power of the Government to crush out this rebellion, and an unshakable resolve that it shall be done, though slavery and a dozen other Southern institutions be crushed out with it. When slavery goes to the wall no tears will be shed from Northern eyes. But the people hear with anxiety and annoyance those eternal discussions in Congress about the disposal of negroes; both because it is idle to quarrel over the disposition of that which we haven't got, and because because it is a fact that the people can prevent our ultimate success except divisions among ourselves such as these discussions seem calculated to provoke.

THE following interesting and most gratifying correspondence speaks for itself:

"Ed. D., Barrister at Law:

"DEAR SIR—Having read with the profoundest admiration and gratitude the graphic letters in which you have vigorously and courageously exposed the folly, cowardice, having seen with what painful and elaborate ingenuity you have labored first and foremost conclusive, insulting our public men and covering our soldiers with ridicule; how incessantly you have supplied the material to the London Times for its brutal fun; upon American affairs; how skilfully and with what unquestioned fervor you have labored to promote the cause of the Government of the United States to defend its own existence, to put down treason, to free ourselves from the curse of slavery, to the jealousy and hate which the selfish and the ignorant in England (if you will pardon the allusion) always exercise for a great and better, and therefore successful, we have served the purpose for which you were sent, of multiplying American sympathizers, of disarming English rancorous passions, and embroiling in war two nations which are naturally friendly and cordial, to abstain yourself, or only informing yourself to conceal, the real character of the rebellion which has plunged our country into war, and expend enormous energy in the work of deception; we, a committee of American gentlemen, recognizing that you, therefore, are the representative of your nation, more than any other individual, have misrepresented the motives, conduct, and character of the American people, and blackened the fair fame of our country, restore unto him, by request you to honor us by partaking of a dinner at our expense, in order that he may be received as one of our countrymen, and to the whole world, that the nation furnishes a background sufficiently large for conveying correction of men and gentlemen that you have described as all to be.

"With profound respect,

"We are your most humble, obedient Servants."

"GENTLEMEN,—Although my age and my fabulous boundage of a Government have all gone to the devil—and good riddance to bad rubbish—I feel that I ought to answer but out I can have no earthly objection to eating them.

"YOURS, ILL-D. BARRISTER AT LAW."

LAND REBELS AND WATER REBELS.

JUDGE DAILY has written a letter to Senator Harris upon the subject of privateering and privateersmen. He takes the ground that a privateersman is only a rebel upon water, and that if you do not hang land rebels you have no right to hang people to be willing to exchange water rebels, and not hang them. He does not say, of course, that if Mr. Mansfield Lovell were taken in arms against the Government he might be tried for treason, and surely being if he were taken in arms on the deck of Mr. Lovell is true of every other rebel with or without a title. But as Mr. Lovell is no more a traitor than Captain Semmes, or Captain Wilkes, or General Banks or Lander, if the rebels had them, we would gladly exchange Mr. Lovell rather than hang him, so for Colonel Corcoran we ought willingly to exchange Captain Semmes, if we had him.

The argument is fair enough. Every citizen who lawfully raises his own Government is a traitor, and traitors are punishable with death. But there is a difference in the manner of resistance, and therefore, in the penalty. Privateersmen are not guilt of the offenders. When the Congress of Paris agreed that "Privateering is abolished," it certainly did not mean that the laws of war were even abolished; but only that the consenting nations pledged themselves to observe a certain kind of warfare. Why did they do it? Simply because war, although it is an appeal to brute force, does not forget all law. Even in the midst of battle, and amid the roaring of guns, the wailing of women and children, etc., are unseemly. And now, by the common consent of the great Powers of the world, in a treaty to which we have offered to become parties, privateering, or authorized piracy, is placed upon the high seas, is ranked among these odious outrages and crimes of war.

The reason of this is evident. It is because there is an essential unfair cut in such warfare. A rebel who is taken upon the battle-field is a man who has openly and consciously offered himself to the same chance that he brings to bear against his enemy. He tries to take the life of the loyal citizen, indeed, but he does it by risking his own life. On the other hand, a privateersman is a rebel who takes a loyal citizen at every disadvantage. He oppresses and robs the peaceful subject; he risks nothing; yet who, if loose and heroism contrast resistance, must not hesitate to murder. The difference between a land rebel and a water rebel, therefore, is precisely that between a highway robber stopping an unarmed passenger and a sailor in the field confronting another soldier. That difference is fully recognized in the Treaty of Paris which abolished privateering. Consequently, when Judge Daly urges, as an argument for the exchange of privateersmen, that we have no right to hang, in the field, "that actual war exists, and that, as a Christian people, we mean to carry it on according to the usages of civilized nations," he apparently forgets that the usage of civilized nations has abolished privateering, and therefore that it affords no argument to the point.

However, the question is practically one of policy. No enemy can possibly be more clearly proved than the armed resistance of Commodore Barron and Captain at Richmond Isliet to the Government of their country. No more is there a more distinctly forfeited than theirs. But the Government wisely refuses to make this its ultimate test and exact rights. For the same reasons it certainly will not hang the privateersmen. But with equal certainty it will take the ground that they are no worse than rebels on land. Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, has introduced a joint resolution, which has passed the Senate, that the President procure an exchange of prisoners from the privateer Jeff Davis for prisoners taken from the army of the United States.

"OUR OWN" UPON THE ABOLITION REACTION.

IN a late letter to the London Times Mr. W. H. Russell, the correspondent of that paper in this country, makes the following remarks upon the change in this country as one bordering upon bloody civil war, to be waged for what he calls the Abolitionist party, and which is the creature of the Government. This statement—the absurdity of which can not, of course, be appreciated in England any more than if he had written the story told to the Memphis papers that Fremont had seized the head of Alaric and carried it off—is followed by the following note of two references: one to Mr. Sumner's speech in this city; and the other to a meeting in favor of Fremont, held in Cooper Union several weeks ago.

As for Mr. Sumner's speech, he said—first at Worcester, Massachusetts, and afterward in this city, his view, Slavery ought to be assailed, as the main spring of the rebellion; but that he left the matter entirely with the will of the Government. The New York speech, to which Mr. Russell refers, Mr. Sumner was not advocate universal emancipation, nor even among the slaves. He said: "Our Constitution must be reinforced by ideas, and we must strike at the heart of the rebellion by striking at Slavery." I do not say now in what way or to what extent. It may be by the system of a Massachusetts Senator, Charles Sumner. It may be by Fremont; or it may be by the grander system of John Quincy Adams, by saying that the rebellion should be struck in some way through the military system, Mr. Sumner merely expressed an all but universal opinion, and in saying that he left the matter with the will of the Government, he merely yielded to the action of the Administration in the matter, he merely expressed the universal determination.

The other ground upon which he asserts the imminence of civil war within this war is as follows: "The Government is accused in mass meetings, amidst immense cheering, of 'an infamous, sneaking, cowardly policy,' and the supporting the fabric which sword bended by Fremont for this great nation." Assuredly, if he be thus encouraged, the General is not the man to hesitate to wield the terrible temporary dictature with equanimity." There was a large meeting, enthusiastic demonstration lately, in Cincinnati, about the middle of November, at which the Rev. Mr. Conway, an ardent and sincere abolitionist, but by no means a violent partisan, say, or is reported to have said, what Mr. Russell describes, the spirit of that meeting the spirit not the slightest response from any quarter; but Mr. Russell puts it as if "in mass meeting" through out the North the most violent measures were applauded. Meanwhile General Frémont has studiously forborne from a single patriotism which surprises no one who knows him, to please in the least degree those who might wish him to make an open war upon the Administration.

Of course both he and those who believe him to be an able and an honest officer still believe that the "electric wire would" in the very course of our success. But the spirit of the passionate eloquence of Mr. Conway was simply the noble word of General Frémont's conduct nor of the policy of his friends. And the morality of the impression of the spirit of those things in the extreme conveyed in this letter of Mr. Russell is but an illustration of the entire lack of intelligence which he betrays give to our sentiments and events in general.

TRAITORS WITHIN THE LINES.

IT was not to be expected that a treason of so long growth and of such a nature as that which has culminated in this rebellion, could be rooted out at once even from the civil service of the Government. The effects of which such men as Floyd, Cobb, Thompson, and Toucey were the heads could not be the fall of traitors. But it was not so easy to discover them—and often it must have been very difficult, with due regard to the proper sequence of the public business, to expel them peremptorily.

Suppose Mr. Chase, upon taking the keys of the Treasury, had summoned singly each of the clerks in the Department, and had tendered them the oath of allegiance. Some traitors might have hesitated, and they would have been at once set aside. But of course many would have had no hesitation to receive the pay of the Government while plotting or favoring its overthrow, would have taken the oath of allegiance with the smoothest face and glibbest tongue in the world.

The suspicion that every clerk in the Department had refused the oath. How would it have worked to turn every one out and fill their places with men of unquestioned fidelity who had not the least idea of the duties or the routine of their office? It was by no means easy to winnow the chaff from the grain.

So with the army and navy. Experience justified the reluctance of the body of officers both in the rebellious section. Of course there were shining exceptions. Farragut and Porter, for instance, who would unquestionably allow the justice of the doubt. Yet nothing surely could be more ungracious than to assume disloyalty invariably, and to act upon the assumption. So we were exposed to delays, and even to treachery; but it was unavoidable.

When the leaders of the rebellion determined to strike openly they naturally took the most without perfect deliberation. For we must never forget that it was we who moved suddenly and without extraordinary preparation. The rebels had had the Government in their power for many years. They knew how deep and how far the treason had spread. Mr. Slidell said, during the Peace Congress, "There will be no serious fighting." He thought that the hap-hazard process of force would be apparent to the Government. The experience of nine months since the outbreak was great reason for his feeling so far as the treasonable action of the Government were concerned. The game was to make the rebellion so formidable and so fast to be an "abolition" movement; and as all office-holders and the Democratic party hated nothing so much as "abolition," that cry was to quickly and purgative them.

Now, happily it failed in the country at large, how party shackles of all kinds fell off, and patriots who had been buried in party came forth like statues from the sculptor's chisel. In the Presidencies, is now matter of history. But so far as the personnel of the Government was concerned, of which so large a part in the Departments and in the army and navy were born in Secesia or sympathized with secession, the expectations of the rebels were not unfounded.

Therefore it is to be expected that from time to time fresh exposures of treason, even in high places, will be made. The process of purgation, of course, is going on. But after a long practice and the logic of events are somnambulists traitors. The women, by whose agency so much blood has been shed and wrong done already, are getting desperate. "Washington swarms with traitors," we hear. Here, but Washington is not of course swarm with traitors more than any city out of Secesia. It is their native air; and it is the point where they can do most mischief.

UNDER WHICH KING?

IN the recent debate in the House upon the Post-Office Bill Mr. Horace Maynard is reported to ask the Secretary of War to reply a little more satisfactorily touching the battle at Ball's Bluff, two questions were put at once, which, taken in connection, for they came from representatives of the extreme right and the extreme left of the friends of the Government and the Union.

Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, who is popularly supposed to be entirely devoted to the Administration, asked whether he preferred the perpetuation of slavery to that of the Union. Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, made a reply which was not quite an answer. But Mr. Mallory, also of Kentucky, immediately rose to his question, and said: "Answering I know the feeling of Kentucky, if we considered slavery standing in the way of the Constitution we were not hesitate to destroy slavery." He added, that "we can not regard slavery as inseparable with the liberty established by our forefathers;" and concluded by asking Mr. Lovejoy whether he "would destroy the Constitution to get rid of slavery?"

Mr. Lovejoy replied that he would not. He only declared that slavery must be destroyed rather than the Constitution and the Union.

What Mr. Lovejoy thinks and means is very clear. Does Mr. Mallory mean that, if slavery threatens the liberty established by our forefathers we can destroy it to save that liberty? Or does he mean, that, as slavery is not inseparable with that liberty, therefore that liberty can not be preserved without maintaining that slavery? Does Mr. Mallory mean that he thinks slavery is an essential part of the liberty of the country? Or, as he thinks, that slavery is not a part of the liberty as established, not merely tolerated or recognized, by the Constitution?

We do not desire the ground on which Davis and Breckinridge justify their rebellion.

ARE PERSONS CONTRABAND?

IN his note to M. Mercier, the French Minister, acknowledging the French dispatch on the Trent affair, Mr. Seward certainly states the truth very mildly when he says: "While it must be admitted that those three Powers are equally impressed with the importance of establishing principles favorable to neutral rights, there is at the same time not such an entire agreement concerning the application of those principles to the present case as to secure that important object."

The reason why there is not is that there is an entire difference of opinion.

This is sufficiently clear upon one point only. Are persons, not in the military service of the enemy, contraband and liable to seizure? In reply to this question Mr. Seward quotes Sir William Scott: "You may stop the ambassador of your enemy on his passage. And in reply to the suggestion that agents of a rebellious movement can not be ambassadors, he relies upon "the true test in all cases—namely, the spirit of the law." Mr. Everett, also, quotes the same passage in regard to "the em-bassador of your enemy upon his passage." To the objection that, as rebellious agents, they are not embassadors, Mr. Everett says: "But on this supposition, the emissaries of a rebellious province, going abroad in quest of foreign succor, the very case and the very circumstance on which the law of nations is founded that authorizes the arrest of the enemy's embassadors—could never be seized."

Both these gentlemen, relying upon Vattel and Sir William Scott, hold that rebel emissaries are embassadors of the enemy; therefore contraband: therefore liable to seizure. The lawful method of seizure we do not here discuss.

Upon this point of the contraband of persons the great French authority, De Hautefeuille, entirely differs from the views advanced by Mr. Seward and Mr. Everett. He states the case broadly in this way: "Any ship freighted expressly for the transport of land or sea troops, of recruits for the service of a belligerent, would not be carrying contraband of war. It would be guilty of a direct participation in the hostilities: it would lose its neutral character: it would be a belligerent, and if it fell into the hands of the adversary it would share the fate reserved for belligerent vessels—it would be confiscated with all its cargo." By all the treaties, he says, the only isolated persons who can be removed from a neutral vessel are those who are in the military service of the enemy, and then not as contraband, for persons can not become so." And he sums up the French position upon this point as follows: "First, that in no case can there exist contraband of war on a neutral vessel sailing between two neutral ports. Second, that even if there were contraband of war, the sole right of the cruiser would be to seize the vessel and to carry it into one of the ports of his own country to have it legally sentenced. Third, that persons can not, in any case, be considered as contraband of war. Fourth, that Messrs. Slidell and Mason, not being in the military service of the Southern Confederation at the moment of their arrest, could not be carried off from the neutral vessel in which they were sailing."

There is evidently "not an entire agreement" in these views. They can be harmonized only by an international Congress. But it is clear that France and the United States will not seriously differ; for Mr. Marcy's improvement upon the Treaty of Paris, that free ships make free goods, and that neutrals between neutral ports are to be visited only to determine that they are such, will in time doubtless become the maritime law of the world. Mr. Seward justly bases his recent action upon the generally acknowledged doctrine of to-day—namely, that the neutral flag covers what is not contraband of war. That is the doctrine of the Treaty of Paris, and that is the latest general law.

FROM ENGLAND.

A FRIEND long resident in Paris writes to the Lounger under date of December 14:

"We have allowed ourselves to speak very contemptuously of them (the English) sometimes; they will have a chance now to retaliate. At the Guildford Agricultural Society dinner (see Galignani's Messenger of this morning) the Rev. G. Portal (rector of Albury), after having urged an effective extermination of the hybrid Germano-Anglo, etc., etc., etc. mixture, gave as a sufficient reason for his sanguinary and Christian counsels that 'a Yankee was as great a parody upon an Englishman as a monkey was upon the human race.' Think of it, my dear fellow, after all you are nothing but a parody!

"Well, if you are a parody, you can retaliate and tell t'other that he is a pretext. It is well understood here that they were trying to make a pretext * * * of the Nashville and Harvey Birch affair when the Trent turned up. The Admiralty lawyers were sent for. Their report was that in face of the Queen's proclamation nothing could be said. 'But,' cried out Palmerston, 'by ——, you must cook up something.' They could not; so the common law lawyers tried their skill. 'Why don't you publish their report?' I said to my English friend. 'Oh! d—— it, it was so weak that we could do nothing but make a report of their report. All we wanted was a pretext.'

"My dear friend—I mean my unfortunate parody—if you have any country left at the end of the English crusade, do not call it Anglo-Saxon, or say that liberty is the mission of that race again. * * * The 'pretexts' are the veriest hypocrites and blood-thirsty slaves of Mammon that God's sun has shone upon. Why, this same day's paper contains a nice calculation: when embarrassed by prisoners, one Enfield bullet was enough for eight Sepoys; now one Whitfield ditto will finish eleven and a half 'parodies.' If you are in the line, pray put yourself at the tail of it!

"I don't know what our movements will be. The pretexts have more that 4000 guns out with us, or on their way (at least by the 8th of January). They count on Baltimore and Annapolis, and a combined movement with the rebels on Washington. Also on Portland, Maine, and the 'indemnity,' of which their official journal talks, is that port and so much of Maine as they consider necessary for Canada. This information is accurate." * * * * *

The Rev. G. Portal, rector of Albury, may be a very amiable rural British saint, but his amusing talk is significant only as indicating a public state of mind which could tolerate it. That Great Britain would gladly have accepted a war upon the Trent issue is beyond question. That the British nation—partly through willfulness, partly through ignorance and the falsehoods of rebel agents—is sorely inflamed against us, is equally indisputable. But it becomes us, as a nation of superior general intelligence, and resolved upon justice, not to retort by losing our temper; but by calm reply, and incessant and ample preparation, to avoid any collision which may be honorably avoided; and if it can not be, to accept the struggle with the determination that it shall be the last in which these two nations shall engage.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE rudeness of Dr. Parr to ladies was sometimes extreme. To a lady who had ventured to oppose him with more warmth of temper than cogency of reasoning, and who afterward apologized for herself by saying "that it was the privilege of women to talk nonsense." "No, Madam," he replied, "it is not their privilege, but their infirmity. Ducks would walk if they could; but nature suffers them only to waddle!"

A man who cheats in short measure is a measureless rogue. If in whisky, then he is a rogue in spirit. If by falsifying his accounts, then he is an unaccountable rogue. If he gives a bad title to land, then he is a rogue in deed. If he gives short measure in wheat, then he is a rogue in grain.

A lady, suspecting that her female servant was regaling her young man upon the cold mutton of the larder, called Betty and inquired whether she had not heard some one speaking to her down stairs. "Oh no, ma'am," replied the girl, "it was only me singing a psalm." "Well, Betty," replied the lady, "I have no objection to your singing psalms; but let us have no HIMS, Betty—I have a great objection to HIMS."

An Irishman had been sick for a long time, and while in this state would occasionally cease breathing, and life be apparently extinct for some time, when he would again come to. On one of these occasions, when he had just awakened from his sleep, Patrick asked him: "An' how'll we know, Jemmy, when you're dead—you're afther wakin' up ivery time?" "Bring me a glass o' grog, an' say to me, 'Here's till ye, Jemmy!' an' if I don't rise up an' dhrink, then bury me!"

A bickering pair of Quakers were lately heard in high controversy, the husband exclaiming, "I am determined to have one quiet week with thee!" "But how wilt thou be able to get it?" said the taunting spouse, in "reiteration," which married ladies so provokingly indulge in. "I will keep thee a week after thou are dead!" was the Quaker's rejoinder.

A good story is told of St. Kevin, a religious gentleman, who lived by the fish he caught in the Irish lakes, which shows he was subjected to a severe temptation during one of his piscatorial excursions, but whether he fell into the snare laid for him or not, we do not remember. It seems that a belle of that ilk, named Kate, put the following leading questions to him:

"You're a rare hand at fishing," says Kate.
"It's yourself, dear, that knows how to hook 'em;
But when you have caught 'em, agrah!
Don't you want a young woman to cook 'em?"

A young lady at Notting Hill is so refined in her language that she never uses the word "blackguard," but substitutes "Ethiopian Sentinel."

At the examination of a boy of nine years of age for admission to one of the public schools in a suburban town, the teacher, after a satisfactory result in reading and spelling, asked, "What do you know about the United States?" The youngster promptly replied, "Don't know nothing: nobody does—all gone!"

A countryman in the depths of dyspeptic despair called on a physician. The doctor gave him some plain advice as to his food, making a thorough change, and ended by writing a prescription for some tonic, saying, "Take that, and come back in a fortnight." In ten days Giles returned, blooming and happy, the picture of health. The doctor was delighted, and proud of his skill. He asked to see what he had given him. Giles said he had not got it. "Where was it?" "I took it, Sir." "Took it! What have you done with it?" "I ate it, Sir! You told me to take it!"

An English judge being asked what contributed most to success at the bar, replied: "Some succeed by great talent, some by a miracle, but the majority by commencing without a shilling."

An old bachelor, seeing the words "Families Supplied" over the door of a shop, stepped in and said he would take a wife and two children.

"I say, Bill, what have you done with that horse of your'n?" "Sold him." "What did you sell him for?" "Why, he moved so slow at the last of it, that I got prosecuted half a dozen times for violating the law against standing in the street. The policeman at one time sighted him by a building five minutes, and couldn't see him move."

Not long since a premium was offered by an agricultural society for the best mode of irrigation; and the latter word, by mistake of the printer, having been changed to "irritation," a farmer sent his wife to gain the prize.

A fashionable baronet has said, with no less feeling than high moral sense, "Happy, thrice happy the man who has the means to keep a servant to stretch the tight boots before he wears them himself!"

"Anyt'ing pite you dare?" inquired one Dutchman of another, while engaged in angling. "No, not'ing at all." "Vell!" returned the other, "not'ing pite me too."

"Your hand annoys me exceedingly," said a French nobleman in Paris to a talkative person who was sitting near him at a dinner, and who was constantly suiting the action to the word. "Indeed, my lord," replied the gabbler, "we are so crowded at the table that I do not know where to put my hand." "Put it in your mouth," said the nobleman.

If the cat had wings, no birds would be left in the air. If every one had what he is wishing, who would have any thing?

"What is the difference between a good soldier and a fashionable young lady?" "One faces the powder, and the other powders the face."

"Wife, I thought you said you were going to have a goose for dinner?" "So I did? and I've kept my word." "Where is it?" "Why, my dear, ain't you here for dinner?" Smithers couldn't see the point of that joke.

Frederick the Great, after a very terrible engagement, asked his officers, "Who behaved the most intrepidly during the engagement?" The preference was given to himself. "You are all mistaken," replied the King; "the boldest fellow was a fifer, whom I passed twenty times during the contest, and he did not vary a note during the whole time."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, 7th January, in the Senate, petitions for the emancipation of slaves, and for the exchange of prisoners of war, were presented and referred. A resolution was adopted, instructing the Naval Committee to inquire how the practice has prevailed in the navy of making purchases through other than recognized agents, and if such have been made, whether larger prices have been paid. The bill to increase the number of cadets at the West Point Military Academy was then taken up, discussed, and rejected by a vote of twelve yeas against twenty-five nays. Senator Wilson's bill providing for the punishment of army officers, by dismissal from the service, who shall detain fugitive slaves, was taken up. A motion by Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, to indefinitely postpone the subject, was defeated—yeas thirteen, nays twenty-three. The further consideration of the bill was then, on motion of Senator Carlile, of Virginia, postponed for the present.——In the House, the documents relative to the settlement of the Trent affair were received from the President. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, expressed his dissatisfaction at the surrender of Mason and Slidell, and predicted that in less than three months we shall be involved in war with Great Britain, or else submit to the recognition of the Southern Confederacy and the breaking up of the blockade. Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, justified the capture of the rebel envoys, and said that England did us grievous wrong in demanding their surrender. A lengthy, lively, and interesting discussion ensued, and finally the documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On Wednesday, 8th, in the Senate, resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature, in favor of constructing a railroad to connect Kentucky with loyal East Tennessee and Western North Carolina, were presented by Senator Powell and referred. A series of resolutions adopted by the Kentucky Legislature, assuming the State's quota of the direct national tax, pledging the State to be true and loyal to the Constitution and the Union, protesting against Congressional interference with slavery, and approving the President's modification of General Fremont's proclamation, were also presented by Senator Powell. The Naval Committee reported the House bill providing for the construction of twenty iron-clad steam gun-boats, with an amendment authorizing the President to have the work done, instead of the Secretary of the Navy. This implied censure on the head of the Navy Department created a lively discussion, which continued till the expiration of the morning hour, when the subject was laid aside.——In the House, the Judiciary Committee were authorized to send for persons and examine witnesses relative to the telegraphic censorship of the press; also to compel the production of papers and dispatches sent or proposed to be sent. The Ways and Means Committee was instructed to consider the expediency of reporting a bill at their earliest convenience amending the eighth section of the act of August last, so as to provide for raising $100,000,000 instead of $20,000,000 by direct taxation, and that in this connection they consider the expediency of telegraph and stamp duties, and excise duties upon cotton, tobacco, and all malt and distilled liquors. On motion of Mr. Colfax, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of taxation for the support of the Government, as follows: One mill per mile on all railroad passenger travel; one-eighth per cent. on all transfers of stock, notes discounted, and bills of exchange; and five dollars docket fee on all suits commenced in any court of record. The Judiciary Committee were instructed to inquire and report as to the Constitutional power of Congress to make Treasury Notes payable on demand a legal tender. Mr. Blair offered a preamble setting forth the action of the French Government relative to the Trent affair, and concluding with a joint resolution declaring that the people of the United States are not insensible to the kindness which animated the French Government in its prompt and wise interposition, and for reasserting the principles of international law and neutral rights which have been held by both France and the United States. Mr. Vallandigham, regarding the dispatch of M. Thouvenel as hostile to the United States, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution. Mr. Lovejoy expressed a desire to debate the resolution, and it was laid over under the rule. Mr. Lovejoy offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the consideration of the House empowering the generals in command of the army who may take possession of any inhabited portion of the rebellious States to appoint commissioners of sequestration, whose duty it shall be: First—To take possession, for the use of the United States, of all property, real and personal, found without owners. Second—To convert all such personal property into money, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. Third—To sell at auction all homesteads sequestrated. Fourth—To give homesteads not exceeding one hundred and fifty acres to such settlers as shall occupy the same for three years. Fifth—The remainder of the lands to be surveyed and disposed of as other such property of the United States.

On Thursday, 9th, in the Senate, the House resolution in regard to bonded sugar and coffee was passed, by a vote of twenty-three to fifteen. Senator Hale introduced a bill to punish frauds on the Treasury by a fine to the amount of money fraudulently obtained, and imprisonment, at hard labor, for not more than ten years, also, that any officer of the Government convicted of fraud be discharged and punished, and ever after held ineligible for any office. Referred. Bills providing for a Signal Department of the army; to regulate the pay of army officers; organizing the staffs of the divisions of the army; regulating the appointment of chaplains and to allow Jewish chaplains, and to increase the clerical force of the Adjutant-General's office, were presented by the Committee on Military Affairs. The communication from the Secretary of State in regard to the Trent affair was then taken up, and Senator Sumner, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, delivered an elaborate exposition of the policy of the Government as regards the settlement of the recent difficulty with Great Britain. At the conclusion of Senator Sumner's remarks the Iron-Clad War Steamer bill was taken up, and the proposed amendment of the Naval Committee, that the ships be built under the direction of the President, instead of the Secretary of the Navy, gave rise to a discussion. The debate was closed by Senator Wilson's offering a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the Secretary of the Navy to report to the Senate the facts in regard to the employment of George B. Morgan to purchase vessels, and the amount of compensation paid him, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, bills to establish an arsenal at Springfield, Illinois; to punish frauds on the Government, and providing for the payment of interest, in certain cases, on claims against the Government, were presented and referred. The bill abolishing the franking privilege was then taken up. After debate, a motion was made to lay the subject on the table, and on this test vote the opponents of the bill were defeated by a vote of fifty-one against seventy-eight. Without further action the House adjourned.

On Friday, 10th, in the Senate, the report of the Judiciary Committee in favor of expelling Waldo P. Johnson and Trusten Polk, Senators from Missouri, who have joined the rebels, was adopted unanimously, and the Vice-President was instructed to notify the Governor of Missouri of this action of the Senate. The motion to refer the credentials of Mr. Stark, the newly-elected member from Oregon, whose loyalty is questioned, to the Judiciary Committee, was then taken up, discussed at some length, and finally adopted by a vote of 28 to 11. The bill organizing the signal department of the army was passed. The bill relative to the appointment of sutlers and defining their duties was taken up. Senator Lane, of Kansas, offered an amendment abolishing the sutler system, as it was a nuisance and an injury to the service. Senator Carlile moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to abolish sutlers and furnish soldiers tobacco rations; but without any action on the motion the subject was dropped.——In the House, a letter was received from the Secretary of War, in which he states that measures have been taken to ascertain who is responsible for the disastrous movement at Ball's Bluff, but that it is not compatible with the public interest to make known those measures at the present time. The paper was referred to the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War. In Committee of the Whole, the Civil Appropriation bill was taken up, and a long discussion ensued on an amendment offered by Mr. Stevens, appropriating $150,000 to supply the deficiency for printing Treasury Notes, in which frauds between the officials of the Treasury and the engravers were charged.

On Monday, January 13, in the Senate, petitions for the emancipation of slaves were presented and referred. The House bill, appropriating $150,000 for completing the defenses of Washington was reported by the Military Committee. The Judiciary Committee reported on the resolution to expel Senator Bright, of Indiana, that, the allegations being insufficient, the resolution do not pass. A motion to take up the bill indemnifying the owners of the British ship Perthshire, for damages sustained by reason of illegal capture by the blockading squadron, was disagreed to. Senator Carlile offered a resolution, which was laid over, that the Committee on Finance consider the expediency of providing by direct taxation on all kinds of property for a revenue of two hundred millions of dollars, and issuing bonds for that amount; also for the issuing of bonds to the amount of $800,000,000, and to establish a fiscal agency for New York, etc. Senator King introduced a bill, which was referred, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury Notes to the amount of $100,000,000, at 7 per cent. interest, and providing for a direct tax of $10,000,000 for the payment of the interest.——In the House, the Army Appropriation Bill was reported, and referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Andrew J. Clements was admitted to a seat as representative from the Fourth District of Tennessee, and was qualified by taking the usual oath. Mr. Dawes delivered a speech showing the frauds that have been perpetrated in the Government contracts, and Mr. Baker, of New York, advocated the passage of a tax bill to realize one hundred millions of dollars. With regard to the Treasury Note Printing appropriation, Mr. Dawes offered an amendment appropriating $150,000 for this service in addition to the former appropriation, provided no part of it be applied in payment or liquidation of any sum due on any existing contract for engraving and printing Treasury bonds or notes. This was agreed to—95 against 44. With regard to the Treasury note engraving, Mr. Dawes moved a similar proviso, appropriating $100,000. Adopted.

RETIREMENT OF SECRETARY CAMERON.

Hon. Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, has resigned, and accepted the mission to Russia, from which Cassius M. Clay is about to retire, in order, it is said, to take a command in the army. Mr. Cameron's successor is Edwin M. Stanton, an eminent lawyer from Pennsylvania, and formerly a conspicuous member of the Ohio bar. Mr. Stanton, it will be remembered, was appointed Attorney-General of the United States in December, 1860, when Judge Black was transferred to the State Department, and was one of those members of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet who took the place of the three traitors, Floyd, Thompson, and Cobb.

DEPARTURE OF BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION.

The Burnside expedition, upon which so much of the public interest has been concentrating for some time past, sailed from Hampton Roads very suddenly on Saturday night and Sunday morning, leaving a few vessels behind, no doubt to bring on further reinforcements. The weather there at that time was very pleasant, notwithstanding that it was very foggy and disagreeable here. It may be that the sudden departure of the expedition was decided upon because of the favorable weather, or it may have been the result of some news received by General Burnside.

HUMPHREY MARSHALL'S FORCE SCATTERED.

Intelligence is received, from three different sources, that the second invasion of Eastern Kentucky by the rebels has ended still more disgracefully for them than the first, and that Humphrey Marshall, from whom the rebels expected so much, has failed signally in establishing his reputation as a military leader. On 8th instant Colonel Garfield, in command of the National forces, had advanced up the Big Sandy River as far as Painesville, seven miles from the rebel camp, when he was met by a flag of truce from Marshall, who wished to know if matters could not be arranged without a fight. Colonel Garfield, however, had no arrangement to offer but a fight or an unconditional surrender of the rebel forces. Whereupon Marshall addressed his men, and gave them the choice of scattering or surrendering, and they concluded to scatter, after burning all their wagons, tents, camp equipage, etc. Nothing was taken away by the rebels but their cannon, which were expected to be captured by Colonel Garfield's cavalry, which went immediately in pursuit.

THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

The news from Cairo and Chicago is to the effect that the advance of the great expedition had commenced a Southward movement, and the main body of the troops had embarked preparatory to leaving. The various brigades were to be placed under the command of Generals Paine, M'Clernand, Smith, and Wallace.

THE STEAMER "PENSACOLA" GONE TO SEA.

The steamer Pensacola succeeded in running the blockade of the Potomac on 11th as far as Indian Head, where she remained until 12th, at which time she again started on her way. She was fired at by the rebel batteries, and twenty-two shots were aimed at her, but none hit the mark. She did not return the fire, although heavily laden with cannon and other appliances of war, and fully prepared for hostile service. The safe passage of the vessel is a source of great satisfaction to all parties concerned.

THE WAR IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

Our army in Western Virginia continues active. A brilliant affair is announced to have taken place at Blue's Gap, east of Romney, at daybreak on 7th, when a detachment of General Kelley's forces, commanded by Colonel Dunning, of the Fifth Ohio regiment, attacked two thousand of the enemy, routing them completely. The rebels lost fifteen killed, two pieces of cannon, their wagons, etc., and twenty prisoners, including one commissioned officer, were captured. None of the Union soldiers were killed. A force of three hundred Union troops, belonging to the Thirty-second Ohio regiment, under command of Captain Lacey, dispatched by General Milroy into Tucker County, dispersed four hundred rebels, and captured a large quantity of stores, a commissary, a first lieutenant, and a private soldier. Four of the rebels were found dead on the field, and a large number of wounded. At last accounts the Union troops were in hot pursuit of the fugitives.

AFFAIRS AT PORT ROYAL.

A dispatch has been received at the War Department from General Sherman, giving a brief statement of the objects and results of General Stevens's recent expedition from Port Royal Island. The object was to destroy the batteries of the enemy on the Coosaw River, and to punish him for firing into the steamer Mayflower on her recent passage through that stream. The expedition was successful in every respect. The rebels were driven off, their batteries demolished, and the property found there either destroyed or brought away. General Stevens is on the main land awaiting reinforcements.

GUN-BOAT SKIRMISH ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

A gun-boat skirmish took place last week near Cairo. It appears that three rebel gun-boats attacked the two Union boats, Essex and St. Louis, lying off Fort Jefferson; but the fire being returned, the rebel boats retreated, the others following in hot pursuit until the former were sheltered by the guns of the batteries at Columbus. It is believed one of the rebel boats was disabled during the engagement.

GOVERNMENT SALE OF COTTON.

The Government sale of sea-island Cotton, confiscated by the National forces in South Carolina, was made last week. There were, in all, seventy-three bales sold, weighing about 25,700 pounds. The prices paid varied from 63¼ cents for the ginned down to 18 cents for unginned. The total proceeds of the sale were $14,231 12.

DISTRESSES OF THE REBELS.

The Richmond journals are putting forth the most heart-rending appeals to the rebel volunteers, whose time is about expiring, to re-enlist; and proclaiming that the North is about to slaughter and devour the whole South. In the Kanawha region the rebels say they are in a terrible plight; and that if Rosecrans crosses to "Pock's," it will be about up with them. This is a valuable hint for General Rosecrans, now in this town. In East Tennessee, the rebels say the people are rapidly renouncing the Lincoln Government; but it seems they are not entering the rebel service, as a writer from Knox County, which has 3500 voters, says it is "unrepresented in the armies of the South."

LIBERALITY OF VERMONT.

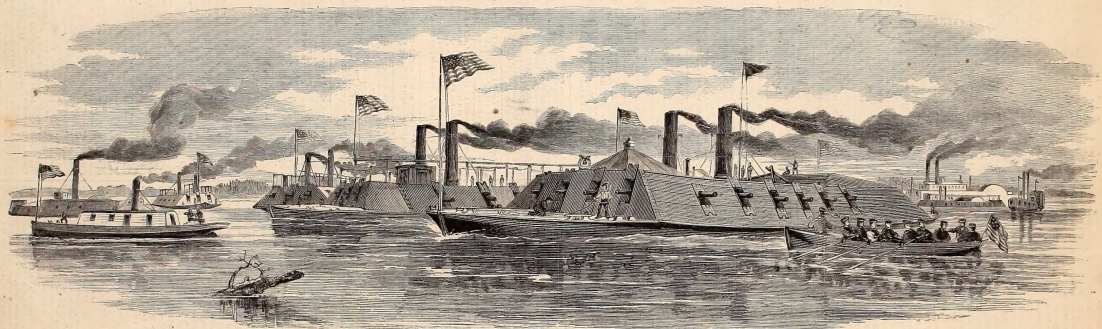
The State of Vermont has opened a bank account for each one of the volunteers from that State, and regularly passes to his credit seven dollars a month. If the money remains undrawn for six months, six per cent. interest is allowed. This makes the pay of the Vermont soldiers twenty dollars a month.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

JOHN BULL COOLING DOWN.

THE hot-blooded rush to arms in England has cooled down, and the dread of the horrors of war and dangers to commerce are making themselves manifest, while some are considering the chances of "no war at all," and begin to count the cost of their hostile demonstration. It is asserted that the money expended would have relaid the Atlantic cable, by which means so vast a waste of cash would have been saved. Deputations from several religious bodies, peace societies, and other corporations have waited on the Premier, and memorials have been presented to induce him, if possible, to refrain from war; and arbitration, if not recommended, is broadly hinted at.



GERMANY.

PRUSSIA AGAINST US.

The Government of Prussia has addressed a dispatch to the Minister of Prussia at Washington in reference to the arrest of Messrs. Mason and Slidell, condemning the proceeding of the commander of the San Jacinto.

MICHAEL THE DRAGOON.

IN the year '49 I was major in the dragoon regiment of which I have now the honor to be colonel; but, owing to the great loss of officers in the early part of the Hungarian campaign, was virtually then in command. The rebels knew our weak point. They were aware that men could be supplied to the Austrian army in any number; but that to cripple us effectually they had only to pick off the officers, and we were at their mercy. This plan they accordingly carried out. None of us ever expected to see nightfall when we went into action. Thus it happened that, though but a young man at the time, I was senior officer of the Lichtenstein regiment, as fine a body of men, I venture to say, as are to be found in the service.

We had suffered a good deal since the beginning of the war, and our force was reduced from its original strength of one thousand to about seven hundred and fifty sabres; but the men were true as steel, and eager to revenge the death of their comrades. The time of which I am going to speak was the latter end of March, immediately after the battle of Szolnok, a town upon the right bank of the Theiss, before which we had just sustained a tremendous defeat. Prince Windischgrätz, the Austrian commander, was falling back as rapidly as possible upon the river, and the Hungarians, under Görgei, were in hot pursuit. Though much cut up, our fellows did not lose heart, and the retreat was conducted with tolerable order.

My Lichtensteins led the advance. With us marched a corps of engineers and the wagons carrying pontoons, upon which it was intended to cross the river. Behind us we could hear the distant thunder of the guns, which told of the stubborn resistance still offered by our comrades in the Hungarian pursuit. We had arrived upon the bank, and were making every preparation to construct the bridge, when an orderly with dispatches dashed up to the front and inquired for me. He was the bearer of an order to lead the cavalry immediately across the river, as the Prince had received information that Szentes, a petty market town of great local importance, separated by a small wood from the left bank of the Theiss, was held by a considerable force of the enemy, who might embarrass the passage of the army next morning, or at any rate keep us in check until Görgei came up, when, taken between two fires, our utter annihilation seemed certain. If, on the contrary, we could manage to put the river between us and our pursuers, we should be secure, for their hastily-mixed levies were unprovided with the means of crossing its rapid stream. I was therefore to reconnoitre Szentes, and carry it at all hazards before the arrival of the Prince.

To read was to obey. Leaving the engineers to construct the bridge, I summoned my men, and as there was no time to look for a ford, they were compelled to swim the river. Some loss was experienced in the transit; a few were carried away by the violence of the current, but nearly all finally reached the left bank in safety. It was now dark. Parties were sent out instantly to reconnoitre the town, pickets were thrown into the wood, and we got ready for immediate action if the report of the scouts should render it advisable.

Now I should state that, though the majority of the Lichtensteiners were men upon whom I could implicitly depend, there were some few Hungarians in the regiment in whose fidelity to their oath I did not place perfect trust. I had had no particular reason for this doubt; all the men had fought well and bravely in the actions which had occurred, and no signs of disaffection to the Emperor had been noted. Still I thought it best to be upon my guard, and had, therefore, some days back, privately desired the captains to see that none of those whom I distrusted were appointed to any important charge. They were especially forbidden to place them on pickets. The arrangement had worked well; none of the Hungarians were told off for outpost duty; or, if they were, always in company with others whose fidelity was unimpeachable; and the men were believed not to have perceived the precaution. In accordance with this rule I was justified in supposing that the pickets now in the wood between us and Szentes were all well-affected men.

Toward nine o'clock our scouts returned. They brought with them a couple of peasants whom they had found gathering twigs and fallen branches in the wood. Two active Bohemians, well acquainted with the language, had changed clothes with the prisoners, and by this means penetrated without trouble into the town. They reported it occupied by about one thousand men, mostly peasants, armed with scythes and flails. The news of our defeat at Szolnok had apparently not yet reached them; but although no suspicion of our vicinity appeared to be entertained, too many were about to render an immediate attack prudent. I called the officers together, and we agreed to assault at midnight. The men were dismissed for a couple of hours to get their supper and obtain a little rest after their laborious day's march. A very short time sufficed before the troops had their fires lighted and the coffee-pots swinging over, the cheerful blaze. Some superintended the cooking, while others picketed the horses, and refreshed the poor brutes with water and such scanty forage as was at hand.

I have seldom seen a more picturesque scene than our little bivouac presented to me as I lay wrapped in my cloak by the fire, enjoying my after-supper pipe. The night, though cold, was fine but dark. As there was no moon, all the light afforded by the sky was given by the stars, which seemed to shine out with unusual brilliancy. Before me rolled the rapid waters of the Theiss, across which came the clink of the pontoniers' hammers, as the bridge grew beneath their practiced hands. Around us the men were mostly sleeping, for the poor fellows were tired with the forty-mile march from Szolnok. The flickering blaze of the fires was thrown up against the dark back-ground of wood and thicket, and brought out here and there in strong relief the figure of some energetic spirit, who, too excited to rest, was pacing to and fro, and meditating, perhaps, whether the next hour or two might not see the close of his earthly career. I felt convinced that the peasants with whom we should have to deal in attacking Szentes would fight desperately enough, and that no easy task lay before us; but I had great confidence in the terror of a night surprise, and little fear as to the result.

It might have been about half past ten, and, with the exception of the sounds of which I have spoken, quiet reigned around the fires. My pipe had dropped from my lips, and I was lapsing into slumber, when a loud shout from the wood—the well-known "Eljen!" of the Hungarians—startled every one of us to his feet in an instant. A rush was made to the horses, but long before one-half of the force were in their saddles the Philistines were upon us.

From three parts of the wood at once a column of dark forms, dimly seen by the light of the expiring watch-fires, broke with shouts and cries upon the Lichtensteiners nearest to them, and the work of death began. Though taken thoroughly by surprise, and mostly rescued from sleep, the conduct of officers and men, I may be excused for saying, could not have been surpassed. Those who had not yet mounted fell rapidly into formation, and opposed a front to the assailants, which the desperate rush of the latter found it impossible to break; while gathering quickly together the portion of the force which had gained the saddle, we swept down upon the enemy, charging through their extreme line again and again as if it had been so much pasteboard. A quarter of an hour decided the struggle. The flaring value of the ill-aimed peasants was no match for the disciplined intelligence of the perfectly-accoutred Lichtensteiners, and the assailants withdrew into the wood, having fully half their number upon the field, with the pursuing cavalry adding every moment to the roll of the slain.

As it would have been rash to follow up the pursuit without some further knowledge of the enemy we were encountering, I gave orders to sound the recall. The required information was soon gained from a wounded Hungarian, of whom we learned that our assailants were the Szentes men, who, having become aware of our vicinity—although from what source our informant could not, or would not, say—had entertained the same opinion as I had done of the efficacy of a night surprise, and had hoped to drive us into the Theiss.

As there was now no reason for delaying the assault of the town, and we might hope for easy victory after the advantage we had gained, I ordered instant advance. During the march I ascertained that our loss had been severe. Upward of eighty of the Lichtensteiners were hors de combat, and, although the Hungarian dead could be counted by hundreds, the latter fact in no degree lessened our compunction. What seemed most unaccountable was the completeness of the surprise. The Hungarian "Eljen!" had been the first notification of an enemy's approach. Neither of the outposts stationed in the wood—one indeed almost within gunshot of the town—had given the least signal of alarm. Unless treachery had been at work, how was this to be explained? The reason for the silence of the two sentinels ceased to be a mystery when cleared up as we reached the spots where the poor fellows had been posted. Each had fallen, having probably been taken unawares by peasants gliding through the brush-wood. This I afterward ascertained to have been the case. Here, at any rate, were two of the men, both slain at their posts; but where was the third? His horse was found tied to a tree; his pistols, undischarged, were in the holsters; but the sentinel himself was not to be found. One inference only could be drawn. He must have deserted, and it was to the information given by him that we were indebted for the Hungarian attack.

Further inquiry, as rapidly pursued as the circumstances would admit, brought out the suspicion—nay, that the missing sentinel was one of the men upon whom I had given orders to keep a watchful eye. He was a Hungarian, named Michael Kovats, a dragoon soldier, and, from his nationality, a man with whom no possible fault could be found. He had been three years in the regiment, and was never suspected of partiality toward his countrymen. Except upon this ground, however, suspicion could be assigned to no quarter. Time would not allow of investigating the cause for inferring my orders, that no important charge should be given to the man, for the time. The time I fully ascertained these facts we were already emerging from the wood and entering the town.

Half the men were ordered to dismount and advance at once to the attack, while a squadron was told off to guard the entrance of the wood in the rear. The loss which the insurgents had sustained upon the bank of the Theiss had lowered their courage so severe that little resistance was offered. A feeble barricade of carts, and similar materials had been thrown up at the entrance of the town, but was soon surmounted by the active assailants, who swarmed over it like rats, and scared the defenders where they stood. The men were in a furious rage against them, and well enough, but their number was small, and when once the town was charged upon—for near a hasty flight dispersed even this scanty band. The Lichtensteiners were so irritated at the disturbance of their night's rest that they gave little quarter. The officers had difficulty in dissuading them from firing the town; but even when I had succeeded in orders could prevent their pillaging the houses, and destroying every valuable too unwieldly to be carried away. I must confess that I took little pains to enforce strict discipline, for the loss of so large a number of my men had aroused in me also some spirit of revenge.

An hour perhaps had passed in plundering the town when I sent for the officers to assemble in the market-place. The men came straggling in, a few bringing prisoners, from whom it was thought important information might be gained, but all with as much booty as they could manage to collect. While the roll was being called, lights were placed in the windows of the houses looking upon the square, and lanterns attached to poles were hung up at the corners to enable us to guard against another surprise. While this was being done, my attention was directed to a house presenting a different appearance from any of the rest; large and high, built of stone, with the doors fastened and windows dark, it seemed at first as if deserted. No answer being given to our summons, an attempt was made to force the door, but its massive character defied violence, and I was on the point of calling off the men from wasting valuable time upon what, after all, was probably unimportant, when one of the sergeants came to tell me that the house belonged to Gregori Kozlo, a Hungarian of the town, who was believed to be on the Austrian side. The name being that of the missing sentry, made me send for the person who had given the information, and learning, further, that the servants had been left behind, I directed that the window should be broken in, and Michael Szalody grouped in speechless sorrow around the corpse. The entrance of our party aroused them from their stupor; they threw themselves before the deserter, and called loudly to him to leave his escape. Michael opened the window, and before our men could push the two men aside, had thrown it open and jumped out. He was instantly followed, and after a long chase among the cut-buildings in the rear of the premises, was captured and brought back into the room.

"Michael," said I, "you have been a bad soldier. "His ears will soon be settled. Tie paces and a long party of the deserter."

"Oh! spare him, my lord!" exclaimed one of the females, an elderly woman, throwing herself with clasped hands at the officer's feet. "Spare the poor boy! He never meant to desert. It was to ask his father's last blessing that he left his post, and we persuaded him. Oh, spare the boy!"

The two other women—a couple of handsome, dark-eyed girls—one of whom was Michael's sister, the other his cousin and betrothed, followed the mother's example, and, joined their cries to her supplications. Michael himself never uttered a word.

"A likely story," returned I, "but it is no matter. The facts are clear enough. Even if what you say were true, I have no power to save the man. Each of the way there. Sergeant, forward—march!"

As he spoke he pushed Michael's cousin, who was nearest to him, aside more roughly perhaps than he needed to have done. She was thrown off her balance, and falling forward cut her mouth against his heavy riding-boot. The blood gushed over her face, and stained her light-colored dress. The sight maddened Michael to fury. With a sudden curse he swung himself loose from the men who held him, rushed upon the officer, tore the sabre from his hand, and cut him down before the others of the party had time to interfere. He was disarmed and pinioned in a moment, however, and brought out just as the noise of the scuffle and the shrieks of the women had induced me to order in more men.

When Szeldy appeared outside, followed by two men supporting the wounded officer, I saw with difficulty I could keep the Lichtensteiners from rushing upon their former comrade and killing him. I should have been justified under the circumstances in ordering out a party and shooting him without delay, but refusing to give the man a hearing, I assembled the officers for a drumhead court-martial, and proceeded to try Michael Szeldy for the gross military crime of desertion and wounding his superior.

The facts were clear and unmistakable. I was particularly anxious to learn how it had happened that Szeldy had been placed on outpost duty contrary to regular order? An inquiry showed that a casualty accident sometimes frustrates our most carefully-laid plans. Although the sergeants were prohibited from placing the men on sentry, it was necessary to prevent the men themselves from receiving they were objects of suspicion, and therefore the officer placed in regular order upon the rota with the rest, but it was so contrived that something always occurred to prevent their taking turn of duty. In the present instance, Szeldy stood third on the list, but when the sentry-go posse, to which he was told off, found that No. 1 was missing, having been drowned in passing the Theiss; No. 2 was disabled by a kick from the stranger of one of his horses while riding in the dark among the trees; and the sergeant called forward No. 3 because he had literally no better man available. It was indispensable that a smart soldier should occupy the post; it was only to be for a short time; and from the good character of Szeldy in the regiment, with his apparent want of sympathy with the rebels, added to the manner in which he had volunteered for the fringing the order. It should be added that no one had the slightest suspicion of Michael's having relatives in Szentes.

The case against the prisoner was apparently unanswerable. He had left his post in the presence of the enemy, occasioning by negligence, if not by treachery, heavy loss to the regiment; he had tried to escape when discovered, and had severely wounded his officer when captured. The unanimous sentence of the court was, death on all the charges; the judgment—Death.

Before passing sentence, I, as president of the court, addressed the prisoner, and told him we were willing to hear any explanation he might have to offer. Szeldy had listened to the proceedings thus far in apparent stupor. It evidently seemed to him so inexplicable that he should be arraigned upon so frightful a charge as having treacherously caused the death of his comrades, that he had scarcely been able hitherto to realize the horror of his position. He roused up a little, however, at my address, and after a short pause began to speak.

"I am a soldier, I remember his words well, in his speech struck me as one of remarkable ability for a man in his station.

"Major and gentlemen," said he, saluting the court, "I know that whatever I may say won't be of any use, for it seems to be all made out against me. I must die by my comrades' fire as a coward and a traitor, where if I willingly have given every drop of blood in my body to have saved even one of them. I'm not afraid of death, for I've looked him me in the face often enough, but I do shudder at the thought that those by whose side I've fought so often should curse my name and memory after I'm gone. That's a dreadful curse to die with upon one's mind, and more than all, because as I hope for forgiveness in heaven, I am innocent of the charges brought against me as any one of your gentlemen can be. Except that I got down the lieutenant's horse, that's true, I'll not pat it to you, gentlemen, whether if any of you were to ever find yourself in a similar way, I injured, you wouldn't have acted as I did? But that's not the point to mock as the charge that by my negligence I betrayed my comrades. Well, what weighs upon my mind, and it's that in particular I want to speak about,

"When the sergeant left me on sentry I dismounted, feeling, old, tied my horse to a tree, and commenced walking my beat. I was relieved at an hour, looking every now and then at the town lines, where the lights in the windows were gradually disappearing, and every thing becoming still. I was thinking we should have an easier job in surprising them from the Lichtensteins' quarter, as it may be sure it was the very last of my thoughts that any one I cared a pipe of tobacco about was among the rebels. I'm a Szentes man myself, and for months—in fact, since the beginning of the war—could not hear from my poor father had removed here entered my mind.

"As I said, Major, I marched up and down after my hour, when I heard a footstep, and in the bushes near. 'Halt!' thinks I, 'let's keep quiet a bit, and see who goes there.' So I stepped behind the trees to watch my beat, and to be watched. In a minute or two out came a woman, whom I couldn't see for the trees, and who, not to making off toward the town, when I sung out to her to stop, or I should fire. She started, as you may suppose, and ran to offer to me, but as I didn't know then was one within miles of the place, and thought it was a trick, I fired. I was just asking what brought her into the wood at that time of night, and telling her she was my prisoner, when she gave a scream, and I knew the name, and jumped up my neck. Then, Major, I observed that was my cousin, Carlin Kerbely, to whom I was promised before the drafting, and for her I heard that my father and all the family had gone to Szentes, and that she had left the Lichtenstein uniform, and was a lost hope; but then she found her father, who was one of the men murdered by Jellachich's Croats the day before, and was now getting back to Szentes as fast as she could.

"You may think, gentlemen, that a suicide news this was to me. First, my father was very ill, and not likely to survive the night; next, my mother and sister and poor Carlin in a country ravaging to attack, and I knowing only too well what they might expect from the Lichtensteiners when the blood was up. Carlin begged and prayed me to come with her into the town to see my father once more before he died, and to take her with me, as impossible I could leave my post, she assured me that I should be back in an hour, and that no one would be found out. Then I began to think, too, the thing might be managed, if she could get out of the town and to the Austrian lines, and that if I could not get back in time it would be enough, when the advance took place, that I had fallen in with the rebels, and I should be able to protect the women after the town was taken. In talking to this Carlin to me, I had forgotten that I'd also forgot all about my horse being tied to the tree and that being found there I should be thought to have given leave.

"Well, gentlemen, to make my story short, I agreed to go with her, and she promised I should be back in half an hour. The lights were all out as we got into the place; there wasn't a soul stirring, and we reached the house without mishap. When we entered, Carlin told my mother and sister I had consented to go with her to see my father in to my father. How they found out the town that the Lichtensteiners were in the wood and on the bank of the river I don't know. Perhaps my mother can tell you. All I do know is that my father kept fast hold of my hand till he died, and that I couldn't let my poor father go. Perhaps the attack was from the firing outside, and affected the Lichtensteiners, I can't remember. They cause the lieutenant and our men, and you know what has just happened."

Rather to test the truth of Szeldy's story for my own satisfaction than for any benefit its confirmation would be to him, I questioned the prisoner, and tried to discover from her how our occupation of the wood had become known in Szentes. From her statement it appeared that a neighbor, who was in the house when Carlin Kerbely told her aunt and cousin of Michael's arrival, must have overheard the story and communicated it to the leaders of the peasants in the town. Probably several of the rescuing party had brought him to Szentes was, therefore, very probable true, and that the fact of Szeldy's having been guilty of having intentionally betrayed his companies; but the fact of his having undoubtedly abandoned his post was established by his own confession, and it was certainly through his negligence that the attack took place. The wound of his superior officer, again, although inflicted under great provocation, was an inexcusable crime. I felt such sympathy with the man on account of the trying circumstances into which he had been thrown, but pity could not be permitted to overrule duty. Sentence must therefore be pronounced, the only indulgence the court could permit being the postponement for an hour, to enable the prisoner to take leave of his relatives and the friends of death.

Szeldy was placed for safe custody in a stable adjoining his father's house, a sentry being posted at the door. His mother, sister, and cousin—who, after the first shock, had given his sentence with a composure which seemed to me strangely unfeeling at the time—were then admitted to take their leave, and after they had taken their farewell of the prisoner, and had been expelled by the sentry, I myself, with the rest of the court, proceeded to the place of execution. The interview with his mother and sister was over, but that with his cousin lasted longer—so long, in fact, that the priest interrupted them before it was concluded. I had been told before I arrived that, if I would consent to see a request from the prisoner to be permitted to see Carlin once more, but without witnesses, as he had a last message to deliver to her. Willing to afford the poor fellow whatever consolation was in my power, I assented to the request. The priest sought Carlin, brought her to the door of the stable, and closed it upon her. Some time having passed without the sound of a voice, the priest again went in to hasten the parting. As he came out he said, in a very serious look, saying: "Poor souls, poor souls! I am glad I left them to part. Grant them a few minutes longer. I go to comfort the afflicted mother."

He walked away. A quarter of an hour passed, and still no sign. Longer delay could not be permitted, and a corporal with a file of men was sent in to bring out the prisoner. They had scarcely entered, however, before a shout was heard within, and the corporal rushed out, exclaiming, "Treachery! Michael has escaped; and the girl, too, has disappeared!"

Escaped!" I ejaculated. "Impossible! Surround the place, I shall look to the post at."

We hurried into the stable, searched it in every corner, turned over the bundles of hay and straw on command, and then looked into the ranks and dungeons, but in vain. Neither Michael nor Carlin were to be found. The mother and sister and the priest had also mysteriously disappeared. It was evident that the repeated interviews were nothing but a device to gain time for the collected ones to complete their arrangements. Though bitterly annoyed at having been so thoroughly duped, I can not say that I felt particularly sorry to be relieved from a painful duty. Michael had remained faithful to the cause, and could not have been executed; and being persuaded that the story he had told was true, my feelings had pulled hard in favor of the noble-minded man and his mistress of war had toggled just as vehemently in another. Under the circumstances, however, I was not hypocrite enough to affect much grief at his escape. The only mystery I should have been glad to solve, in what way the escape had been effected.

This mystery, would not allow of our desiring much pains to its discovery. News was received that the advanced-guard of the Prince's force had passed the Danube at various points, and that even I gave orders for instantly evacuating Szentes, and the Lichtensteiners resumed their position at the head of the Austrian army. I was glad to learn that the passage of the river was only just effected in time. Gorgey's force debouched upon the left bank as the last of our corps was still upon the bridge, and it was under a heavy fire, and with the loss of the rear-guard, before the latter could be succeeded in detaching the pontoons, and thus destroying the means of the enemy following us beyond the Theiss. Two days later we fell in with strong reinforcements under General Vetter, which placed us in a position to hold our own in the next encounter.

In the year '55, long after I had forgotten the mysterious escape of Michael Szeldy, I was again in command of a party of Hussars in Transylvania, over the service in which we were engaged was far less hazardous than that of attempting to subdue the revolutionary spirit which had manifested itself former part of the corps d'armée under Count Carl Gottlieb, and which was now occupying part of Wallachia, the Danubian Principalities, during the Crimean war. Except an occasional brush with the Cossacks, however, we saw little of the enemy service; and it was during one of these small expeditions that the mystery which had hitherto involved the events I have just detailed was cleared up.

Intelligence had been received at Bucharest that the inhabitants of a Moldavian village had risen against a company of Croat infantry quartered in them, owing, as the officer in charge, by our men. The Moldavians had besieged the barracks, and the men were only saved from massacre by some of the guns. Orders were given me to see to the suppression of the disturbance, and to bring the ringleaders to trial. Two regiments of Austrian Lichtensteiners had been considered sufficient for this purpose, and I was provided out with my command. a man who had attended me for many years—to-ward a little inn upon the frontier, where I had left my command during the expedition's progress.

It chanced that we had never been in this part of the country before. The inhabitants were peaceable and quiet, and our duties brought us chiefly into contact with people of a different class. We had, consequently, then, after receiving a wide tract of hilly country, we strayed from the highroad in order to endeavor to get again it bewildered ourselves so thoroughly that we had not the remotest idea in what direction it was to be sought. In this dilemma I desired my attendant to ride up to a farm-house I saw at the end of a valley we were then traversing, and inquire the way to the frontier line. The man rode off, was absent a considerable time, and at length returned with a curious smirk on his countenance.

"I've made a strange discovery up there, Colonel," he said. "As the only acquaintance of your honor owns that farm-house, and its people and barcolons, to tell me."

"Indeed, Szeldy?" I replied. "Which? Who? Is his name?"

"Szeldy!—what's your name?" answered Oscar. "Szeldy!—what's your name? Szeldy!—what's your name?" I exclaimed. "Are you sure you are not mistaken?"

"Positive, Colonel," returned Oscar; "and he made me say that if you would only please to favor him with a visit he should consider it the greatest honor that could happen to him. But here he comes."

He pointed to the farm-house, and as he spoke a stout, well-dressed farmer, mounted upon a fine bay, rode toward us. Oscar was right—it really was Szeldy. The ex-dragoon saluted me respectfully, and invited me very cordially to rest a few hours at his farm, promising, for mine no longer offer, want to the frontier inn of which I was in search. When we arrived at the farm-house, a comely matron, in whom I had little difficulty in recognizing Carlin, came to meet us, with an infant in her arms, and two other children clinging to their mother's dress. Michael presented me to his wife and children, and conducted me into his house.

After an excellent dinner, succeeded by some capital wine and cigars, the farmer began to tell me by what means he and Carlin had succeeded in making their escape from the town of Szentes. I assured him that he might confide in me without fear. Although an Austrian army occupied the country, he was now loosened the province of the Turkish flag, and I should not demand his extradition.

"I am sure of that, Colonel," returned Michael. "I didn't serve three years among the Lichtensteiners without learning the difference between an officer and a gentleman, and a scoundrel who betrays poor wretches for the price of blood. If I had not felt sure of that, I should have never have made myself known to Oscar there, whom I recognized at an old comrade the moment he rode up.

"You ask how Carlin and I made our escape, Well, the fact is, we never made any escape at all, but were in the stable, or rather under it, all the time you were in the town. Our story may well look surprised; but this is how it came about. In many of the houses in Hungarian towns—particularly those of the richer class—built at considerable date—there is generally some secret place large enough to be used for the concealment of property. In my father's house at Szentes, this was a cellar situated beneath the stable, filled with piles of brushwood and lumber, and communicating with the loose wall by a trap-door, artfully let into the floor behind one of the partitions. The thing was so very well arranged that you might have walked over without finding it even if you had known of its existence, but to us it was invaluable, and this must have followed our unexpected disappearance, it was almost certain to elude discovery.

"My mother told me about this place when she visited me in the stable, but our great difficulty was to find an opportunity of raising the trap unseen from intrusion, and to restore it after leaving to its old position. For this purpose the priest, on his way to the cell, had the little pile of logs introducing Carlin, and then after a bit coming back to see if our interview was finished. As his record visit he replaced the trap behind the partition, swept the earth and litter back over the spot, and made the best of his way out of the stable with my mother and sister.

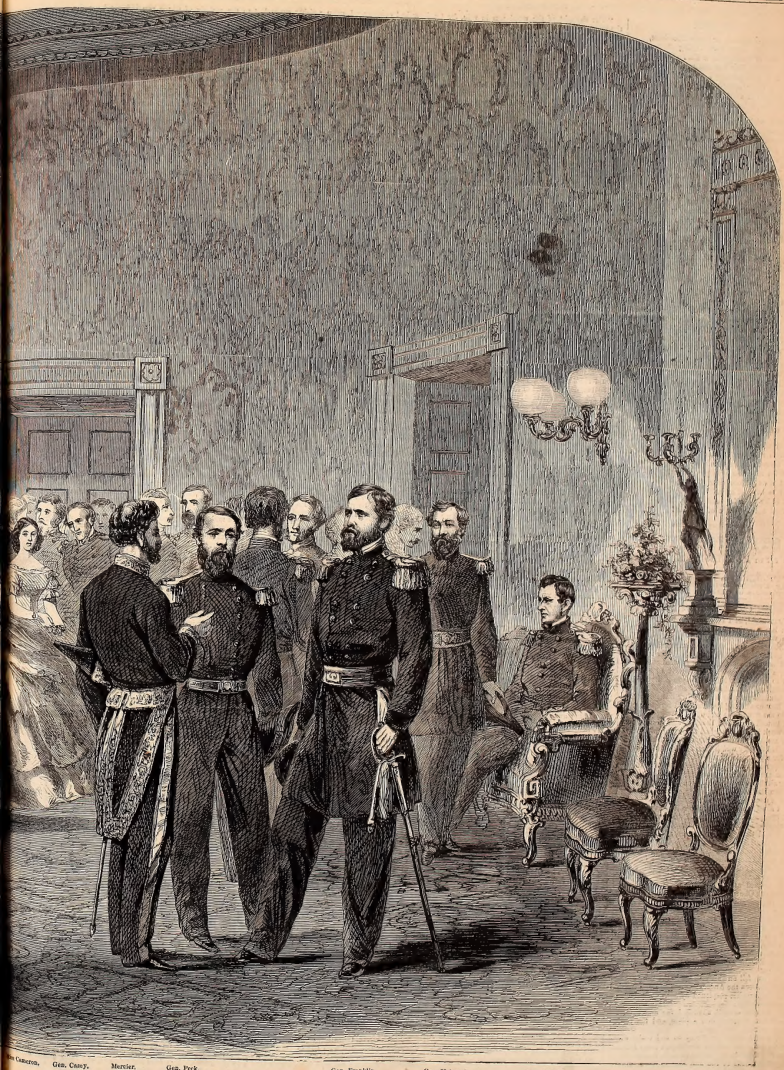
"Carlin and I waited below until the troops had quitted Szentes, and did not venture to leave our concealment until we found the town in Gorgey's possession. We agreed that Debrecen, Carlin's home, was no place for me. My mother collected her property, and we came over to Moldavia, where I purchased this farm and married Carlin. We live here happily and in comfort, and are very prosperous; and now that the Providence will, to pass the remainder of our days."

I repeated my assurance to Michael that I should do nothing to disturb his happiness, and continued over to be careful not to let fall any hints among the comrades. My caution was quite superfluous, as I judged from Oscar's significant grin in reply that Michael had already adopted means to secure his silence. Still he expressed his gratitude secrecy, and he will be the more likely to keep his promise, as we left the farm next day, and he has not passed under the sceptre of the Sultan, having married Michael's sister, and settled as a horse-breeder near his brother-in-law, among the Moldavian hills.

THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

We devote page 52 to illustrations of the GREAT MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

Our first illustration represents the fleet of IRON-CLAD GUN-BOATS with which Commodore Foote is to attack the rebel fortifications at Columbus and other points on the Mississippi. They will probably be simultaneously on the land side. It will be noticed that they are most formidable craft, and that they are armed with the work set before them. By the time these lines are read, it is possible that they may have begun operations.



The other cut represents FORT HOLT, KENTUCKY, opposite Cairo, which is to be the starting-point of the land portion of the expedition. On another page we give a sketch of the interior of the BARRACKS at FORT HOLT.

All these pictures are from designs by our attentive and faithful correspondent, Mr. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.

GRAND RECEPTION AT THE WHITE HOU

UARY, 1862.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. WAUD.]

LEECHES.

'Tis strange indeed, in times like these,
How many show their feeling
And love of country in a kind
Of "gnashy o'er me stealing!"
One man goes prating long and loud
About our "bleeding nation;"
But while the soldiers gape around
He robs them of a ration!

Another, with long face he asks
A blessing on our graves;
He wants a chance to try his hand
In contracting for horses!
"He's loyal to the Stars and Stripes,
He would, he says, be blessing
As long's his contract lasts he says,
"Oh! Ale, just lay the tax on!"

Another's oldest brother went To school with Mrs. Lincoln's;
To show his love for country he
Would furnish it with tin cans!
Held like to cop old Uncle Sam,
And let that sole of blessing
And all the while he prates about
"This damnable seceding!"

Another wants a soldier's birth,
"To fight in that 'ar battle;"
And so he'd like to do his share
By furnishing the rabbit!
"He loves his country old country's flag,
And Yankee Doodle Dandy;"
And so he shows his love for them
By selling poisoned brandy!

Go where you choose, look where you will,
You'll find these mean leeches!
In church, in Congress, on the stump,
A making Union speeches.
Round lucrative fine places they nestle
They drink their whisky-toddy;
While shiver, shiver in the camps
The men they clothed in shoddy!

Away with all such men as these,
Who rob our flag's defenders!
To Warren and to Lafayette
With all such leeches plunderers!
And if at all our dear old flag
Is to be rent asunder,
Let it be done by rebel hands,
And not by those of plunder!

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

THAT night, as I was employed in collecting such books and manuscripts as I proposed to take with me, including my chemical and physiological work, and such standard authorities as I might want to consult or refer to in the perilous yet unexplored, my servant entered to inform me, in answer to the inquiries I had sent him to make, that Miss Bertram had peacefully breathed her last an hour before. Well! my pardon had perhaps soothed her last moments; but how unavailing her dreadful repentance left minds the wrong she had done!

I turned from the memorial, and glancing at the work into which I had thrown all my learning, methodized into system with all my art, I recalled the pity which Mrs. Ashleigh had expressed for my meditated waste of mind. The tone of superiority which this sentiment of commonsense accompanied by uncommon will assumed over all that was too deep or too high for her comprehension, had sometimes nettled me; thinking over it now, it pleased. I said to myself, "After all, I shall bear with me such solace as intellectual occupation can afford. I shall have leisure to complete this labor, and a record that I have lived and thought may still exist all the longer which worldly ambition may bestow upon an Ashleigh Summer!" And, as I so murmured, my hand, mechanically moving, had nearly sealed, fell on the Bible that Julius Faber had given to me.

It opened at the Second Book of Esdras, which our Church places among the Apocrypha, and is generally considered by readers to have been written in the first or second century of the Christian era. But in which the questions raised by man in the remotest ages, to which we can trace back his desire "to comprehend the way of God," and to learn the reasons of a grandeur of thought and sublimity of word to which I know of no parallel in writers we call profane.

My eye fell on this passage in the lofty argument between the Angel, whose name is Uriel, and the Prophet perplexed by his own cravings for knowledge:

"He (the Angel) answered me and said, went into a forest, into a plain, and the trees took counsel and

"And said, Come, let us go and make war against the sea, that it may depart away before us, and that we may make us more woods.

"The floods of the sea, also in like manner took counsel, and said, Come, let us go up and subdue the woods of the plain, that there also we may make us another country.

"The thought of the floods of the sea came likewise to naught, for the sand stood up and stopped them.

"If thou wert judge now betwixt these two, whom wouldst thou begin to justify, or whom wouldst thou condemn?

"I answered and said, Verily it is a foolish thought that they both have held, for the ground is given unto the wood, and the sea also hath his place to bear his floods.

"Then answered he me and said, Thou hast given a right judgment; but why judgest thou not thyself also? For like as the ground is given unto the wood, and the sea to his floods, even so they that dwell upon the earth may understand nothing but things that are above the height of the heavens?

I paused at those words, and, closing the Sacred Volume, fell into deep, unquiet thought.

CHAPTER LXIX.

I HAD hoped that the voyage would have had some beneficial effect upon Lilian; but no effect, good or bad, was visible, except, perhaps, a deeper silence, a quieter calm. She loved to sit on the deck when the nights were fair, and the stars mirrored on the deep. And there, too, she stood beside her, bending over the rail of the vessel, and gazing on the wake of light which the moon made amidst the darkness of the ocean to which no shore could be seen, I said to myself, "Perhaps it is as well that I should be meanwhile buried!" Would that I could believe as I did when a child! Then cruel exceptions, to which I brought no experience by making it worth his while to serve me with it! Who doubted me? Who, and two who had been for many years with Mrs. Ashleigh, had accompanied me, they reasoned fallibly, but seemed contented. So the clock-work of our mere household arrangements went on much the same as in the quiet home. And I was not subjected to the ordinary privations and discomforts that attend the life of most of the other emigrants. Alas! would she have heeded them if she had been?

The chance of scene wrought a decided change for the better in her health and spirits, but not such as implied a dawn of reviving reason. In her communications she was more lively overcast. Its usual aspect was gloid with a soft mysterious calm. The momentary sunrises of memory, that were partly borrowed from English poets, partly gliding away into what seemed spontaneous odes addressed to her own waning intelligible meaning but never melody nor rhyme. Strange that memory and imitation—the two faculties which are the mere servants of knowledge—should still be so active, and judgment—the after faculty, that combines the rest into purpose and method —be annulled.

Julius Faber I see continually, though his research in a new department. He is sanguine as to Lilian's ultimate recovery; and, to my amazement and to his own he has contrived, by some art which I can not attain, to establish between her and himself intelligible communion. She comprehends by touches and signs, even though the simplest, seem to her in unknown language; and he construes into sense her words, that to me are unmeaning babbles.

"I was right," he said to me one day, leaving her seated on the rude bench he had placed in the mother, and joining me where I lay—listless yet fretful—under the shadowless gum-trees, gazing on the sky, and thinking that I could see Heaven's own, but on the far mountain range, from which the arch of the horizon seemed to spring—"I was right," said the patient physician; "this is reason suspended, not reason lost. Your wife will recover."

"But what?"

"Give me your arm as I walk homeward, and I will tell you." And in conclusion to which I have come."

Arose, the old man leaned on me, and we went down the valley, along the craggy ridges of the winding creek. The woodland on the opposite bank was vocal with the chirp, and creak, and chatter of Australian birds—all mirthful, all songless, save that sweetest of warblers, which seems to have been composed expressly to the name of magpie, but whose note is sweeter than that of nightingale. Its full throat filled the warm air with a distinct ecstatic melody of joy that dominates all the discords—so ravishing the ear of the lonely bush, the ear scarcely hears the scream of the parrots.

CHAPTER LXXI.

"YOU may remember," said Julius Faber, "Sir Humphrey Davy's eloquent description of the effect produced on him by the inhalation of nitrous oxide. He states that he began to lose the perception of external things; trains of vivid and rapid images passed through his mind, and were connected with words in such a manner as to produce perceptions perfectly novel. I existed, he said, in a world of new sensations, and newly-modified ideas." When he recovered he was astonished at the words he had spoken; the universe is composed of impressions, ideas, pleasures, and pains."

"Now observe, that davy, a cultivator of positive science, endowed with one of the healthiest of human temperaments, by the inhalation of a gas, abstracted from all external life—enters into a new world, which consists of images he himself creates, or words which, in their novel combination, he receives the universe itself into thoughts."

"Well," said I, "but what inference do you draw from that voluntary experiment, applicable to the malady of which you bid me hope the cure?"

"Simply this: that the effect produced on a healthful brain by the nitrous oxide may be produced also by moral causes operating on the blood, or on the nerves. There is a degree of mental excitement in which the mind creates vivid sensations, and then the world is of external things gives way to the world within the brain. But this, though a suspension of that reason which comprehends accuracy of judgment, is no more a permanent derangement of the mind than was Sir Humphrey Davy's visionary ecstasies under the influence of the gas. The difference between the two states of suspense is that of time, and it is but an affair of time with our beloved patient. Yet prepare yourself. I fear that the mental will not recover without some critical malady of the body."

"Critical! but not dangerous?—say not dangerous. I can endure the pause of her reason; I could not endure the void in the universe if I let her cease to find from the grave."

"Poor friend! would not you yourself rather lose life than reason?"

"—yes? But we men are taught to set cheap value on our own lives; we do not estimate at the same value as women the lives of those we love. Did we do so, Humanity would lose its virtues."

"When then I, Love teaches, that there is something of nobler value than mere life? and surely it can not be the mere body. What is it, but that consciousness of being which your philosophy declines to acknowledge—viz., soul? If you fear so painfully that your Lilian should die, is it not from very fear to lose her soul?"

"Oh, cease, cease!" I cried, impatiently. "I can not now argue the metaphysics. I feel that I want you student of hearts to her life? Her wealth has been stronger ever since her affliction. She never seems to know objects by sight. Do you not perceive that her cheek has a more hardy bloom, her frame a more rounded symmetry, than when you saw her in England?"

"Unquestionably. Her physical forces have been silently accumulating through the dreams which half lull, half arouse her imagination. IMAGINATION, that faculty, the most glorious which is located on the human brain, because it is the faculty which enables thought to create, is of all others the most exhausting to life when unduly stimulated, and consequently arousing on its own creations. I think it probable that, had this sorrow not befallen you, you would have known a sorrow yet graver—you would have long survived your Lilian. As it is now, when she recovers, her whole physical health, and mental, will have undergone a beneficial change. Take it meanwhile as a truism, to see the malady of the body will precede the restoration of the mind; and it is my hope that the present suspension or aberration of the moral waking powers of the mind fit the body to endure and surmount the physical crisis. There is a hope, in my own experience, in many respects similar to this, but in other respects it was less hopeful. I was then in the full exuberance of the fullest physical conformation, of great mental energies, and consumed by an intense ambition. He was labouring for the infancy hours. He would not listen to me when I entreated him to rest his mind. I thought that he was certain to obtain the distinction for which he toiled, and equally certain to die a few months after obtaining it. And I should both my deductions. He was overworked himself that, on the day of examination, his nerves were agitated, his harmony of mind was in part passed, not with a certain credit, but fell far short of the rank among his fellow-competitors to which he aspired. Then, the physical mind sank low in the disappointed heart, and raised a new train of emotions. He was first visited by a species of insanity: then he sank into a state in which the external world seemed quite blotted out. He locked nothing that was said or done, and seemed to see nothing that was placed before his eyes; in a word, sensations became dormant, ideas were engendered within their place, and these ideas gave him pleasure. He believed that his genius was recognized, and he had images imposed constantly, arising an imaginary fame. So it went on for two years. During that period his frail form became robust and vigorous. At the end of that time he was seized with a fever, which would have swept him away in a few days had not the crisis been met in the first saw him. He conquered the fever, and, in recovering, acquired the full possession of the intellectual faculties through the medium of ideas. I first saw him, many years afterward, he was in perfect health, and the ideas of his youth were within him realized: the body had supported the mind—he had achieved distinction. Now what I ask you, is sorrow, laid this strong mind into a visionary sleep? The most agonizing of human emotions in a noble spirit—shame? What has an ancient writer said? Lilian? You have told me the story; shame!—the shame of a nature pre-eminently noble. Shame! Shame! In his case as in hers, the shock inflicted does not produce a succession of painful illusions; but, on the contrary, of ideas that are delightfully pleasing. Had the illusions been painful, the body would have suffered—but it suffered not. Why did a painful shock produce pleasing illusions? Because, no matter how a shock on the nervous system may operate, if it effects life, it does but make more vivid than impressions from actual external objects the ideas previously most cherished. Such ideas in the young student were ideas of earthly fame; such ideas in the young painter were ideas of angel comforters and heavenly Eidens. You miss her mind on the earth, and, while we speak, it is in paradise."

"Much that you say, my friend, is authorized by the speculations of great writers, with whom

* Such is the supposition of Julia. Dr. Lee, however, is of opinion that the entire manuscript, according to the deed, identical, with the author of the Book of Enoch.

† Creak is the name given by Australian colonists to precarious water-courses and tributary streams.

‡ See, on the theory elaborated from his principle, Dr. Hilbert's interesting and valuable work on the Philosophy of Apparitions.

I am not unfamiliar; but in none of those writers, nor in your encouraging words, do I find a solution for much that has no precedents in my experience—much, indeed, that has analogies in my reading, but analogies which I have ever before despised as old wives' fables. I have bared to your searching eye the weird mysteries of my life. How do you account for facts which you can not resolve into illusions? for the influence which that strange being, Margrave, exercised over Lilian's mind or fancy, so that for a time her love for me was as dormant as is her reason now: so that he could draw her—her whose nature you admit to be singularly pure and modest—from her mother's home? The magic wand! the trance into which that wand threw Margrave himself; the apparition which it conjured up in my own quiet chamber, when my mind was without a care and my health without a flaw. How account for all this—as you endeavore , and perhaps successfully, to account for all my impressions of the Vision in the Museum, of the luminous haunting Shadow in its earlier apparitions, when my fancy was heated, my heart tormented, and, it might be, even the physical forces of this strong frame disordered?"

"Allen," said the old pathologist, "here we approach phenomena which few physicians have dared to examine. Honor to those who, like our bold contemporary, Elliotson, have braved scoff and sacrificed dross in seeking to extract what is practical in uses, what can be tested by experiment, from the speculations of Puységur and Mesmer."

"What! You believe—you! Julius Faber, you—in the doctrines of animal magnetism and electro-biology?"

"I have not examined into those doctrines, nor seen with my own eyes the wonders recorded, upon evidence too respectable, nevertheless, to permit me peremptorily to deny what I have not witnessed.* But wherever I look through the History of Mankind in all ages and all races, I find a concurrence in certain beliefs which seems to countenance the theory that there is in some peculiar and rare temperaments a power over forms of animated organization, with which they establish some unaccountable affinity; and even, though much more rarely, a power over inanimate matter. Whether this power be among the properties of that electric fluid with which all matter is more or less charged, or proceed from some other subtle fluid not yet more than dogmatically asserted or vaguely conjectured, I do not hazard an opinion. But from the power I name emanates the practice of what is popularly called witchcraft or magic. This practice is much more rife in savage states than civilized, as in all states it is more believed by the ignorant than the educated, and no doubt one reason of this is that the power is increased by the faith of him who exerts it, and the faith of those over whom it is exercised. In the native tribes of this land the elders are instructed in the arts of this so-called sorcery, but only in a very few constitutions does instruction avail to produce effects in which the savages recognize the powers of a sorcerer; it is so with the Obi of the negroes. The fascination of Obi is an unquestionable fact, but the Obi man can not be trained by formal lessons; he is born a fascinator, as a poet is born a poet. It is so with the Laplanders, of whom Tornæus reports that of those instructed in the magical art 'only a few are capable of it.' 'Some,' he says, 'are naturally magicians.' And this fact is emphatically insisted upon by the mystics of our own middle ages, who state that a man must be born a magician, in other words, that the gift is constitutional, though developed by practice and art. Now, that this gift and its practice should principally obtain in imperfect states of civilization, and fade into insignificance in the busy social enlightenment of cities, may be accounted for by reference to the known influences of imagination. In the cruder states of social life not only is imagination more frequently predominant over all other faculties, but it has not the healthful vents which the intellectual competition of cities and civilization affords. The man who in a savage tribe, or in the dark feudal ages, would be a magician, is in our century a poet, an orator, a daring speculator, an inventive philosopher. In other words, his imagination is drawn to pursuits congenial to those among whom it works. It is the tendency of all intellect to follow the directions of the public opinion amidst which it is trained. Where a magician is held in reverence or awe, there will be more practitioners of magic than where a magician is despised as an impostor or shut up as a lunatic. In Scandinavia, before the introduction of Christianity, all tradition records the wonderful powers of the Vala, or witch, who was then held in reverence and honor. Christianity was introduced, and the early Church denounced the Vala as the instrument of Satan, and from that moment down dropped the majestic prophetess into a miserable and execrated old hag!"

"The ideas you broach," said I, musingly, "have at moments crossed me, though I have shrunk from reducing them to a theory which is but one of pure hypothesis. But this magic, after all, then, you would place in the imagination of the operator, acting on the imagination of those whom it affects. Here, at least, I can follow you, to a certain extent, for here we get back into the legitimate realm of physiology."

"And possibly," said Faber, "we may find hints to guide us to useful examination, if not to complete solution, of problems that, once demonstrated, may lead to discoveries of infinite value—hints, I say, in two writers of widely opposite genius—Van Helmont and Bacon. Van Helmont, of all the medieval mystics, is the most severely intellectual. He supposed that the faculty which he calls Phantasy, and which we familiarly call Imagination, is invested with the power of creating for itself ideas independent of the senses, each idea clothed in a form fabricated by the imagination, and becoming an operative entity. This notion is so far favored by modern physiologists, that Lincke reports a case where the eye itself was extirpated; yet the extirpation was followed by the appearance of luminous figures before the orbit. And again, a woman, stone blind, complained 'of luminous images, with pale colors, before her eyes. Abercrombie mentions the case 'of a lady quite blind, her eyes being also disorganized and sunk, who never walked out without seeing a little old woman in a red cloak who seemed to walk before her.'* Your favorite authority, the illustrious Müller, who was himself in the habit of 'seeing different images in the field of vision when he lay quietly down to sleep, asserts that these images are not merely presented to the fancy, but that even the images of dreams are really seen,' and that 'any one may satisfy himself of this by accustoming himself regularly to open his eyes when waking after a dream, the images seen in the dream are then sometimes visible, and can be observed to disappear gradually.' He confirms this statement, not only by the result of his own experience, but by the observations made by Spinoza, and the yet higher authority of Aristotle, who accounts for spectral appearance as the internal action of the sense of vision.† And this opinion is favored by Sir David Brewster, whose experience leads him to suggest 'that the objects of mental contemplation may be seen as distinctly as external objects, and will occupy the same local position in the axis of vision as if they had been formed by the agency of light.'‡ Be this as it may, one fact remains, that images can be seen even by the blind as distinctly and as vividly as you and I now see the stream below our feet and the opossums at play upon yonder boughs. Let us come now to some remarkable suggestions of Lord Bacon. In his Natural History, treating of the force of the imagination, and the help it receives 'by one man working by another,' he cites an instance he had witnessed of a kind of juggler, who could tell a person what card he thought of. He mentioned this 'to a pretended learned man, curious in such things,' and this sage said to him, 'It is not the knowledge of the man's thought, for that is proper to God, but the enforcing of a thought upon him, and binding his imagination by a stronger, so that he could think of no other card.' You see this sage anticipated our modern electro-biologists! And the learned man then shrewdly asked Lord Bacon, 'Did the juggler tell the card to the man himself who had thought of it, or bid another tell it?' 'He bade another tell it,' answered Lord Bacon. 'I thought so,' returned his learned acquaintance, 'for the juggler himself could not have put on so strong an imagination; but by telling the card to the other, who believed the juggler was some strange man who could do strange things—that other man caught a strong imagination.' The whole story is worth reading, because Lord Bacon evidently thinks it conveys a guess worth examining. And Lord Bacon, were he now living, would be the man to solve the mysteries that branch out of mesmerism or (so called) spiritual manifestation, for he would not pretend to despise their phenomena for fear of hurting his reputation for good sense. Bacon then goes on to state that there are three ways to fortify the imagination. 'First, authority derived from belief in an art and in the man who exercises it; secondly, means to quicken and corroborate the imagination; thirdly, means to repeat and refresh it.' For the second and the third he refers to the practices of magic; and proceeds afterward to state on what things imagination has most force; 'upon things that have the lightest and easiest motions, and, therefore, above all, upon the spirits of men, and, in them, on such affections as move lightest—in love, in fear, in irresolution. And,' adds Bacon, earnestly, in a very different spirit from that which dictates to the sages of our time the philosophy of rejecting without trial that which belongs to the Marvelous, 'and whatsoever is of this kind should be thoroughly inquired into.' And this great founder or renovator of the sober inductive system of investigation, even so far leaves it a matter of speculative inquiry whether imagination may not be so powerful that it can actually operate upon a plant, that he says, 'This likewise should be made upon plants, and that diligently, as if you should tell a man that such a tree would die this year, and will him, at these and these times, to go unto it and see how it thriveth.' I presume that no philosopher has followed such recommendations; had some great philosopher done so, possibly we should by this time know all the secrets of what is popularly called witchcraft."

And as Faber here paused there came a strange laugh from the fantastic she oak-tree overhanging the stream—a wild, impish laugh.

"Pooh! it is but the great kingfisher, the laughing bird of the Australian bush," said Julius Faber, amused at my start of superstitious alarm.

We walked on for some minutes in musing silence, and the rude log-hut in which my wise companion had his home came in view; the flocks grazing on undulous pastures, the kine drinking at a water-course fringed by the slender gum-trees; and a few fields, laboriously won from the luxuriant grass-land, rippling with the wave of corn.

I halted, and said, "Rest here for a few moments till I gather up the conclusions to which your speculative reasoning seems to invite me."

We sat down on a rocky crag, half mantled by luxuriant creepers with vermilion buds.

"From the guesses," said I, "which you have drawn from the fancies of those who first greeted the dawn of philosophy emerging from the mists of fable, I collect this solution of the mysteries, by which the experience I gain from my senses confounds all the dogmas approved by my judgment. To the rational conjectures by which, when we first conversed on the marvels that perplexed me, you ascribed to my imagination, predisposed by mental excitement, physical fatigue, or derangement, and a concurrence of singular events tending to strengthen such predisposition—the phantasmal impressions produced on my senses; to these conjectures you now add a new one, more startling and less admitted by sober physiologists. You conceive it possible that persons endowed with a rare and peculiar temperament can so operate on the imagination, and, through the imagination, on the senses of others, as to exceed even the powers ascribed to the practitioners of mesmerism and electro-biology, and give a certain foundation of truth to the old tales of magic and witchcraft. You imply that Margrave may be a person thus gifted, and hence the influence he unquestionably exercised over Lilian, and over, perhaps, less innocent agents, charmed or impelled by his will. And not discarding, as I own I should have been originally induced to do, the queries or suggestions adventured by Bacon in his discursive speculations on Nature—to wit, 'that there be many things, some of them inanimate, that operate upon the spirits of men by secret sympathy and antipathy,' and to which Bacon gave the quaint name of 'imaginants,' so even that wand, of which I have described to you the magic-like effects, may have had properties communicated to it by which it performs the work of the magician, as mesmerists pretend that some substance mesmerized by them can act on the patient as sensibly as if it were the mesmerizer himself. Do I state your suppositions correctly?"

"Yes; always remembering that they are only suppositions, and volunteered with the utmost diffidence. But since, thus seated in the early wilderness, we permit ourselves the indulgence of child-like guess, may it not be possible, apart from the doubtful question whether a man can communicate to an inanimate material substance a power to act upon the mind or imagination of another man—may it not, I say, be possible that such a substance may contain in itself such a power over certain constitutions, though not over others. For instance, it is in my experience that the common hazel-wood will strongly affect certain nervous temperaments, though wholly without effect on others. I remember a young girl who, having taken up a hazel stick, freshly cut, could not relax her hold of it, and when it was wrenched away from her by force was irresistibly attracted toward it, repossessed herself of it, and, after holding it a few minutes, was cast into a kind of trance, in which she beheld phantasmal visions. Mentioning this curious case, which I supposed unique, to a learned brother of our profession, he told me that he had known other instances of the effect of the hazel upon nervous temperaments in persons of both sexes. Possibly it was some such peculiar property in the hazel that made it the wood selected for the old divining-rod. Well, we do not know what this wand that produced a seemingly magical effect upon you was really composed of. You did not notice the metal employed in the wire which you say communicated a thrill to the sensitive nerves in the palm of the hand. You can not tell how far it might have been the vehicle of some fluid force in nature. The wand itself is steel, or iron; it is tipped with crystal. Possibly iron and crystal do really contain some properties not hitherto scientifically analyzed, and only, indeed, potential over exceptional temperaments, which may account for the fact that iron and crystal have been favorites with all professed mystics, ancient and modern. The Delphic Pythoness had her iron tripod, Mesmer his iron bed; and many persons, indisputably honest, can not gaze long upon a ball of crystal but what they begin to see visions. I suspect that a philosophical cause for such seemingly preternatural effects of crystal and iron will be found in connection with the extreme impressionability to changes in temperature which is the characteristic both of crystal and iron. But if these materials do contain certain powers over exceptional constitutions, we do not arrive at a supernatural, but at a natural phenomenon."

"Still," said I, "even granting that your explanatory hypotheses hit or approach the truth—still, what a terrible power you would assign to man's will over men's reason and deeds!"

"Man's will," answered Faber, "has over men's deeds and reason, habitual and daily, power infinitely greater, and, when uncounterbalanced, infinitely more dangerous than that which superstition exaggerates in magic. Man's will moves a war that decimates a race, and leaves behind it calamities little less dire than slaughter. Man's will frames, but it also corrupts laws; exalts, but also demoralizes opinion; sets the world mad with fanaticism as often as it curbs the heart's fierce instincts by the wisdom of brother-like mercy. You revolt at the exceptional, limited sway over some two or three individuals which the arts of a sorcerer (if sorcerer there be) can effect; and yet, at the very moment in which you were perplexed and appalled by such sway, or by your reluctant belief in it, your will was devising an engine to unsettle the reason and wither the hopes of millions!"

"My will! What engine?"

"A book conceived by your intellect, adorned by your learning, and directed by your will to steal from the minds of other men their persuasion of the soul's everlasting Hereafter."

I bowed my head, and felt myself grow pale.

"And if we accept Bacon's theory of 'secret sympathy,' or the plainer physiological maxim that there must be in the imaginat[illegible], morbidly impressed by the will of another, some trains of idea in affinity with such influence and preinclined to receive it, no magician could warp you to evil, except through thoughts that themselves went astray. Grant that the Margrave who still haunts your mind did really, by some occult, sinister magnetism, guide the madman to murder—did influence the servant-woman's vulgar desire to pry into the secrets of her ill-fated master—or the old maid's covetous wish and envious malignity—what could this awful magician do more than any commonplace guilty adviser to a mind predisposed to accept the advice?"

"You forget one example which destroys your argument—the spell which this mysterious fascinator could cast upon a creature so pure from all guilt as Lilian!"

"Will you forgive me if I answer frankly?"

"Speak."

"Your Lilian is spotless and pure as you deem her, and the fascination, therefore, attempts no lure through a sinful desire; it blends with its attraction no sentiment of affection untrue to yourself. Nay, it is justice to your Lilian, and may be a melancholy comfort to you, to state my conviction, based on the answers my questions have drawn from her, that you were never more cherished by her love than when that love seemed to forsake you. Her imagination impressed her with the illusion that through your love for her you were threatened with a great peril. What seemed the levity of her desertion was the devotion of self-sacrifice. And, in her strange, dream-led wanderings, do not think that she was conscious of the fascination you impute to this mysterious Margrave; in her belief, it was your own guardian angel that guided her steps, and her pilgrimage was ordained to disarm the foe that menaced you, and dissolve the spell that divided her life from yours! But had she not long before this willfully prepared herself to be so deceived? Had not her fancies been deliberately encouraged to dwell aloft from the duties we are placed on the earth to perform? The loftiest faculties in our nature are those that demand the finest poise, not to fall from their height and crush all the walls that they crown. With exquisite beauty of illustration, Hume says of the dreamers of 'bright fancies,' 'that they may be compared to those angels whom the Scriptures represent as covering their eyes with their wings.' Had you been, like my nephew, a wrestler for bread with the wilderness, what helpmate would your Lilian have been to you? How often would you have cried out in justifiable anger, 'I, son of Adam, am on earth not in paradise. Oh that my Eve were at home on my hearth, and not in the skies with the seraphs!' No Margrave, I venture to say, could have suspended the healthful affections, or charmed into danger the wide-awake soul of my Amy. When she rocks in its cradle the babe the young parents intrust to her heed—when she calls the kine to the milking, the chicks to their corn—when she but flits through my room to renew the flowers on the stand, or range in neat order the books that I read—no spell on her fancy could lead her a step from the range of her provident cares! At day she is contented to be on the commonplace earth; at evening, she and I

* What Faber here says is expressed with more authority by one of the most accomplished metaphysicians of our time (Sir. W. Hamilton):

"Somnambulism is a phenomenon still more astonishing (than dreaming). In this singular state a person performs a regular series of rational actions, and those frequently of the most difficult and delicate nature; and, what is still more marvelous, with a talent to which he could make no pretension when awake. (Cr. Ancillon, Essais Philos. ii. 161.) His memory and reminiscence supply him with recollections of words and things which, perhaps, never were at his disposal in the ordinary state—he speaks more fluently a more refined language. And if we are to credit what the evidence on which it rests hardly allows us to disbelieve, he has not only perception of things through other channels than the common organs of sense, but the sphere of his cognition is amplified to an extent far beyond the limits to which sensible perception is confined. This subject is one of the most perplexing in the whole compass of philosophy; for, on the one hand, the phenomena are so remarkable that they can not be believed, and yet, on the other, they are of so unambiguous and palpable a character, and the witnesses to their reality are so numerous, so intelligent, and so high above every suspicion of deceit, that it is equally impossible to deny credit to what is attested by such ample and unexceptionable evidence." —Sir W. Hamilton's Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic, vol. ii., p. 274.

This perplexity, in which the distinguished philosopher leaves the judgment so equally balanced that it finds it impossible to believe, and yet impossible to disbelieve, forms the right state of mind in which a candid thinker should come to the examination of those more extraordinary phenomena which he has not himself yet witnessed, but the fair inquiry into which may be tendered to him by persons above the imputation of quackery and fraud. Müller, who is not the least determined, as he is certainly one of the most distinguished disbelievers of mesmeric phenomena, does not appear to have witnessed, or at least to have carefully examined them, or he would, perhaps, have seen that even the more extraordinary of those phenomena confirm, rather than contradict, his own general theories, and may be explained by the sympathies one sense has with another—"the laws of reflection through the medium of the brain." (Physiology of Senses, p. 1311.) And again by the maxim "that the mental principle, or cause of the mental phenomena, can not be confined to the brain, but that it exists in a latent state in every part of the organism." (Ib., p. 1355.) The "nerve power," contended for by Mr. Bain, also, may suggest a rational solution of much that has seemed incredible to those physiologists who have not condescended to sift the genuine phenomena of mesmerism from the exaggeration and imposture which too frequently obscure and degrade them.

* She had no illusions when within doors.—Abercrombie on the Intellectual Powers, p. 277. (15th edition.)

‡ Perhaps it is for the reason suggested in the text, viz., that the magician requires the interposition of a third imagination between his own and that of the consulting believer, that any learned adept in (so called) magic will invariably refuse to exhibit without the presence of a third person. Hence the author of Dogme et Rituel de la Haute Magie, printed at Paris, 1852-'53—a book not unremarkable for the learning wasted on such a subject, but still more remarkable for the earnest belief of a scholar of our own day in the art of which he records the history—insists much on the necessity of rigidly observing Le Ternaire, in the number of persons who are credulous enough to assist in an enchanter's experiments.

EXECUTION OF PRIVATE LANAHAN, OF THE REGULAR ARMY, FOR MURDER, AT WASHINGTON.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 62.]

FORTRESS MONROE AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.

We publish on page 53 a Bird-eye View of Fortress Monroe and Vicinity, with the vessels composing the Burnside Expedition; also, on page 54, a Map showing Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds, and the approaches to Norfolk from the south. It is well understood that the Burnside Expedition, after having cleared the rebels out of Pamlico, Albemarle, and Currituck Sounds, will pay some attention to Norfolk. The Tribune correspondent says:

I presume I shall violate no confidence if I state, on common rumor and belief, that the expedition will rendezvous at Hatteras Inlet, and that Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds will be the immediate field of operations. Of these operations in detail it is not proper to speak, any further than that it is understood that the force, when fairly afloat on the waters of Pamlico Sound, will address itself to Roanoke Island, which is strongly fortified. This is the key to Albemarle Sound, through Currituck, and it is supposed that the position is defended by from 2000 to 3000 rebels. This taken, one of the forts following the taking of Hatteras four or five months ago, when 1000 men might have done the same thing, will have been retrieved. I presume the clearing out of the rebels from all the sounds will follow, which might have been done with a thousand men and two or three gun-boats at the time referred to. It must not be supposed that this is the whole work laid out for the expedition. It will be but clearing away the underbrush, and it will be time enough to record the rest when it takes place.

We read in the Norfolk Day-Book of the 9th:

Information received this city last evening to the effect that a Union fleet had made its appearance in Pamlico Sound. The fleet consists of twenty gun-boats, drawing from five to six feet of water, and carrying some of them, five guns. They were first discovered by Captain Hunter, who, while reconnoitering, was shot at by them. On his return to the island he reported the fact, and our force proceeded at once to place themselves in a state of readiness for an attack.

This is supposed to be a portion of the Burnside expedition, and it is thought by some that its object is to prepare for an attack upon Norfolk from the rear. However this may be, one thing is certain, and that is, that, should this be their programme, they will find it a hard road to travel before they get to the end of it. We trust that our friends will give them a warm reception, and determine to concentrically resist the foe, and that when he shows battle they will keep themselves cool and their powder dry, and by their valor cause another "masterly retreat" upon the part of the Hessians.

knock together at the one door of heaven, which opes to thanksgiving and prayer, and thanksgiving and prayer sends us back, calm and hopeful, to the tasks that each morrow renews."

I looked up as the old man paused, and in the limpid clearness of the Australian atmosphere I saw the child he thus praised standing by the garden-gate, looking toward us, and, though still distant, she seemed near. I felt wroth with her. My heart so cherished my harmless, defenseless Lilian, that I was jealous of the praise taken from her to be bestowed on another.

"Each of us," said I, coldly, "has his or her own nature, and the uses harmonious to that nature's idiosyncrasy. The world, I grant, would get on very ill if women were not, more or less, actively useful and quietly good, like your Amy. But the world would lose standards that exalt and refine if no woman were permitted to gain, through the indulgence of fancy, thoughts exquisite as those which my Lilian conceived, while thought, alas, flowed out of fancy. I do not wound you by citing your Amy as a type of the mediocre. I do not claim for Lilian the rank we accord to the type of genius. But both are alike to such types in this: viz., that the uses of mediocrity are for everyday life, and the uses of genius, amidst a thousand mistakes which mediocrity never commits, are to suggest and perpetuate ideas which raise the standard of the mediocre to a nobler level. There would be fewer Amys in life if there were no Lilian, as there would be far fewer good men of sense if there were no erring dreamer of genius!"

"You say well, Allen Fenwick. And who should be so indulgent to the vagaries of the imagination as the philosophers who taught your youth to doubt every thing in the Maker's plan of creation which could not be mathematically proved. 'The human mind,' said Luther, 'is like a drunkard on horseback; prop it on one side, and it falls on the other.' So the man who is much too enlightened to believe in a peasant's religion, is always sure to set up some inane superstition of his own. Open biographical volumes wherever you please, and the man who has no faith in religion, is a man who has faith in a nightmare. See that type of the elegant skeptics—Lord Herbert, of Cherbury. He is writing a book against Revelation; he asks a sign from heaven to tell him if his book is approved by his Maker, and the man who can not believe in the miracles performed by his Saviour, gravely tells us of a miracle vouchsafed to himself. Take the hardest and strongest intellect which the hardest and strongest race of mankind ever schooled and accomplished. See the greatest of great men, the great Julius Cæsar! Publicly he asserts in the Senate that the immortality of the soul is a vain chimera. He professes the creed which Roman voluptuaries deduced from Epicurus, and denies all divine interference in the affairs of the earth. A great authority for the materialists—they have none greater! They can show on their side no intellect equal to Cæsar's; and yet this magnificent free-thinker, rejecting a soul and a Deity, habitually entered his chariot in muttering a charm; crawled on his knees up the steps of a temple to propitiate the abstraction called 'Nemesis;' and did not cross the Rubicon till he had consulted the omens. What does all this prove? A very simple truth. Man has some instincts with the brutes; for instance, hunger and sexual love. Man has one instinct peculiar to himself, found universally (or with alleged exceptions in savage states so rare that they do not affect the general law*)—an instinct of an invisible power without this earth, and of a life beyond the grave, which that power vouchsafes to his spirit. But the best of us can not violate an instinct with impunity. Resist hunger as long as you can, and, rather than die of starvation, your instinct will make you a cannibal; resist love when youth and nature impel to it, and what pathologist does not track one broad path into madness or crime? So with the noblest instinct of all. Reject the internal conviction by which the grandest thinkers have sanctioned the hope of the humblest Christian, and you are servile at once to some faith inconceivably more hard to believe. The imagination will not be withheld from its yearning for vistas beyond the walls of the flesh and the span of the present hour. Philosophy itself, in rejecting the healthful creeds by which man finds his safeguards in sober prayer, and his guide through the wilderness of visionary doubt, invents systems compared to which the mysteries of theology are simple. Suppose any man of strong, plain understanding had never heard of a Deity like Him whom we Christians adore, then ask this man which he can the better comprehend in his mind, and accept as a natural faith, the simple Christianity of his shepherd or the pantheism of Spinoza? Place before an accomplished critic (who comes with a perfectly unprejudiced mind to either inquiry), first, the arguments of David Hume against the Gospel miracles, and then the metaphysical crotchets of David Hume himself. This subtle philosopher, not content, with Berkeley, to get rid of matter—not content, with Condillac, to get rid of spirit or mind—proceeds to a miracle greater than any his Maker has yet vouchsafed to reveal. He, being then alive and in the act of writing, gets rid of himself altogether. Nay, he confesses he can not reason with any one who is stupid enough to think he has a self. His words are: 'What we call a mind is nothing but a heap or collection of different perceptions or objects united together by certain relations, and supposed, though falsely, to be endowed with perfect simplicity and identity. If any one upon serious and candid reflection thinks he has a different notion of himself, I must confess I can reason with him no longer.' Certainly I would rather believe all the ghost-stories upon record than believe that I am not even a ghost, distinct and apart from the perceptions conveyed to me, no matter how—just as I am distinct and apart from the furniture in my room, no matter whether I found it there or whether I bought it. If some old cosmogonist asked you to believe that the primitive cause of the solar system was not to be traced to a Divine Intelligence, but to a nebulosity, originally so diffuse that its existence can with difficulty be conceived, and that the origin of the present system of organized beings equally dispensed with the agency of a creative mind, and could be referred to molecules formed in the water by the power of attraction, till, by modifications of cellular tissue in the gradual lapse of ages, one monad became an oyster and another a Man—would you not say this cosmogony could scarcely have misled the human understanding even in the earliest dawn of speculative inquiry? Yet such are the hypotheses to which the desire to philosophize away that simple proposition of a Divine First Cause, which every child can comprehend, led two of the greatest geniuses and profoundest reasoners of modern times, La Place and La Marck.* Certainly, the more you examine those arch phantasmagorists, the philosophers, who would leave nothing in the universe but their own delusions, the more your intellectual pride may be humbled. The wildest phenomena which have startled you, are not more extravagant than the grave explanations which intellectual presumption adventures on the elements of our own organism and the relations between the world of matter and the world of ideas."

Here our conversation stopped, for Amy had now joined us, and, looking up to reply, I saw the child's innocent face between me and the furrowed brow of the old man.

* It seems extremely doubtful whether the very few instances in which it has been asserted that a savage race had been found without recognition of a Deity and a future state would bear searching examination. It is set forth, for example, in most of the popular works on Australia, that the Australian savages have no notion of a Deity or a Hereafter, that they only worship a devil, or evil spirit. This assumption, though made more peremptorily, and by a greater number of writers than any similar one regarding other savages, is altogether erroneous, and has no other foundation than the ignorance of the writers. The Australian savages recognize a Deity, but He is too august for a name in their own language; in English they call Him The Great Master—an expression synonymous with "The Great Lord." They believe in a hereafter of eternal joy, and place it among the stars.—See Strzelecki's Physical Description of New South Wales.

* See the observations on La Place and La Marck in the Introduction to Kirby's Bridgewater Treatise.

BOWLING GREEN AND THE VICINITY.

On page 61 we publish a birds-eye view of that part of Kentucky now occupied by our own and the rebel forces, showing the course of the Green River, Mumfordsville, Bowling Green, etc. A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce writes as follows regarding this region of country:

The Federal forces advancing on Bowling Green are now detained at Green River for repairs of the railroad bridge. This bridge was an iron one, and said to have been destroyed two or three months ago, contrary to the instructions of General Buckner at the time. It is over 200 feet span. The whole country west of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, for 50 or 60 miles to the Ohio River, is rough, hilly, and broken, and literally without any thing that would be entitled to the name of roads, and but sparsely inhabited. The distance from Green River to Bowling Green is 41 miles. There are no villages on the route of the turnpike or railroad. The largest place is at Preut's Knob, with some dozen houses. There is a high range of hills on the west of the road, extending from near Green River almost to Bowling Green. At several points these hills would command the railroad and turnpike. Preut's Knob is a point of great strength. The roads passing between the hills and knobs, which are here some 200 feet high, and, except the open country to the east, that would render it possible to turn the flank of an army posted within the pass of these hills, I should consider this the strongest natural position on the line of road between Louisville and Nashville. This is some twelve miles from Green River, and if the rebels make a stand this side of Bowling Green it will doubtless be here.

Glasgow Junction (Bells, the old point for stage to Mammoth Cave) is also another strong point, and may be defended by Buckner's army. The turnpike from Green River to this point is but a common dirt road, and in winter very bad; but from this point to Bowling Green is a fine Macadamized road, and our forces will not likely meet with any obstruction for the 23 miles to Bowling Green.

The greatest strength of Bowling Green for defense is in the great difficulty our troops will have to turn either flank of the enemy, which probably can not be done without great labor and preparation. Either above or below the country is rough and rugged; there are no roads running parallel with the railroad.

The country between Green River and Bowling Green is very peculiar in its formation, being cavernous. There is not a stream of water on the whole route, and, save a few small springs, there is no water that is not artificially obtained. The whole of this country may be compared to bowls with a hole in the bottom, of all sizes from a few rods in extent to 50 or 100 acres. These holes or sinks carry off the surplus water after rains into the caves or underground streams. By the natural supply of water 500 horsemen could not have found the means of subsisting themselves and horses in a body between Green and Barren rivers, within several miles of the railroad. But the country is now a fine farming one, and abundance of water is obtained by cisterns, and by stopping the holes in the sinks, forming little ponds from the surface drainage, every farmer having one or more of these ponds. Should the rebels choose to do so, and they wish to annoy our forces, they could open these sink-holes, and drain the ponds along the whole line of forty miles in a single day, which would render it impossible for an army to subsist on the route until the holes could be stopped and the rains again fill the ponds with water.

We give also on this page a map of a portion of Tennessee and Kentucky, being the theatre of the operations of Commodore Foote, General Halleck, and General Buell.

EXECUTION OF A PRIVATE SOLDIER.

On page 60 we illustrate The Execution of Private Lanahan, of the regular army, who was hung for murder at Washington on 6th January. The following extracts from the Herald correspondence contain the history of the affair:

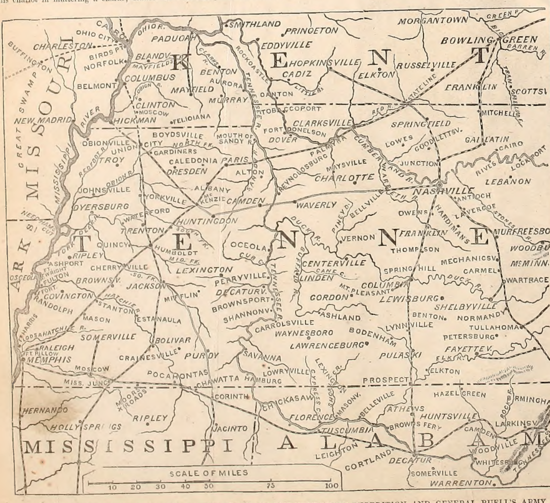
Lanahan had for some time entertained a grudge against Sergeant Brennan, and when the homicide occurred he was reprimanded by the Sergeant for being absent from his post at guard mounting. Lanahan replied to the Sergeant impudently, and when Brennan turned quickly and asked what he said, Lanahan leveled his musket and fired, killing the Sergeant instantly. The culprit was tried by court-martial, and sentenced to be hung. Major-General M'Clellan, upon a careful review of the record, which disclosed facts that would have convicted him of murder in the first degree before any impartial jury, signed the death-warrant. Brennan was an officer much respected, and his murder was the subject of much comment at the time.

This morning, at ten o'clock, Lanahan was taken from the central guard-house, and, accompanied by his spiritual adviser, Father Walter, of St. Patrick's Church, placed in a carriage, guarded by a file of regulars, conveyed by way of Ninth Street to Pennsylvania Avenue, and thence to Franklin Square. Lanahan was dressed in his regular uniform, and, with the exception of an unnatural paleness, looked as usual. He was short in stature, and dark-complexioned.

At eleven o'clock an escort, composed of five detachments from regiments of United States Infantry, took the prisoner through Fourteenth Street and Vermont Avenue to the place of execution, a vacant space between O and P streets. Here was a gallows, which had been erected during the morning, and around this the troops were ranged in a hollow square. The prisoner was taken from the carriage at a quarter past eleven o'clock, and, with a single armed guard, approached the scaffold, accompanied by Father Walter. He mounted the scaffold with a firm step and looked around upon the soldiery without flinching. General Devereaux, Assistant Adjutant-General, read in a clear voice the order for the execution, to which the prisoner calmly listened, occasionally looking around for the last time at his comrades upon the field. Three or four hundred spectators only had gathered around the military to witness the impressive spectacle.

The troops were brought to a parade rest, and the prisoner requested that his arms, which had been pinioned behind him, might be loosened, as he desired to meet his fate like a man. The request was complied with, and Father Walter put on his sacerdotal robes, and knelt for a few minutes to offer up the last petition for him who was soon to expiate his crime. Lanahan looked around when the priest had concluded his prayer, and said, in a cheerful and audible voice, as he looked around upon the military cordon, "Good-by, soldiers, good-by!" The black cap was drawn over his face, and he stepped firmly upon the trap, where he placed himself in the position of the soldier, with his arms by his side. All things being ready, Corporal Brown, at half past eleven o'clock, placed his foot upon the spring, and Lanahan, who had not been unnerved for an instant, fell, and his life was over.

There were a few muscular contractions of the body, but the spinal cord was broken, and in a few minutes the surgeons examined the body, and pronounced life extinct. The corpse was placed in an army wagon, and conveyed by comrades of the deceased to the Catholic Cemetery for burial.



Within half an hour after the execution the scaffold was removed, and persons living a square distant hardly knew that such an affair had taken place in their neighborhood.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

We publish on page 60 an engraving of the Embarkation of Troops for the Burnside Expedition on board the Hussar. The expedition will have sailed before these lines reach the public eye. The Tribune correspondent at Fortress Monroe wrote on 9th:

Throughout the day yesterday transports, gun-boats, and other craft, constituting the principal portion of the Burnside Expedition, were passing through the Chesapeake, in sight of the Fortress, on their way to their place of rendezvous. In the afternoon the fleet of gun-boats that have rendezvoused here for some time also commenced leaving, and by sundown all but two or three, which are to act in the double capacity of gun-boats and transports, such as the Hunchback and Southfield, were showing their heels in the waters of the Chesapeake. But a small number of vessels will come here, the final arrangements of the Expedition having been nearly perfected at Annapolis.

Flag-Officer Goldsborough will be chief officer in command of the expedition—of the land as well as the naval forces. Experience has proved the impracticability of a dual command—nominally a united, but really a divided one. Hence Flag-Officer Goldsborough, as the senior officer, with the rank of Major-General as well as Commodore, will be supreme, and direct the entire forces. I understand that this has the entire approval of General Burnside, who enjoys to the fullest the confidence of the Flag-Officer, and who only in the event of an extreme contingency will be abridged of any of his powers as commander of the land forces.

WAR MAP, SHOWING THE THEATRE OF OPERATIONS OF THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION AND GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY.

And again at 10th:

At about 10 o'clock A.M. the fog began to lift, and then we realized the full and awful presence of the Rebellion, for even transports, gun-boats, and all sorts of craft began to enter the Roads, and come to anchor under the walls of the fortress. The tars got steamers were black with troops, who shouted vociferously, and were saluted by every body on all sides, while the bands played the "Star-Spangled Banner." Up the Island Creek to the Eastern City, with General Burnside, had cut arrived. General Foster came on the Star Spangled, and had no time in paying his respects to General Wool. He speaks in the highest terms of his progress, and does not doubt that his troops will follow him any where.

GIVING THE MITTEN.

She gave him the mitten, the villagers said,
And that they alleged was the reason
Why Tiny Alf's wept as a private last spring,
To fight for oppression of treason.

Whether goodly spake fibly or wisely, 'twas true
That his gloves were dirty and ragged,
And smiles never more to his lips came again
Since she his love he enlisted a soldier.

And Jane Dashaway—what said she the while?
She smiled, but she trembled all over,
And sent the pale roses to flowery snow
When they spied her lover's recover.

Listened, pressing her lovelorn tight over her heart,
When the wire thrilled the grim battle story
Of Lieblerd's, of the heroic Bill Hill,
Reeling death on the red field of glory.

Then winter came on, and pitying hearts
Told of sufferings, wants, misery, and blame;
And Jane stole away to her grandmother's side
To ask—"Couldn't I knit a mitten?"

* * * * * *

Boy Alfie is nursing on sick soldier's knee—
Her quickly the bright needles ply—
"Tell soon have them done, and one man the less
On guard shall not tremble and shiver.

"But they must not know this heart, turning traitor,
Takes back all those hasty words spoken;
I said I would never be his if he went—
I must keep the pale promise unbroken.

"I'll take them to him, just to see if they fit,
Or, if needs be, some stitches to alter,
And if he is better and happy at heart
I know that my speech will not falter.

But if he should be very sorry, or sick,
Or look very weary and lonely—
Boy, am I quite sure I can meet him again?
Courage, Jane, for a brief moment only."

* * * * * *

"Friend Boy, will you try them? I knit them for you."
A smile lit his face and sad color,
While holding his hand tightly over his own,
The kneeling form trembled all over.

"This fits very well, the other please try,
To make sure both right I'll examine."
He threw back his cloak.—"Jane Dashaway, dear,
One mitten homefresh and forever!"

And now couldn't I such a sweet story tell!
How the girl, with her eyes softly shining,
Crept close to his side the arm lonely for aye,
Around her slight degree leaning,

And murmured some words in a wounded way,
Something all about soldier and glory;
And then, that the mitten might not want a hand,
She gave him her own. That's the story.

YOUNG BEN FRANKLIN; OR,
The Right Road through Life.

A Story to Show how Benjamin learned the Principles which raised him from a Printer's Boy to the first Ambassador of the American Republic. A Boy's Book for Boys. By HENRY MAYHEW, Author of "The Peasnick-Boy Philosopher," "The Wonders of Science," "Young Benjamin Franklin," &c. &c. With Illustrations by JOHN GILBERT. 16mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Boys may benefit by this book. It is an attempt, by a pleasant story, to give the principles through the medium of a story, to teach the new generation "the means of worldly welfare, the laws of worldly happiness, and the rules of worldly duty." The incidents are thoroughly well done.—Athenæum.

Fifty-Two Facts from the Bible for Fifty-Two Sundays of the Year.

By the Author of "Peep of Day," "Line upon Line," "Reading without Tears," and "More about Jesus."

Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin gilt, 60 cents.

"In this work," says the author, "has received the distinguished honor of being appointed to be one of the class-books for the Sunnam Collegiates, and has been made the subject of a Sunday-school lesson in many schools in England. It may appear to be altogether unsuitable for ears are untaught, untrained, and unreflecting. Each lesson can be understood by those who have no previous knowledge, and each is calculated to be the first address to one who has never before heard of God or his Christ."

Gieseler's Church History.

A TEXT-BOOK OF CHURCH HISTORY. By Dr. John C. L. Gieseler. Translated and Edited by Rev. Henry B. Smith, D.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. In 4 vols. 1357-1848. The Reformation and its Results to the Peace of Westphalia. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00; Sheep, $2 25; Half Calf, $3 00.

The Fourth Volume of Gieseler contains the History of the Reformation and its results, to the Peace of Westphalia, 1517 to 1648. Only one-fifth of it has ever before been translated. It is one of the most valuable parts of Gieseler's invaluable work. Prof. Kedpenning, the Editor of the German edition, says, that it contains "the cream of his labors." The history of the doctrinal controversies, particularly in the Lutheran Church, is more minute and thoroughly expounded. A fifth volume, now in progress, will complete the work to the present time, including the whole history of the Roman Catholic Church from the Reformation.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VI.—No. 266.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

DESTRUCTION OF A SCHOONER OFF CUMBERLAND INLET, GEORGIA, BY THE BOATS OF THE "ALABAMA."—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE "ALABAMA."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE PIRATE "SUMTER" FIRING AT THE BRIG "JOSEPH PARKS," OF BOSTON.—SKETCHED BY ONE OF THE CREW OF THE "SUMTER."—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

DESTRUCTION OF A SCHOONER OFF THE COAST OF GEORGIA.

WE publish on the preceding page a picture of the DESTRUCTION OF A SCHOONER which was trying to run the blockade off Cumberland Inlet, Georgia. A letter from the United States steamer Alabama to the Herald thus describes the affair:

Early on 15th December a small sail was descried to the southward, standing in toward Cumberland Inlet, and evidently trying to run the blockade. Signal was made to the Pocahontas, which was then lying to, and started in pursuit, the Seminole standing under easy steam and sail to cover her movements. About that they could not make, which was the small schooner's number, and that they could not board her in the shallow waters, having all sail set, and commenced throwing her cargo into the beach. The Alabama then fell in her way cautiously in as far as practicable, the Seminole remaining in the offing to look out for the movements of the same sort. Two of our boats were then lowered, manned, armed, under the command of Acting Masters Benton Dennis and West, and one likewise from the Seminole, and, after a short but spirited pulling they came up with her, her late occupants having taken to the woods upon the approach of "Lincoln's hirelings." She proved to be a fine, fore and aft schooner, evidently Spanish, without a name, colors, or papers, and loaded with a valuable cargo of coffee, Havana cigars, shoes, and other miscellaneous articles, evidently coming down Cumberland Inlet, with the intention of running the blockade that night. Having dispatched another boat with orders to the Alabama to state that she could not get off immediately, &c., the sailing the boats were loaded with coffee, cigars, shoes, and trash, and the destroyed schooner was soon wrapped in flames, the officers staying by her long enough to see that her destruction was inevitable. No vessel had yet been started for the ship than the schooner's crew ran down out of the woods and hoarded the Pocahontas's boat into its extremities the flames, her masts soon going by the board, and then left her to her fate, the flames above a smoking wreck. Considering the close vicinity of the enemy's batteries to the northern end of the inlet, the prize, and the uncertainty as to whether it would be captured, either near to it or under its own headed batteries, and the expedition was certainly a very hazardous one, and reflects great credit upon the officers and men who carried it out.

THE PIRATE "SUMTER"

WE publish on the preceding page an engraving which represents the pirate Sumter firing shot and shell at the Boston brigantine Jabez Howe, and the finishing stroke of the best part of her contents. The Howe brig was furnished to the Captain of the Sumter by the U. S. Times. The Boston Journal thus describes the affair:

The Joseph Park, Captain Knights, sailed from this port July 26, in ballast, for Pernambuco, and at 6.30 A.M. of the 29th was boarded by a steamer steering for her. When the steamer was bearing down on them, the Captain of the Park ordered the mate to get the boat ready and get the American flag, which he did, and this was run up. The steamer fired a gun for the brig, and when she was within distance also ran up the American flag at the gaff. An order was then given from the steamer for the Captain of the brig to hand in his stubbin—oath and bonds, we think was at one time. A boat was then sent from the steamer, which had come under the stern of the brig, and a lieutenant, with six men, came on board the brig, and asked the Captain for his papers, at the same time informing him that he was a prisoner of war to the Confederate steamer Sumter. Captain Knights then delivered the papers, and went on board the Sumter, as did all the crew, each being told to take his effects with him. When the crew getting on board the Sumter they were taken to the quarters, and their effects examined before they were sent below, each having his sheath-knife and matches taken from him.

A prize crew was put on board the brig, and she was kept there, and is under the control of Semmes. The number, provisions, instruments, and new sails were taken on board the steamer, and all clothes and other articles that were fired at her at a distance of about five hundred yards, but without hitting her. At sunset the steamer and brig's crew went aboard the brig, and putting her before the wind, they set her on fire.

Captain Ainsbury tells us that while the Sumter was off at St. Pierre she was moored to a buoy in the harbor, and so intense was the feeling of the negroes against her that a guard of ten marines and ten French soldiers was constantly kept on board to keep them cutting the cable. He says that the customs-house and other officials were sympathetic with the pirate; that the French man-of-war lying in the port furnished Captain Semmes with several boatloads of clothing; and that every facility was placed in the way of the Sumter. At latest accounts the Sumter was again at St. Pierre, Martinique.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1862.

CURRENCY AND TAXATION

BOTH Houses of Congress now stand pledged, by a nearly unanimous vote, to tax the people, directly and indirectly, to the amount of $150,000,000 annually. Almost all has been determined with regard to the nature of the new taxes to be imposed, or with regard to the machinery by which Mr. Chase proposes to fill his exhausted Treasury. Both topics, however, are being actively ventilated in the papers and in Congress, and it is fair to suppose that when action is taken on them, it will be taken understandingly.

There are certain points which are admitted on all sides. It is confessed that the Treasury is empty, and the floating debt about $80,000,000. No one doubts but the war will cost more than $500,000,000 a year. It is also well known, at least in financial circles, that the Government can not borrow any money at present either at home or abroad. Large sums, such as are required for the prosecution of great wars, can only be borrowed through the instrumentality of heavy banks and banking-houses, and our banks and bankers have already done their utmost. Very nearly the entire bank capital of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston is at the present moment invested in Government securities, which the people evince no willingness to take off the hands of the banks. As to borrowing abroad, that is not to be thought of. After the Trent affair our people would not suffer any Finance Minister from this country to go begging to London; and even if the attempt were made, there are abundant indications that foreign Governments would, from a desire to see this country divided, prevent the negotiation of any United States loan. It being clear, therefore, that we are to expend $500,000,000 a year; that the Treasury is empty; and that no more money can be borrowed; the question is—by what other process than that of taxation can money for the prosecution of the war be obtained?

Thus far two practical schemes, and only two, have been proposed. One, that of Mr. Chase, is to raise the money by taxation. The other, a number of visionary methods have been proposed by "currency doctors" but none but the two to which we shall refer have been tried.

The first has been laid before the House by Mr. Spalding, of the Committee of Ways and Means. He proposes to allow Mr. Chase to issue his debts in Treasury Notes which shall bear no interest, shall be a legal tender, and shall be receivable for all dues to the Government. The advantage of this scheme is that it at once relieves the Treasury, and supplies the Government with all the money it needs. The objection is to the "fatal facility" which it affords for excessive issues of paper money, and the prospect of the Treasury Notes depreciating.

The other scheme, which is the offspring of certain bank Presidents, proposes to allow Mr. Chase to pay his debts in Treasury Notes bearing 3.65 per cent. annual interest, and not a legal tender, but convertible into 7.30 notes, which latter are made a legal tender. The advantage of this scheme is that it does not increase the volume of currency afloat, and hence in some degree avoids the danger of a general inflation. The objection to it is that the 3.65 notes, not being bankable, could not find a market but at a ruinous discount, and hence depreciate to an enormous extent, dragging down with them all other Government securities, and the whole credit of the Government generally. It would seem that this scheme would render certain and speedy all the evils which, under Mr. Spalding's plan, might be averted by the under adverse circumstances, at a remote period.

Both these projects rest, of course, on a basis of taxation. Without such taxation neither Treasury Notes bearing interest, nor Treasury Notes without interest will help the Government. The only question is, what taxes? Mr. Chase personally, a large amount of Government paper can be floated, as it would be receivable for taxes and would be received at par; but, to be on the safe side, if it was apparent that the public revenue from direct taxation was adequate to defray all interest on the debt, and to pay that which it was convertible, and to extinguish the principal at a given period by means of a sinking fund.

It is instructive, in this connection, to refer to the experience of other nations engaged in great wars. Thus, that the success of the war in 1793 to restore the Bourbons to the throne of France, her rulers believed, as Mr. Lincoln now believes, that the country was full of "loyal" men. Mere temporary arrangements for loans were therefore made (just as Mr. Chase made with the Associated Banks in July), and for 5 years the war was carried on with borrowed money, and without increase of taxation.

But Mr. Pitt soon discovered, as he deemed it, that this resource was exhausted, and that course must be had to taxation. The war increase increased from an average of $80,000,000 annually to $150,000,000 in 17 $226,000,000 in 1804, $307,000,000 in 18 and $352,000,000 in 1814. Commencing then with this, in 1797, the Bank was directed to suspend specie payments, and paper was made, and remained for many years, a legal tender and the currency of the kingdom. Under this system Great Britain was enabled to expend in this long war a sum of $4,000,000,000 without exhausting her strength. She came out of the war richer than she went into it, with her population largely increased in a few short millions, and with her position secured as the most wealthy nation in the world.

If we should be forced to the same course, should first proceed to select the best possible kind and form of paper (there being no institution in this country corresponding to the Bank of England), and make it a legal tender, providing for it a market and an ultimate resting-place by making it receivable for all dues. Then, as practicable in coin at the pleasure of Government, and convertible into Government bonds at a fixed rate. It should next proceed to impose war taxes enough to meet a very large proportion of the annual expenditure—say one-third, at least. The people of Great Britain, who number 26,000,000, pay annual taxes, direct and indirect, amounting to between $300,000,000 and $350,000,000 annually. We, who number, counting 40,000,000, pay taxes, direct and indirect, to the amount of $275,000,000 to $300,000,000. The people of the North can easily manage over 21,000,000, can surely afford to pay $200,000,000 for taxes during the first year of the war, and to increase the amount hereafter, should the war continue.

In July last Congress adopted a measure imposing an income tax, which was to be levied only on incomes over $800 a year. It is to be feared that in this servile imitation of British precedent due regard was not had to the difference between this country and England. In Great Britain a very large segment of the people enjoy fixed incomes from lands or money invested in public securities; this class is rendered better by an increase tax than in any other way. In this country, on the contrary, there are no fixed incomes, and every man can be reached by specific taxes upon property and commerce. The limitation fixed by Congress at $800 would, moreover, have the effect of exempting from the operation of the tax the great bulk of the rural population, and would throw the whole of it upon residents in cities.

A revenue of $150,000,000 can be obtained without any income tax. If the tariff be so altered as to yield $50,000,000, the remaining $100,000,000 can be raised by—1. A stamp tax, which would be in force only for the first $100,000,000; 2. Excise duties on liquors, beer, ale, wines, and tobacco, say $30,000,000; and, 3. A property tax of $70,000,000, which would be made objects of taxation, which should be made to yield revenue, are private carriages; stock held in banks, railroads, insurance companies, and other commercial and moneyed corporations; watches, jewelry, and plate; the incomes of resident foreigners who do not propose to become naturalized; lawsuits; legacies; travelers; steamboats, omnibuses, hack carriages, and other vehicles for rent; horses; dogs; horses; sporting; auction sales, etc., etc., etc.; all of which might and ought to be taxed.

THE LOUNGER.

A NATIONAL PRESIDENT.

THE President-elect has given proof of the fact that he regards the question of the suppression of the rebellion to be a purely national question, and entirely independent of party. The country of his Administration, falling upon so critical a time, has been to gather its national standard all loyal men, whether they were Republicans or Democrats. The peril of the nation annihilates party, and whoever forgets that in the excitement does not. He is the most purely national and loyal Chief Magistrate we have had for many years. The Democratic name office have been chosen from patriotic and not upon partisan grounds. High military appointments have been given for the most signal and political enmity to the Administration. Mr. Jeremiah S. Black, the last Secretary of State under James Buchanan, has been appointed Attorney-General to the Supreme Court. General Dix, the last Secretary of War in the same Cabinet, is the Major-General, and in command at Baltimore. Edwin M. Stanton, Mr. Buchanan's last Attorney-General, is now Mr. Lincoln's Secretary of War.

It would be difficult for any man to give stronger proof of the sincerity of his declaration that the country is to be saved by all loyal citizens than the President gives by this action. And it is quite enough to silence the Republican party as the war in New Hampshire and Indiana.

THE TAX.

THE most alarming sign since the outbreak of the rebellion was the apparent unwillingness of Congress to lay the necessary tax. It indicated a want of confidence in the people. It implied that they were not willing to pay for the war. But if we have all supposed that Congress was afraid it at once. If we are all so absurdly deceiving ourselves, the immediate tax will be unnecessary. If the nation wishes and expects to pay the enormous cost of this war by throwing up hats and shouting hosannas to the Government contractor, certainly no time should be lost in surrendering to the rebellion.

The question of the tax is simply, Are we in earnest? Are we willing to know that the cost is money, and that we must therefore pay cost? It is easy enough to print a myriad reams of pretty engraved notes, and to agree to take them for money. But they are not money; and, like all other lies, they will come to naught, and bring us to confusion. Are we in earnest? For if we are, we shall gladly economize, and economize again. If we are, we shall be willing enough to be poor, and never to be ashamed.

Besides, the tax has been expected. For nine months we have known that gaps were necessarily come; that a nation whose entire machinery was set to peace could not go to war without an immense outlay. To have had a party ready to collect and equip an army; to feed, and move, and arm half a million of men, until now we are spending two millions a week, is to have begun the machine moving. And that money must be paid by the whole people. But the people have had it for every man, woman, and child in the loyal States. Does any one doubt that they are willing to pay it what they expect to pay it?

Nations have been called upon to do it before ours. William Pitt, the idolater of British governors, when England was wrestling for life and death with France, proceeded upon the principle that the people were willing to pay, and were willing to pay for life. He knew that there would be complaints and grumbling. He knew that John Bull had sense enough to see that he must pay the exact value of what he enjoyed. His motto, therefore, was, "Take away your money." When he was obliged to borrow money, he set apart certain revenues to pay the interest and take care of the principal. John Bull grweled; paid the tax thanked him; and has ever since followed so good a leader.

The only question to consider, then, is, not whether we shall be taxed, but how the tax shall best be laid. Any system will be good enough to secure success if he knows that our expenses are virtually cash payments. And a still greater confidence will possess the public mind when every body's accounts are beginning to the necessary tax. Every moment of delay is a battle lost. Every sign of hesitation is a bid for foreign interference. The Committee should have at once advised the necessary tax, or an unconditional surrender.

EXPENSIVE ECONOMY.

THAT the war should be ended as suddenly and with as much economy as possible we are all agreed. But the country views with alarm the policy Congress that measures of the most expensive economy are not adopted. The appropriations have been a hasty and summary premium upon inventions of effective fire-arms and projectiles, this would hardly seem to be the special subject of economy. Indeed, the last points which the hand of economy should touch are those which increase our knowledge of the rebels' resources and their means of means to strike them effectively.

It is the plain reason that the proposition to omit the appropriation for the Coast Survey should be so jealously regarded. It is a plan of penny-wise and-pound-foolish economy. No money appropriated for many years past is proved by events to have been more wisely expended than that which has sustained this survey. The most brilliant action of the war, hitherto—the capture and occupation of Port Royal—is mainly due to the exact knowledge of the region obtained by the Coast Survey. Captain Davis has his ground perfect in his head. So is Sherlock Bache. The ships were not sunk at random. They were left in the very spots where the Coast Survey charts showed would be the most effective for the purpose.

The war will be waged by us upon the coast, for we are very strong there. We have the most marine strength, under the circumstances, gets its efficiency from a perfect knowledge of the whole shore against which we operate, and that comes from the Coast Survey. Our navy, however ample in ships and guns, is powerless without the men, can only deal left-handed blows unless it knows precisely the character of the coast. Is it time to suspend the survey which gives it that knowledge?

Besides, we all naturally wish that we may, as far as possible, avoid the usual brutalizing effects of war. It is its tendency to crush all purely civil and social intellectual activity. It is in our great desire to throttle rebellion we may forget that it is fostering other monsters. In the life-and-death struggle of existence all the moral and humanizing and civilizing processes should be continued. It is our constantly widening and deepening intelligence which makes our political advance. Without knowledge Democracy is a delusion. Even Great Britain, in her long French war, found that the suspension of civil processes did not discontinue this kind of work. Why should we? The intellectual activity of the nation is the immediate purpose of the war. It is a monument of our consciousness of the value of science to a nation. To suppose is small. Is its suspension a cheap economy?

THE VAN OF VICTORY.

WE weekly papers have a hard time of it, when every day is so rich in events and news. Happy Fridays that we are, we know all things. But what happen! At this moment of writing the air is full of expectation. Something is imminent. The great January fog which seems to cloud the land from the Mississippi to the Chesapeake, is only typical of the mental haze in which the public mind are hidden; while yet events seem at hand, as the Mississippi flotilla and the Burnside expedition are dimly descried in the fog.

The "great movement," it is universally understood, is about to begin. Things will end the rebellion. The next six days, or the next fortnight, are to unveil a splendid spectacle. We are to win victories that will astound them. In a word, we are going to do exactly what we design to do.

While therefore the public faith and expectation are so resolute, and while no solitary expression can dampen the ardor, it is well for every one to indicate distrust of an ultimate result, why should we not? Why should not upon probable disappointment? We are fully ready for victory; are we pretty well prepared for defeat? If the flotilla is driven back, if Burnside's troops are not as effective as it will be heroic and devoted, are we all ready to carry our fault as firmly, and to look as sparingly at the consequences?

If any of the great battles which seem to be next shall be lost by us, shall we be disheartened? The white-feather party will begin to cackle; the rebels will insist upon some forward movement of their own; and then will begin the usual brief interval preparatory to saying, "You can't do the work, and I can do better."

The point that we ought always to bear in mind is that war is uncertain; that the most ample and overwhelming preparation for it that a nation may be eminently just, but does not therefore necessarily win the battle; and that if any nation relies in our present operations we are not to look for immediate peace. Broken the rebels may be, and dismayed, and disheartened, but they will not yield to one campaign however successful. They fight for life, and for the life of their institutions. They fight, too, with the sympathy of the world. Let us not suppose, therefore, that they are going to succumb to the first or the second struggling. much more endurance, much more paying, than we have yet had. The movement of to-day is doubtless the van of victory. But the rear must be yet in sight.

THE CONTRACTS.

THE people are doubtless willing to pay the necessary taxes for the war, but they will not patiently endure many such exposures as Mr. Dawes made in his speech. They are specimen pleas from the forthcoming pudding of the report. Won't it be a dainty dish to set before the people?

The first contract, it seems, was one to supply cattle for the troops at Washington in April. It was given to an old hack Washington politician. He sublet it in twenty-four hours, and made $32,000 without leaving his chair; and the men who actually furnished the cattle made $26,000 more; so that upon the first 2200 head of cattle contracted for a profit of $58,000 over the market-price was realized.

A regiment of cavalry, 1000 strong, reached Louisville, and a board of officers condemned 485, nearly half, of their horses. They were blind, spavined, ringboned; they had the heaves, the glanders: they had every thing but strength and health and fitness. There was not one of them worth $20. They had cost the Government, before they were mustered into the service, $58,200, besides thousands of dollars for transportation.

There are contracts for the manufacture of Springfield muskets, the first one of which can not be delivered for six months. There is a contract for the supply of 1,092,000 muskets at $28 a-piece, when the very same muskets are now made in Springfield for $13 50 a-piece.

When the last Congress appropriated $20,000,000 for such purposes, $37,000,000 had been already pledged to contractors for provision for some future emergency. $2,000,000 were intrusted to an honest but incompetent gentleman to spend in the wisest way he could. He immediately began to purchase linen pantaloons, straw-hats, London porter, and dried herrings, until he had expended $390,000, "and then he got scared and quit."

There is a contract for the supply of wood to the army at $7 a cord. After the army itself has cut down the wood to clear the ground for their batteries, the contractor employs the army wagons to draw the wood to the camps. "He has no farther trouble than to draw his seven dollars for a cord, leaving the Government to draw the wood."

These are given to us as illustrations of the manner in which the money of the people has been spent. It is perhaps no worse a disclosure than the history of any nation suddenly plunged into war would show. But it is certainly a lamentable revelation. There is a frightful responsibility somewhere; and the retirement of Mr. Cameron from the head of the War Department simultaneously with this exposure, may be interpreted as the result of his conviction that, rightly or wrongly, public opinion would hold him accountable. There was a very strong opposition to his original appointment, upon the ground that unpleasant stories affecting his reputation, whether true or false, had long been believed. But his apparent energy, skill, and perspicacity in the management of his important office, had at least mollified the public expression of distrust.

That distrust is again suddenly awakened. If the statements of the Committee's report shall be unquestionably correct, and the late Secretary of War is unable to explain them satisfactorily, it had been better for his fame that he had marched by his brother's side to Bull Run, and had shared his fate.

PAY AS YOU GO.

THERE is to be no more franking home of shirts to be washed. There is to be no more express provision of Congress by which the Postal Department is made the unprofitable department of the Government. If we value the speeches of our senators and representatives, we must now pay a penny for the privilege of reading them. If we want the wisdom of the Patent-office report, we must pay for it. Members can no longer talk to Buncomb gratis. Buncomb must pay the piper if it wishes to dance.

The abolition of the Franking system is the explosion of an absurd practice, and, consequently, an evidence of the common sense of this Congress. It was at best but robbing Peter to pay Paul. The deficit in the revenue caused by the Post-office had to be made up in some other way. Under the old system of high postages something might be said in favor of allowing documents to pass free from representative to constituent. But it is utterly different now. No letter ought to be written which is not worth three cents to the writer or the recipient. No book can be of much value to any constituent for which he is not willing to pay the necessary postage.

Besides, the reform prevents electioneering at the expense of the Government. And it shows that the present majority in Congress is honestly in favor of lightening the public burdens. The Senate is said to be unwilling to agree to the bill; but we will still believe the Senate is not less wise than the House.

THE ASTOR LIBRARIAN.

DR. COGSWELL is, in the public estimation, such an essential part of the Astor Library that, without offense to his accomplished successor, his resignation seems to be a misfortune to the Institution. And yet, with the completion of the catalogue, his great work in the Library may be considered finished. The Institution grew out of his suggestion. He collected the books. He arranged them in the noble building erected for them. He has prepared the catalogue of them, 120,000 in number. The ship is built, launched, rigged: the armament is on board: the future is secure, and the head and hand that have directed all may well retire from active service, conscious that the voyage, whoever may be in command, will be but a monument of the skill and devotion of the builder.

The catalogue fills four volumes, and more than two thousand pages. The trustees in receiving it spoke of it as it deserved, and as he deserved who made it. They also requested him to use at his pleasure the rooms he has occupied in the building; and he retains his seat in the Board of Direction. At his suggestion, Mr. Francis Schrœder has been appointed his successor as Librarian-in-chief.

The great and unobtrusive labors of a ripe scholar are thus ended. Exegit monumentum. The Astor Library is not less the monument of its first Librarian than of its founder.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ENCOURAGING.—"How do you feel this morning, James?" "Very much better, I thank you. I did think when I came out that I was not so well; but I know I am better now, for I just met the undertaker, and he looked black at me!"

When the old lady had fallen into the well, and was rescued from drowning with some difficulty, she declared that, "had it not been for Providence and another man she would never have been got out alive." The theory of the old woman's assertion seems to have operated in one of the churches in Logansport, Ohio, where, on the national fast-day, in the presence of a large congregation, a gentleman of reputed creditable attainments, both literary and moral, thus prayed; "O Lord, had the East done as well as the Hoosier State in furnishing men to put down this rebellion we would not be under the necessity of calling on Thee!"

"Do let me have your photograph!" said a dashing belle to a gentleman who had been annoying her with his attentions. The gentleman was delighted, and in a short time the lady received the picture. She gave it to her servant with the question, "Would you know the original if he should call?" The servant replied in the affirmative. "Well, when he comes, tell him I am engaged."

The New Bedford Mercury says that an Irish couple, a few evenings since, at about nine o'clock, rang the door bell of one of the Protestant parsons of our city. The door was opened by the clergyman, who, on inquiring what they wanted, was informed by Michael that he and Bridget came to be married. "But why," asked the parson, "don't you go to the priest?" "And sure we did," said Michael, "and he tould us to go to the divil, and so we came to you."

A traveler in Ireland having been inclined to deny that the peasantry were humorous was told to ask any question at the first laboring man he met on the road. Accordingly, on seeing a sturdy fellow breaking stones, he says, "Now, my man, if the devil were to come here just now, whether would he take you or me?" "Me, to be sure," says the man, "for he's certain of your honor at any time."

T. B. THORPE, once "of Louisiana"—though before and since of New York—Colonel of our army in Mexico under "Old Zack"—author of "Tom Owen the Bee-Hunter" and a score of other clever sketches of character, besides Magazine papers on Art and Natural History almost without number—painter of one of the three good pictures of Niagara—a clever stump-speaker—and one of the best story-tellers of the day—has just made a most successful appearance upon the platform as a lecturer. His lecture on "the Inside View of the Great Southern Rebellion" was a marked success. During his long residence in what is now "Secessia" he became personally known to almost all the men who are now magnates of the rebellion; and he lights up the graver part of his discourse with anecdotes and reminiscences as deftly as he had lighted up the sombre parts of his "Niagara." The lecture has one fault: it is too short. It occupies only two hours, while the audience who listened to its first delivery were anxious for "more." Lecture Committees, who want a live subject treated by a live man, in a lively manner, will bespeak this if they are "Wise;" if "Otherwise," they will not.

A good-for-nothing fellow left his wife in a great rage, telling her that he would never come back till he was rich enough to come in a carriage. For once he kept his word, being trundled home drunk in a wheel-barrow.

WAY OF THE WORLD.—If the speculator misses his aim, every body cries out, "he's a fool," and sometimes, "he's a rogue." If he succeed, they besiege his door, and demand his daughter in marriage.

At one of the London police-courts, last week, a professional beggar, on being asked what trade he followed, replied that he was "a philanthropist."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, January 14, in the Senate, a communication was received from the President, transmitting a copy of the instructions received by the Austrian Minister from his Government relative to the Trent affair, and the reply of Mr. Seward thereto. The resolution of Senator Powell, calling on the Secretary of War for an answer to the resolution in regard to contracts, was taken up, debated briefly, and adopted by a vote of thirty-four against three. A communication was received from Mr. Lamon, the Marshal of the District of Columbia, giving the regulations respecting visitors to the jail under his charge. Senator Grimes called up the bill providing for the release of fugitive slaves from the jail. This led to a long debate on the negro question, and finally the bill passed by a vote of thirty-one against four. The House bill for the relief of the owners of the British ship Perthshire was passed, and the Senate adjourned.——The House resumed the consideration of the bill to abolish the franking privilege, and after a lengthy discussion passed it by a vote of 107 against 42. In Committee of the Whole the bill making an appropriation of $35,500 for the exhibition of American products at the London World's Fair was taken up, and a lively debate followed in reference to our relations with Great Britain, in which Messrs. Conkling of New York, and Lovejoy of Illinois, participated. The bill was finally laid on the table by a large majority, and the House adjourned.

On Wednesday, 15th, in the Senate, the joint resolution to promote the efficiency of the troops serving in Kansas was taken up and discussed by Senators Saulsbury, Lane, and Harlan. Senator Trumbull, of the Judiciary Committee, to which had been referred all the plans for confiscating the property of rebels, reported a bill, as a substitute for the whole, confiscating the property and declaring free the slaves of rebels. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was reported by the Finance Committee. A communication was received from the Navy Department, in answer to a resolution relative to the employment of George D. Morgan, which was referred. After an executive session, during which the appointment of Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War was confirmed, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Conway, of Kansas, introduced a joint resolution to promote the efficiency of the troops in Kansas. Mr. Corning, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution, that, in order to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, and the interest on the national loan, and have an ample sinking fund for its ultimate liquidation, a tax be imposed, which, with the tariff on imports, will secure an annual sum of not less than one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, moved to postpone the consideration of the subject until Monday week, which was voted down, and the joint resolution, under the previous question, was agreed to by a vote of 133 to 5. Mr. Blair, from the Military Committee, reported a bill amendatory of the direct tax bill, providing for liberating and colonizing the slaves of rebels, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On Thursday, 16th, in the Senate, the Secretary of War sent in an answer to the resolution in regard to contracts. The Secretary states that the first resolution was received at the Department just after the battle of Bull Run, and that since then he has not had sufficient clerical force to properly answer the resolution. The answer also states: "I myself have not made a single contract for any purpose whatever. The heads of bureaus have made all the contracts." The subject was referred. A resolution declaring Marshal Lamon guilty of a breach of the privileges, and of contempt of the authority of the Senate, by his order excluding Senators from the District jail, and that said resolution be communicated to the President, was laid over. The bill providing that army or naval officers who shall arrest fugitive slaves shall be discharged from the public service, was then discussed till the expiration of the morning hour. The debate on the Kansas contested election case was resumed, the question being on a motion to strike out the word "not" in the resolution of the Judiciary Committee declaring that Mr. Lane was not entitled to his seat. The motion was finally adopted by a vote of 24 to 16, thus rejecting Mr. Stanton's claim to a seat. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill was passed authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to furnish the prisoners of the United States in the revolted States with clothing and other necessaries of life, and for this purpose that he employ such agents as may be necessary.

On Friday, 17th, in the Senate, Mr. Jacob M. Howard, Senator elect from Michigan, in place of Senator Bingham, deceased, was qualified and took his seat. The joint resolution from the House, declaratory of the purpose of Congress to impose taxes which will yield $150,000,000 of revenue, was adopted, Senator Powell alone voting against it. The Senate held an executive session, confirmed the appointment of Mr. Cameron to the Russian Mission, and afterward adjourned.——In the House, the District of Columbia Committee made a report regarding Marshal Lamon's jail regulations, to the effect that while they are annoying to members of Congress, they are not so onerous as to require the intervention of the House, and hence the Committee ask to be relieved from further consideration of the subject. Mr. Stevens reported the West Point Academy Appropriation bill, and stated that he had been informed that numerous libeling letter-writers had been finding fault with the Committee of Ways and Means for not reporting an equitable tax bill. The committee, however, he said, are gathering facts, and work for hours after attending to business in the House. He desired to say that the criticisms and libels of the press would not make them move one minute faster than a due regard to the public interests will permit. The Fortification Appropriation bill, as originally reported, was passed. It appropriates between five and six millions of dollars for the completion of defensive works already commenced.

On Monday, 20th, in the Senate, a petition was presented asking for the continuance of the Coast Survey, and a protest was received from citizens of New York against the appointment of a Solicitor of Customs for that city. Bills were introduced and referred regarding the pay of naval officers; the appointment of additional Secretaries of War for one year; repealing the act excepting witnesses before Congressional Committees from examination in courts of justice; and authorizing payment for property occupied by United States troops. Resolutions providing for a daily overland mail between Utah and Oregon, and authorizing certain naval officers to accept presents from the Japanese Government, were offered. The bill amending the articles of war, and imposing the death penalty upon spies, was discussed and laid over. The Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was passed, as amended. A communication from the Government of Prussia upon the Trent affair was received from the President. The report of the Judiciary Committee that no cause exists for the expulsion of Senator Bright, of Indiana, charged with treasonable correspondence, was warmly debated, but no action was taken.——In the House, a memorial was presented from workmen in the Brooklyn Navy-yard; William A. Hall, from the Third District of Missouri, took the oath and his seat; the Committee on Elections reported a resolution that Joseph Segar is not entitled to represent the First District of Virginia. A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle with the States for supplies furnished troops was referred. A resolution was adopted confiscating certain lands selected by Alabama, under the law of Congress, and applying the same to the use of a Seminary in the Territory where the lands are. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to inquire whether further legislation is necessary to secure to the relatives of killed or deceased volunteers the bounty provided by the Act of July last. A bill discharging all bands of volunteer regiments was referred, and also a bill establishing Territorial governments in rebel States. Mr. Allen, of Ohio, offered a resolution that no part of appropriations made or taxes levied by Congress shall be applied for the prosecution of a war for emancipating slaves in rebel States. Mr. Blake, of Ohio, moved to lay this resolution on the table. Carried—91 against 37. A resolution was adopted from the Government Contract Committee, ordering the arrest of Henry Hickley, for refusing to appear before the Committee at Cincinnati; and a bill was also adopted appropriating $10,000 for expenses of the Committee. A motion by Mr. Lovejoy, to instruct the Judiciary Committee to report a bill making void all sales, transfers, and dispositions of all kinds of property by persons engaged in insurrection, was passed. On motion of Mr. Blair, of Missouri, the Committee on Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of levying a stamp tax upon the circulating notes of banks and other corporations. A bill to establish an additional judicial district in New York was referred. Debates upon the rebellion and the slavery question consumed the remainder of the time until adjournment.

IMPORTANT UNION VICTORY IN KENTUCKY.

By telegraphic dispatches from Kentucky we learn that on Saturday, January 18, the rebel general Zollicoffer marched out of his intrenchments at Mill Spring and attacked the camp of the Union forces under General Schoepffs at three o'clock A.M. The battle raged with great fury until four o'clock P.M., with a very heavy loss on both sides. At that hour, however, General Zollicoffer was killed, and the rebels fled in confusion to their camp. The Union forces were reinforced by General Thomas during the fight, and on Sunday afternoon they pursued the rebels, captured their intrenched camp and army stores, and totally dispersed the army. The rebel loss is reported at 275. The Tenth Indiana regiment lost 75 killed and wounded. No further Union loss reported. This victory clears East Kentucky of rebels, and opens the way for the advance of General Buell into East Tennessee. It is rumored that, in consequence of this Union victory, General Beauregard has evacuated Manassas, fearing that his supplies will be cut off and his flank turned by Buell's army; but this report lacks confirmation.

GREAT FLOOD IN CALIFORNIA.

Further telegraphic accounts have been received of the great flood in Sacramento Valley. In the streets of Sacramento the water was from two to eleven feet deep, and the Legislature adjourned until the flood subsided. Cooked provisions were sent on from San Francisco. The loss of property is immense, and the flood unprecedented.

PREPARATIONS FOR AN ADVANCE.

General M'Clellan has issued a peremptory order to commandants of divisions and brigades, enjoining the absolute necessity of keeping every officer and soldier at his post at this critical juncture. Nothing but medical certificates of ill health and other urgent reasons shall entitle any officer to furlough or leave of absence.

M'CLELLAN BEFORE THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

General M'Clellan was closeted on 15th with the Committee on the Conduct of the War, at the Capitol, from ten o'clock in the morning till four in the afternoon, during which time he communicated much valuable information to the committee. He was subsequently summoned to an interview with the President.

THE ADVANCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

General M'Clernand's force marched on 15th to Mayfield, Kentucky. The rebels who are encamped close to that place, at Camp Beauregard, will therefore either give fight or retire. General Grant and staff went down on 15th on the steamer Chancellor, and landed at Fort Jefferson.

Deserters report 40,000 rebels at Columbus. General Grant made a heavy reconnoissance on the afternoon of the 16th inst., going within five miles of Columbus, but no rebels were discovered. A dispatch from Cairo reports that on Friday night the expedition to Bloomfield returned successful, with 40 rebel captives, including one Lieutenant-Colonel and one Adjutant and three Captains. A reconnoissance up the Tennessee River by the gun-boat Conestoga had failed to discover any fortifications.

GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY.

According to the letters of the Tribune correspondent, with the advance of General Buell's army, from Munfordsville, up to the 14th instant, the preparations for an early advance were completed, but the weather had been too unfavorable and the roads too miry for a movement against the enemy. Rifle-pits and intrenchments were being made on the south bank of Green River, to protect the bridge in case of need.

THE LAST OF HUMPHREY MARSHALL.

A dispatch from Colonel Garfield to General Buell, dated Prestonburg, 11th, states that he left Paintville Thursday noon with 1100 men, and engaged Marshall's forces, 2500 strong, with three cannon posted on the hill. "We fought them," he says, "till dark, and drove them from their positions. This morning we found twenty-five of his dead on the field. The enemy's loss can not be less than sixty. We took twenty-five prisoners and a quantity of stores. The enemy burned most of his stores and fled precipitately during the night. To-day I have crossed the river and been occupying Prestonburg. Our loss is two killed and twenty-five wounded."

ANOTHER FIELD-DAY AT FORT PICKENS.

Colonel Harvey Brown opened fire from Fort Pickens on the 1st inst. upon the rebel steamer Times while loading stores at the Pensacola Navy-yard. He was provoked to adopt this course by the fact that the rebel batteries at Pensacola had been firing for some days previous at our small craft. The rebels returned the fire, several of their shells bursting within Fort Pickens, but wounding only one man. The firing was continued until evening, when the last shot came from Colonel Brown's guns. One of the shots from Fort Pickens made a breach in Fort Barrancas, and during the day the town of Warrington was set on fire by our shells, and continued to burn until the night of the 2d.

SIEGEL IN THE FIELD AGAIN.

A dispatch from Rolla, Missouri, says that the indications are that the troops there, under General Siegel, will soon move eastward. The pickets of the enemy extend fourteen miles from Springfield, where General Price is estimated to have about 12,000 men. General M'Intosh was reported as coming to his aid with large reinforcements from Arkansas.

MASON AND SLIDELL SAFE.

Messrs. Mason and Slidell arrived at Saint Georges, Bermuda, on the 9th instant, on board the British war steamer Rinaldo. After the Rinaldo had coaled she sailed for Saint Thomas, where the rebel agents would wait a passage to England in the regular British West India mail steamer.

MORE PENNSYLVANIANS FOR THE WAR.

Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, his State having already furnished her full quota of troops, asks permission to send eight full regiments of infantry and one of cavalry, now ready in Pennsylvania, on an expedition to the Southern coast. Bravo for the old Keystone State!

DISCONTENT AMONG THE REBELS.

Southern papers afford conclusive proof of the increasing discontent and demoralization of the rebel army. It is admitted by the Richmond journals that the inertion and ennui which has fallen upon the troops is working out terrible results. The Richmond Examiner says that, while the rebel army is accomplishing nothing, the Northern Government has been making movements and assaults, and carrying on plans of attack to suit themselves, without any delays or alarms, ever since they were compelled to make hasty preparations for the defense of Washington several months ago. The whole tone of the Southern papers would seem to indicate a fear that the rebellion is in immediate danger of breaking up.

REBEL ARMIES DISBANDING.

The intelligence of the Government is to the effect that the rebels will have great difficulty in inducing their twelve months' men to remain in the service, after the periods of their enlistment, which expire in February and March.

MORE ADVICE FROM THE FOREIGNERS.

The State Department has received notes from the Governments of Prussia and Austria on the Trent question, similar to that from Russia, urging that it would be not only wise in us to avoid a foreign war at this time, but also that the surrender of the captive rebels would be in accordance with American doctrines of international law.

PERSONAL.

General Lane is to leave Washington soon for Kansas, to take the head of his brigade. He has had an interview with Mr. Lincoln, the Secretary of War, and General M'Clellan. They gave him full liberty to conduct the campaign in Kansas on his own principles.

Dispatches from Minister Corwin confirm the report that he is about to come home, as, under his instructions, he can not advance our interests in Mexico. The Mexicans are making great preparations to resist the allies.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

CONFIDENCE IN PEACE.

THE news by the steamships Anglo-Saxon and Hansa had materially strengthened confidence in peace. Consols showed great buoyancy and had further advanced about one half per cent., and closed firm on Friday, the 3d instant, at the quotations current before the Trent affair, and showed an advance of three-eighths since the 1st instant.

THE "TUSCARORA" ON THE LOOK-OUT FOR THE "NASHVILLE."

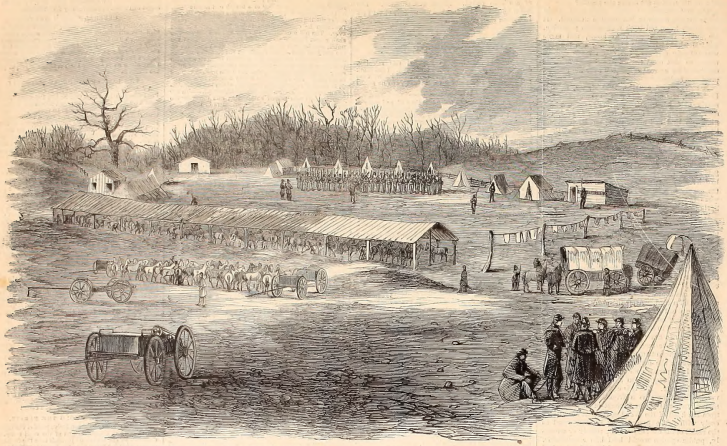
A suspicious steamer has been seen cruising in the English channel off Dover, and there were strong reasons to suppose it was the privateer Sumter. [Supposed to be the United States gun-boat Tuscarora.]

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR'S SPEECH ON NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

The Emperor, on New-Year's day, made an address to the diplomatic corps, and received as usual the various State bodies. In response to an address from the Senate, he said he counted on the Senate to assist him in perfecting the constitution, and at the same time maintaining intact the fundamental basis on which it rests. To the legislative body he merely expressed the hope that they would see in the recent modifications of the constitution a new proof of his confidence in their intelligence and patriotism. To the clergy he gave assurance that they might count on his protection and lively sympathy, telling them that they knew how to render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. This expression had given rise to the idea that a serious attempt is about to be made to settle terms for the evacuation of Rome.

ITALY.



A SPEECH FROM THE POPE.

On New-Year's day the Pope received General Guyon and French officers. General Guyon spoke of devotion toward the Pope, and the latter thanked Guyon for the sentiments expressed. The present French soldiers at Rome would not permit the fulfillment of any irreligious or impolitic act. The Pope concluded by bestowing the apostolic benediction on the imperial family, the Emperor Napoleon, and the whole French company.

SPAIN.

THE "SUMTER" AT CADIZ.

Mr. Adams, our Minister at London, under date of the 4th inst., writes to Collector Barney, of New York, that the Sumter had arrived at Cadiz, having burned three vessels.

ENCAMPMENT OF CAPTAIN PATTERSON'S CAVALRY SCOUTS, NEAR HANCOCK, MARYLAND.—[SKETCHED BY MR. W. W. CHARLES.]

CAVALRY PICKET AT HANCOCK, MARYLAND.

An attention has been lately directed to Hancock, Maryland, by the skirmishes which have recently taken place there between General Jackson, of the rebel army, and our General Lander, we publish on this page a picture of a CAVALRY PICKET at that point, from a sketch by a member of the picket. The artist writes:

Captain E. H. Patterson's Cavalry Scouts, raised in Pittsburg by Captain E. H. Patterson, has been for the last three months a prominent part of the advanced-guard of the Upper Potomac. Besides acquiring no mean proficiency in cavalry tactics and sabre exercise, they have done much good to the Union cause in picket duty at the principal fordings and crossings on the river between Williamsport and Hancock, in preventing the transmission of salt and other supplies to the rebels. They have also taken part in several brisk little skirmishes, among which are those at Sir John's Run and Cherry Run. In their scouting parties they have made several important arrests.

GENERAL KELLEY AND STAFF.

WE publish on this page an engraving of GENERAL KELLEY AND STAFF, from a drawing by Mr. Guril Bott. General Kelley is the gallant Virginian who was the first man in his State to raise a regiment of Union troops, and who was so gravely wounded at the very first battle in Western Virginia. He has since been promoted to a Brigadier-generalship, and has a command at or near Cumberland. Great things are expected of him, as he is known to be a man of remarkable energy and daring.

Lieut. W. B. Kelley. Capt. J. M. Mackenzie. Brig.-Gen. B. F. Kelley. Capt. B. F. Hawkes. B. Powell, Private Secretary. Capt. G. W. Harrison. Maj. John D. Frohinghiam.

WAR SCENES ON GREEN RIVER, KENTUCKY.—Sketched by Mr. Henry Mosler.—(See Page 70.)

OUR ARMY ON GREEN RIVER.

We devote page 69 to illustrations of our army on Green River, Kentucky, from sketches by our Kentucky correspondent, Mr. Henry Mosler. They need no description. Mr. Mosler says that he witnessed a very brisk skirmish with the rebels at the spot entitled "Guarding Fords." The pontoon bridge shown in the picture was built by Willich's German Regiment, Thirty-second Indiana. A letter to the Tribune from Munfordsville, dated 16th January, says:

The divisions of Generals M'Cook, Nelson, and Mitchell still occupy their old positions. In the course of this week mounted scouting parties of rebels appeared several times in sight of our outpost pickets, on the south bank of Green River. But as, since the attack on Willich's German Regiment by the Texan Rangers, our advance has been greatly strengthened, they kept at a safe distance.

The wooden substitute for the central portion of the iron railroad bridge over Green River, destroyed by the rebels some two months ago, was at last finished on Tuesday, and evening before last a locomotive made an experimental trip to the south bank. I had some misgivings as to the strength of the frail-looking trestle-work; but it promises to answer until something more durable can be put in its place. Railroad facilities to the south bank of Green River were a conditio sine qua non of a successful campaign in the southern part of the State, and an advance of our troops could not be thought of without them, in view of the general spoliation of the counties now under rebel control of every thing in the shape of food for man or beast, and the indispensable necessity of ready means of supplying the immense columns about moving on the enemy.

General Thomas's division, lately advanced from Lebanon to the vicinity of Columbia, in Adair County, has been more active than the troops still on the north side of Green River. Five regiments belonging to it, under command of Brigadier-General Boyle, marched on the day before yesterday, toward the Cumberland River—whether to cross and threaten the rear of Zollicoffer or merely to put a stop to rebel navigation from the north bank, I am unable to say. A small force from Thomas's division is also reported to have occupied Greensburg, in Green County, until lately held by a few hundred rebels.

From General Schoepff's brigade we hear that three regiments lately made a reconnoissance to the banks of the Cumberland, and ascertained the fact of the passage of several heavily loaded Nashville steamboats up the river with supplies of arms, ammunition, and provisions for Zollicoffer's command. The movement of General Boyle was undoubtedly made in consequence of this information. It was well known weeks ago to General Buell that the object of Zollicoffer's appearance in the Upper Cumberland Valley was to obtain control of the coal-mines in that region, which supply Nashville with fuel; and for the purpose of preventing the shipment of such on the river, Captain Prime was ordered by him to erect a small work on the north bank, near Somerset. Unfortunately, the Captain ventured to make his preliminary surveys without an escort, and was captured by the rebels. Since then nothing appears to have been done toward stopping the navigation of the river by the rebels until this week. A small battery will effectually do it.

The bridge over Green River—the most important of the preliminary work—being completed, the three divisions encamped about and near this village would probably have moved forward ere this were it not for the terrible condition to which this part of the State has been reduced by the almost uninterrupted rains of the last few days. The surface of the ground has been softened to the depth of several feet by the superabundance of water from above, and the roads and camps are almost fathomless. Movements afoot are fraught with indescribable discomfort. In front of every house and tent yawns an abyss of mud. On horseback alone progress can be made. Teams find it extremely laborious to pass in any direction. Military exercises had to be suspended during the continuance of the wet spell. The usual gloomy effect of rainy weather is visible upon every body's countenance. All look dull and melancholy, and pray for relief by frost or sun. The unavoidable confinement for days within the narrow walls of a tent is truly one of the sorriest features of military life, and your correspondent is most heartily tired of it. When it will please Providence to render an advance possible by an improvement of the roads, I can not, of course, divine, but trust that it will be before long.

ON THE KENTUCKY BORDER.

I.

"You've lived too long at the North, Maurice! You ought never to have left Old Kentucky!"

"Well, perhaps so. I might then have been a fellow of about six feet three (I should have grown at least five inches taller, of course), with my hair very badly in want of cutting, my teeth dyed of a good permanent yellow with tobacco, my pants thrust in my boot-tops, and my homespun suit rather out at elbows. I should be a crack shot at turkeys, deer, or 'possum, and count it a disgrace not to bring down a squirrel as dead as a hammer with the wind of my bullet. I should loaf about all day talking horse, with a whip under my arm and half a dozen dogs at my heels, or fighting cocks at Jones's tavern. At night I should chew myself sleepy by a wood fire, dream about euchre, and wake up crying out 'I'll go it alone!' as you did only last evening!"

The young man whose personal appearance and characteristics were thus described eyed his half-brother with an expression indicative of resentment at his raillery and incapacity to answer it in kind.

"You kin talk right peart, you kin, Maurice!" he said; "on'y I wouldn't wake snakes, if I were you. It don't take much to raise a fight out here, you know."

Maurice Byrne laughed. "I don't want a fight with you, Dan," he said; "you'll get enough of that, if you're going to volunteer, which I should be sorry to see."

"Well I am, then, and Andy too; the game's made up, and there's no backing down about it!"

"Don't take the boy, Dan, whatever you do yourself. His father would rather see him dead than fighting against the Union; besides, he's too young."

"He kin knock the head off a turkey at a hundred yards, and I reckon that's further than any of Linc'ln's nigger-stealin' abolishioners 'll like to come within sight of a Kentuck rifle!"

"Dan! Dan! why will you talk such nonsense? The abolitionists, as you call them, haven't set foot in our soil, though we, under the treacherous pretext of neutrality, are organizing a 'State Guard' which, as every body knows, is Secesh to the backbone. Don't you see that invasion is threatened only from the other side?"

"The Tennessee men are our friends, and fightin' for Southern rights. You can't rub that out, no way you kin fix it! And me and Andy are bound to join them!"

"I'm sorry to hear it. What would you say to me if I were to join the Union men?"

"But you won't?" And Dan Byrne looked equally surprised, puzzled, and indignant.

"I don't know. If I acted on my convictions, I should. I was captain of a company in Illinois, and they'd be glad to get me back again, I've no doubt. Only I wouldn't like to have to fight against Kentuckians any how."

"Or to leave Harry!" added his half-brother, knowingly. The name, we may remark, notwithstanding its masculinity, designated a girl of eighteen, cousin to the speakers; nor was it used as an abbreviation. In accordance with a practice not at all uncommon half a century ago, nor yet extinct among the rougher denizens of Kentucky and Tennessee, it had been bestowed in jocular defiance of the trammels of custom, as were not unfrequently those of women upon infants of the opposite sex.

Maurice took the remark in good part. "Well, yes," said he; "you don't object to that, Dan, do you?"

"No! I wish you'd jes' marry the gal, and settle right down among us, as you might do for all I kin see to prevent it; for she's as good a Union woman as any out of jail, let the next come from where she will."

"That's so, Dan Byrne; and she's not ashamed of it either!" And the person alluded to unexpectedly looked forth from the window on to the wooden piazza, the scene of the preceding dialogue. She was a brilliant brunette, with magnificent black hair and eyes, ripe scarlet lips, and a face whose bold, symmetrical beauty of feature and ruddy health seemed in part to justify her masculine appellation. Not too neatly dressed, with her fell of tangled curls put back behind her ears; her bare, brown, handsome arms crossed on the window-sill, and a half-resentful blush upon her cheeks at what she had overheard, she stood regarding the cousin who had spoken of her with friendly defiance.

He laughed, and affectionately tried to twitch her by the ear. "I'm right, Harry, ain't I?" he said; "you'd stop me and Andy going if you could—wouldn't you?"

"Father would, if he were here," she answered, emphatically.

"I have been trying to persuade Dan not to take him," put in Maurice, in whose cheek an answering flush of emotion had welcomed Harry's appearance. "The lad is altogether too young for it. Think of uncle's anger and distress if he comes to any mischief."

"He kin take care of himself; and if he can't, I'll take care of him," said the intended volunteer, doggedly; "and he will go!"

"Can't you stop him? I have tried my best, and the boy really seems bent on it," appealed Maurice to Harry, who, twisting one of her long tangled curls very much as an impatient or meditative man might his mustache, looked from one to the other, in sympathy with Maurice and anger at Dan, blended with apprehension for her younger brother. "Both had better remain at home, I am sure; and I'd give every thing I have in the world to keep them there. At least let us save the boy, who will join this infernal rebellion—don't scowl, Dan, for it is a rebellion, and nothing else, as sure as you live—without a thought of the consequences."

"That for consequences!" cried Dan Byrne, with an emphatic expectoration of tobacco-juice.

"You want Andy killed, then?" inquired Harry, with exasperated affection.

"I'd rather be killed myself, and you know it."

"I don't! If you cared for him, as you say, you'd never tempt him away from us—for it's all your doing! Father is against it, and Maurice is against it, and I am against it; yet, because he's a boy, and knows no better, and has got his head full of nonsense about Southern rights, and Yankees, and invasion, and Heaven knows what—as all the boys around here have—you'll take him with you!"

"Listen to me once more, Dan," interposed Maurice, checking a choleric reply on the part of his cousin; "you are going to take up arms against your country in entire misconception of the state of things. If it comes to a fight here—which God forbid!—it won't be with Yankees, but Kentuckians against Kentuckians. Our State has voted herself neutral, because there was then no alternative between that and secession. We had traitors for rulers, and loyal men could only temporize to gain time. But Kentucky is for the Union at heart; I'm sure of it. Wasn't I up at Louisville only a week ago, and don't I know what's brewing there? Here, on the borders, secesh is rampant enough, but it don't amount to any thing compared with the love for and loyalty to the Union which Harry Clay—God bless him!—taught us long ago. I wish we had all learned the lesson."

"I don't believe it!" shouted Dan Byrne, enraged at the statement, and at what he considered merely as his lack of argumentative ability to confute it; "we b'long to the South, don't we? and when she's in for a fight—for her rights by ——! for her rights!—hain't we to be counted in? or are we to stan' roun' shivering in our boots like a lot of corn-shucking souled Yankees? You are bound to get me mad, Maurice, so you are, though I cautioned you not to!"

"Ira furor brevis est!" quoted his cousin, who had "taught school" in Illinois among other miscellaneous employments, at which the irascible Dan sniffed and spat; "let there be peace between us; and if you are determined to go, don't take Andy."

"You kin both talk with him if you like; I han't persuaded him!" And the tall volunteer—he was a fine, though rough-looking fellow of three-and-twenty, Maurice's junior by five years—took his rifle from its corner behind the door, whistled to his dogs, and departed, his homely-attired but manly figure soon disappearing among the luxuriant summer foliage of the wild Kentucky woodland which surrounded the house. Maurice watched it until he was out of sight, and then turned to Harry, who, quitting her post at the window, emerged on the piazza. Tall in stature, like her race, her proportions were yet so exquisitely symmetrical, even in their dress of blue homespun, that she could not appear otherwise than strikingly handsome, and might have sat for a model for Spenser's Britomart or Tasso's Clorinda. I have said that her arms were bare and brown: if her feet were also, their beauty and that of her ankles made their nudity a matter of congratulation to the masculine spectator. The only looker-on at present, however, had his eyes bent on her face, in which frank regard for him and concern for her brother were equally manifest.

"Harry, dear," Maurice said, taking her hand, "I can't tell you how this persistence of Dan's pains me; I don't wonder at his opinions, recollecting what I was before I left home, only because I aspired to better the rough fortune into which our family has decayed, and to win her whom I loved almost as a boy—whom I find increased in beauty, yet possessing the same brave, earnest nature as ever. Loving her as I do, I would fain save her brother from this miserable rebellion if I can not rescue my own. Is there no way to effect it?"

"If father were at home he would soon stop Andy's going. They both know that. I am afraid Dan will hurry him off before father's return."

"And I too. But you know what took him away at such a time?"

"He didn't tell me, though I have my suspicions. You know, Maurice, of course?"

"I do. He went to procure arms that we may be able to defend ourselves against traitors when the evil day comes. He is as loyal as he is brave, and swears that the dear old flag he fought under at New Orleans shall be hoisted over this house never to be hauled down by rebel hands while he lives to protect it. In that resolution I am with him heart and soul, failing to persuade him to remove to a place of safety. Only on his and your account do I linger here, otherwise I should be doing a man's duty in defense of the Union now."

"Never let that prevent you. If I were a man I'd shoulder a musket beside you!"

II.

Three months have proved the correctness of Maurice Byrne's judgment, and the Kentucky border, subjected to all the horrors and miseries of a devastating civil war by invasion from the South, seems again deserving of its ancient ominous title, "the dark and bloody ground." I resume my story toward the close of the latter part of September, when the wild woods of that wild part of the State are in all their autumnal glory, and when the hot noontide sun shines down in unclouded splendor on their leafy loveliness, lighting up the "fall fashions" of the hamadryads—their purples, reds, oranges, yellows, their necklaces of ruby sumach berries—like a veritable fairy orchard. A pity that men's evil passions should be there to desecrate it!

There is no more wind than cloud stirring in the bright blue sky, otherwise the flag surmounting the time-stained homestead of old Jasper Byrne would not hang so straight and heavily as it does. Every day since the State election in August (when Kentucky, with its "State Guard" in full operation, its power in the hands of traitors, with rebellious Virginia, Tennessee, and the worst part of Missouri inclosing her borders, yet chose, deliberately and unconditionally, to adhere to and share the fate of the Union), every day, at sunrise, has the flag been hoisted by a hand that once pulled a deadly trigger on a certain memorable Eighth of January, to be lowered only at sunset. It is the only flag of its kind within a score of miles on the soil of Kentucky; there are bastard, hostile ones all around, yet up to the present time it has flouted and defied them.

To this house, then, at noontide, on an autumn day, comes riding through the woods, over the stony road, the gaunt, wasted, cadaverous figure of a young man on a sorry hack of a horse, which has evidently traveled far, fared miserably, and been used unscrupulously. But miserable as is the aspect of the animal, that of its rider far exceeds it in wretchedness. Clad in a tattered, semi-military costume, stained with mire and dust, with an empty coat-sleeve pinned to his breast, a blood-stained rag binding his brow, surmounted by a torn hat, haggard, hollow-eyed, emaciated, unshorn, unshaven, faint with wounds and exhausted with hunger and lack of sleep, so returned Dan Byrne to the family homestead.

Its appearance is unlike the careless, open-doored, open-windowed aspect familiar to him, and at once suggestive of the insecurity of the times and the resolution of its owner. Two or three trees in front have been cut down, probably as a precaution against their affording shelter to enemies; the door is shut, and the windows of the upper and lower stories are defended with strong planks, nailed perpendicularly, with interstices of the width of a rifle-barrel between them. Except a couple of dogs, sleeping under the sunny piazza, nothing living is visible. These, awakened by the arrival, come frisking about the horse's heels barking a clamorous recognition.

The rider dismounts, hesitates, and adds his voice to the din. Not, however, until he has beaten repeatedly upon the door is any reply vouchsafed. Then a footstep approaches from within, and a stern voice questions him as to his name and purpose.

"It's me, uncle! your nephew, Dan Byrne."

A surprised ejaculation from a woman follows, and an indistinctly-heard colloquy. And again the stern voice addresses him, this time in deeper tones than before:

"Go your ways, young man! You were my nephew, and are a rebel! What have you done with my son?"

"Open, uncle, and I will tell you." And the applicant covered his face with his one hand, shuddered all over, and leaned against the door-post as if to preserve himself from fainting. The dogs, meanwhile, caper and whine around him, some of them scratching at the portal as though seconding the wretched young man's request for admission.

Another whispered dialogue occurs—the woman's voice being heard in supplication—a heavy wooden bar is removed, and the door opens. A tall, resolute-featured man of seventy-five, with iron-gray hair, appears on the threshold, and behind him the handsome, anxious countenance of Harry Byrne.

"Dan!" "Harry!" "Uncle, he's wounded—dying!" With these and similar expressions of pity and sympathy the sufferer is borne into the house, and the old man, after a wary glance outside, sets the door open, permitting the sunlight to stream into the darkened passage between the two main rooms of the ground-floor. Here, on a rough settle, the returned rebel volunteer addresses his anxious listeners.

"Uncle," he says, "you kin take and shoot me just as soon as you've heard what I've got to tell. You'll never see Andy again—he's dead and buried!"

His cousin clasped her hands over her breast as if to check the violent pulsations of her heart, and then hiding her face, wept aloud with all her impulsive woman's nature. Old Jasper Byrne grew deadly pale, turned aside, and, with his head against the wall, strove to hide his emotion. There was a miserable pause, broken only by the sobbing of Harry. At last her uncle spoke in a hoarse, constrained voice, curiously interrupted by a sort of tremulous quaver, inexpressibly painful to listen to:

"It's better as it is," he said; "he was my only boy and I loved him, God knows! but he turned traitor and fout agin his country—and I named him arter Jackson, too! Ah! I'm glad the old woman never lived to see this day! Dan! Dan'l! the lad's blood cries out aginst you!"

"God forgive me if I've done wrong! I lost this arm tryin' to save him!"

"Tell us all about it. Harry, girl! quit cryin'. 'Tain't of no use. 'Twon't bring back the dead or wipe out shame from the living, else you might cry on, for there's a heavy score of it come on our family. Let us hear the whole story."

It may be condensed into a paragraph. Young Andrew Byrne had met his fate in one of the many bloody fratricidal skirmishes following the invasion of Kentucky from the South, being bayoneted in a night-surprise on the part of the loyalists. His cousin, wounded, mutilated, and a prisoner, had contrived to escape and to rejoin the Tennessee regiment which both cousins had belonged to. It was now defeated, dispersed, broken, retreating in scattering handfuls toward the border. Anticipating the arrival of one of these, Dan had hurried on to tell his doleful story, to warn his uncle of the coming danger, and to afford him what protection might accrue from his presence.

"They'll be h'yar before sun-down, I reckon," he concluded. "Uncle, if you don't want to risk the house being burned over your head, you'd better haul that flag down, if but for an hour or two."

The old soldier folded his arms, knitted his brows, and smiled grimly. He was yet tremulous with suppressed grief at the tidings of his son's death, but the prospect of immediate danger seemed to relieve him. "I'll see them —— first!" said he, with energy sufficient to place his determination beyond the reach of entreaty or argument. "They've took my boy; they've got him killed in the wickedest cause that ever man shouldered a rifle for; now let 'em come and receive a father's thanks. I wish Maurice was here now."

"I hearn tell of his joinin' the abolition—the Federalists," Dan remarked. "I'm glad we didn't have to fight agin his regiment."

His uncle made no reply. He was pacing with long strides up and down the passage, nervously, expectantly. Presently he paused, and addressed Harry:

"Gal," he said, "tell Pete to hitch up the old mare and wagon, and do you clear out to Brodnax's—I reckon you'll be safe enough thar. And you may jist tell him—"

But Harry, in her turn, folded her arms with a look of resolution not inferior to that expressed in the countenance of her father.

"I'm going to stop with you," she said, briefly.

"You're better away; it's no woman's work we've got on hand, and I can't be scared with the thought of what these devils may do to you, supposin' I aren't able to beat 'em off, as I intend tryin'! Likely they'll burn the shanty down, as Dan says, and you've got too many fair years of life before you, gal, to die like that. Go away! take my blessing and go away, where you'll be out of danger!"

"I shall stop with you, father; I can load your rifle for you, if I can do nothing else. Don't ask me to leave you now, for I won't do it!"

He looked into her eyes, read there her determination and love stronger than death or the fear of it, bent over and kissed her, and abruptly turned away. "You're true grit, gal!" he murmured. "Now then, let's git ready to receive 'em."

III.

Sunset has come and gone, and darkness rests upon the wild Kentucky woods, shrouding their autumnal glories until the birth of a new day. It is a black, moonless night, threatening rain, and a strong wind has arisen, making melancholy music among the boughs and branches of the forest, driving its foliage fiercely in one direction, as if in emulation of the great wet-looking clouds which are moving rapidly and continuously athwart the face of the heavens. No sound but that of the wind and the occasional startled cry of an owl is audible, the more harmonious night-birds and forest creatures have sought covert in anticipation of the coming storm. And within the house of Jasper Byrne its inmates prepare to meet the scarcely less unreasonable and more harmful tempest of man's passions.

The old soldier has sent away the two negroes forming part of his household, bidding them secure their safety by flight, and in consequence obtained an unexpected auxiliary in the neighbor to whose dwelling he had proposed sending his daughter. Alarmed at the report of the slaves, Dave Brodnax comes to remonstrate with his ancient comrade, hoping to dissuade him from his rash, perhaps suicidal intention, but failing utterly, resolves, with characteristic Kentucky daring and hardihood, to remain and share his fate. He brings confused reports confirming Dan Byrne's representations. A roving band of defeated Tennesseeans will, in all probability, pass by the homestead. There remains only the hope that their haste may prove greater than their inclination for mischief and desire for wreaking vengeance upon the isolated home of a known loyalist, or that Dan's services, wounds, and mutilation may purchase his uncle's safety, of which he himself is not too sanguine.

Slowly and heavily the night drawn on, as, in an upper room, the four inmates of the house wait and listen. Mattresses are placed between the windows, the doors are barricaded and ready, and Harry, with a pale, resolute face, is temporarily relieving Dan in the task of casting bullets. The two old friends converse together earnestly. Dan, perturbed and expectant, walks to and fro, or nursing himself, assumes a calmness which any transient sound discomposes.

"If it comes to the worst we kin clear out down the slope at the back of the house, " says Brodnax; "or if I reckon they won't risk their necks in attacking us that-a-way. Then there's the corn not yet cuts off"—alluding to one of those natural excavations, popularly known in Western vernacular as "slash-holes," which underline all the mountains of Kentucky—"would hold a hundred of us easy."

"I've thought of that," Byrne answers, "and there's a bottle handy to its mouth. But, mind, I intend to fight this place just as long as I kin hold it."

"Sartain!" replied his comrade, who in ceasing to combat the other's resolution seemed to have adopted his views; "but let his enemies, for the expected fight; "have you left the flag flying?"

"It's that still. I wish there was a moon that they could see it."

"Well, I don't care so much about that; if they take the 'Union and Bars' it's all the same. You won't open the ball unless they begin it, reckon?"

"No!" answered Jasper Byrne, relapsing into silence, in which the party remained for perhaps ten minutes, listening to the stormy moan of the wind in the forest.

"Come to the door; we shall have plenty of time to fix it and get back," suggests Brodnax. And the two men descend the stairs, unfasten the door, and look out from the shelter of the little piazza into the night and the wild landscape.

Another pause, and a long one. Then through the lamentation and soughing of the wind, the rustling of the leaves, and now the patter of the angry rain, a sound, at first faint and distant, grows in fulfilling, a deep, sullow murmur. Anon only the wind and rain. Then the murmur, increasing or lessening with the atmospheric currents in the windings of the road. Presently an unmistakable sound, resolving itself into the scrambling, disorderly approach of a body of men.

"At last!" The two old soldiers draw back into the house, and close down to their companions the door which Dan Byrne stands before them.

"Let me go out, uncle!" he says; "I shall be of more use there than within."

"Stay where you are!" is the answer, blended with demands for light and refreshments. Then, more vocally spirits are about to enforce by a rush toward the house, when Dan raises his voice in vigorous remonstrance:

"Boys!" he cries, "you know me as your comrade, and that I bet this arm in fighting for the Old era Right, and that I wouldn't have cared if it had ben my life. Now, I ask you in return jest to keep right and straight on, without turning to the right. It belongs to my uncle, and he's an old man, and I don't want him troubled. He only son gal left him on our side is the skrimage up in Virginia, and he wants to be let alone."

There was a confused clamor of voices, some in approval, some in dissent. Then a voice shouted, "We've heard of him! he's a d—d Unionist! Yankee, and that's what he is! Let's have it down, boys!" A partial hurrah followed.

"I know you, Mat Cooper," cries Dan, bitterly, to the direction of the last speaker; "the biggest coward in the regiment! Come here, and for all I've got but one arm I'll lick you, and do it easy!"

Some of the Tennesseeans set up a laugh at this, and for a moment the young Kentuckian thought he had prevailed. Only for a moment: in another he found himself hustled to and fro, not in fun, as on sport, half in earnest, and heard four or five of the party, who had ascended the house, knocking at the door and clamoring for admission and speech with the inmates. Very soon, in reply, an upper window was raised behind the planking, and the strong stern voice of old Jasper Byrne demanded the cause of the tumult.

"Give us some whisky!" "Let us in!" "Have down that ——— ——— flag!" These and more confused outcries were the answers of the crowd in front of the house, while the men immediately below continued their clamor.

"Go to him who sent you hither, the father of all evil!" said the Kentuckian; "not one of ye shall set foot over my threshold while I have power to prevent it, pack of rebels that ye are!"

"Beat down the door!" "Set fire to the house!" And the blows of musket-butts began to rain on the portal, mingled with execrations and bloody threats. Dan Byrne meanwhile was furnishing with those about him; but his struggles were useless, his voice unheard amidst the uproar.

"Hear me once more," his uncle shouted; and the tumult slackened, the besiegers probably anticipating some unthinkable surrender or compromise with their demands. "You have murdered my boy, now clear out before I am tempted to revenge him on you all!"

Almost as he spoke a pistol-shot was fired at him, followed by a rattling volley or explosion of Tennessee muskets in the same direction. The sharp crack of a rifle answered this—another—and two of the foremost of the crowd fell, the rest fled, leaving mortally wounded.

Then spoke a wild shout of rage and desire for vengeance, and several persons before two unsubstantious and equally fatal discharges sent their leaden messengers of destruction through the door or brain of others; and scatter as their comrades might, in temporary panic from that group which afforded so easy a mark, in an air as practical marksmen within, yet a fifth and a sixth victim was added to the list before they gained cover in which to gnash their teeth and concert measures of reprisal. Even there, wherever the gleam of a torch or lantern indicated their presence, no one felt safe from the bullets that always unsuccessfully.

"Only the rain," suggested Brodnax, whose sense of hearing was yet as acute as that of his companions. The storm had increased and the rain now descended in torrents.

"I wish it would," answered Byrne; "that's on our side, but I reckon those who are coming won't be so. You have any bullets left?"

"I think a sound in the distance, but can not distinguish what it is," Harry replied. Steadfast and unshaken as ever, he had continued at the task of loading their rifles for them throughout the attack, not even blenching when a chance bullet entered the window, and passing close through his bright black foil of hair—the only shot which had penetrated the apartment.

"It's horses and men coming this way," pronounced her father; "we shall soon know what for. Hist!—you, Harry, and you, Dan, get to the rear with your rifles, and be ready to fire, the moment I give the word. Don't waste your shots, but aim low."

Just at the minutes of the house stood listening to the devilish intentions avowed within a few feet of them, the party gathered for the second expedition, a sudden fall was heard, as of a man stricken to the ground, followed by the quick, harsh sounder of the halloo of the intended hostess, and Dan Byrne's voice, crying,

"You shall not fire! Come on, all of you, cowards that you are, and see if I can't use this bowie to some effect, naimed as I am! Come on, I say!"

A storm of invectives, of threats, and orders to stand aside succeeded this outcry. "Fire! whole I live!" the young Kentuckian rejoined, in tones well-nigh as savage as those about him, and the shaded outside light revealed the face of his old comrade, then at his daughter.

"Thar! I knew that the lad in five minutes, the bloody-dirty hounds! They will, I know, unless we help him. He brought it on us; but he knew not, neither has he cause to die for us. Dave! Dave! what shall I do? Think of Harry, if they prove too many for us!"

"Open the door, father!" the girl replied; "save Dan if you can! We're in God's hands, and to Him we commend them!" Then, as the means of rescue, she rushed to the door and began undoing its fastenings.

Jasper Byrne laid his hand on her arm. "Leave it to us," said he. "Do you go up stairs. Wait you not here, but keep a look-out from above. If there's nothing left for it, mind my last word and do—you know how."

Shuddering at a gun, the girl obeyed him without a word. Then with bowie-knives between their teeth, and revolvers in the two old soldiers' hands, about the fastenings of the door.

They were just in time. The Tennesseean, infuriated by the disappointment of his late comrade, had attacked and beaten him to his knee, in which position he still defended himself desperately, having already slain one and wounded two men. As the door opened—which it did so suddenly as to be entirely unanticipated by the besiegers—a cry was raised to train him, to trample him to death. Quick as the utterance he was snatched from between the infuriated musket-butts and dragged into the house by the strong arm of his uncle, while fourteen assailants rushed in, in the act to refasten the door. The lumber piled against it had fallen inward.

With yells of rage and exultation the Tennesseeans rushed forward to improve their fancied opportunity. They were met by so deadly and rapid a discharge of revolvers that seven of their number bit the dust, and the rest wavered and might have retreated but for the fierce rear pressing on them. So on they came tumultuously, thirsting for blood and bowling like so many fiends. Then the portal and passage became the scene of a conflict I want words to do justice to.

Desperately, fiercely, and desperately, fighting inch by inch, did the three Kentuckians—for Dan Byrne soon sprang to his feet and repaid his relative's assistance—make use of sword and pistol as ever one-armed man achieved—contest the ground, and defend slippery steps to the last. Below, in the narrow passage was sulphurous with smoke, resonant with oath and death-shriek, gluttery with human sacrifice. Step by inch the brave defenders of hearth and home are borne backward, wounded men succeeding to the foot of the staircase—even the upper portion of which has more than once come sudden destruction to the enemy in the shape of a mankind-shell, which are overcome only by numbers, and fight apparently with no hope but that of selling their lives as dearly as possible—

When a tumult arises without, the stamp of horses' feet, cries of alarm, a volley of musketshots, and, clear above the storm which has unsealed the approach of the new-comers, a ringing cheer for the Union, loaded with, "Here are the Kentuckians!" Few had themselves suddenly attacked in the rear by the troop of loyal Kentuckians from which they had fled in defeat and disgrace only that morning.

It were needless to protract our story by the relation of the particulars of the conflict. It was short, fierce, and decisive. Before the rising sun next day the majority of the rebels, the dispersion and flight of the remainders. When Captain Maurice Byrne reached the house the parties, wiping his ensanguined sword upon his horse's mane, it was to congratulate the veteran on his timely victory and rescued from death, and to embrace her whom he loved dearer than life itself, and, in due time, to receive at once the reward of his love and loyalty.

THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

On page 72 we publish, from a sketch by our Eastern correspondent, Mr. Alexander Simplot, a view of the departure from Cairo of the advance of the great Mississippi Expedition under General M'Clernand. The World correspondent writes:

The expedition consists of a brigade, consisting of about 5000 men, under General M'Clernand, which embarked on board transport steamers on Thursday and Friday, and started down the river as the river-news broke out. It is called, from the name of its chief, the First Division of the Army of the Mississippi. It is the first of the Mississippi, at Mayfield creek, five miles below Fort Holt, and the first to start down the river. It has had little else than the steamer, the Rob Roy, to herself during the past few days, as no further room for the encampment of its 5000 persons was to be found on the steamers already in stream, leaving the Confederates in their strong-hold. The mouth of the Mayfield creek has been seen on the opposite bank from Columbus, and this reconnoissance was but a natural disposition of the brigade. The object was the meeting of the movement down the river. The officers at Columbus had discovered that the projected movement down the river. This pushing down of troops five miles nearer their base was enough to make them feel very uneasy.

A special dispatch to the Chicago Times, dated twelve miles from Columbus on the 10th inst., says that Commodore Foote, with General Grant and staff, left Cairo yesterday at 10 o'clock, and overtook M'Clernand's, Paine's, and Cook's column-steamers in the afternoon.

The following order in relation to the expedition has been issued by General Grant:

HEAD-QUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF CAIRO, CAIRO, ILLINOIS, January 9, 1862.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 5.

During the absence of the expedition now starting, upon all batteries established almost solely by the rebel army, and when it is deemed necessary to the safety of the troops, the following orders will be observed:

No communication will be kept in the mails, company officers being held strictly accountable for all stragglers from their companies. They will be left behind at no point or on the march not strictly required in the performance of duty. Where it is camp, no permits will be given by officers or soldiers to leave their regimental grounds, and no citizens will be permitted to come into camp without strictly pointed.

Regiments having been brought upon our borders solely by the foul conduct of some of their commanders in firing upon unarmed citizens and flags of truce through territory occupied by secessionists, and the encouragement of treasonable acts and sympathizers with the cause of wanton destruction of private property, the general commanding deems it due to the service to make a change in this respect. Interpreting confidence into cowardice, and leniency into fear, officers and men have in numerous instances in exact proportion to the degree of kindness and courtesy and respect manifested by many who, from opposite treatment, would become friends, have proved themselves enemies. To the end that the severest punishment be inflicted upon every soldier who is guilty of taking or destroying private property, and any commissioned officer guilty of like conduct, or of countenancing it, shall be deprived of his sword and expelled from the camp, not to be permitted to return.

On the march every straggler guilty will be well punished by the provost-guard. Cases of infamy will be reported to the War Department, to be dishonorably dismissed from the service.

It will be the duty of all company commanders to see that the foregoing orders are called immediately upon going into camp each day, and every night before dark.

By order,

U. S. GRANT,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

THE "PENSACOLA" AT SEA.

On page 76 we illustrate the STEAMER "PENSACOLA" PASSING THE REBEL BATTERIES on the Potomac on her way to sea. The Herald correspondent thus describes the passage:

Yesterday morning, 11th, the Pensacola left Alexandria at half past seven o'clock, and immediately proceeded down the river, escorted by the tug-boat Pratt. A large crowd of spectators assembled on the wharves, and on the roofs and on the adjoining buildings, to get a last glimpse of the noble vessel that has been so long expected, and is now so much as possible, which deprived her mantle of their usual attention, and every sundry collected her hat and tongues upon giving them a stumpy appearance. On arriving at Fairfax Seminary, the Pensacola was brought to an anchor, to await the time of her departure under cover of darkness.

I accompanied Captain Gremley, of the Stepping Stone, on board the Pensacola. Every thing was prepared for an imperial entertainment; the deck was scrubbed, mattresses, and hangdies provided, and upon the carriage of each gun were a couple of bottles of wine and a box of cigars.

At half past three o'clock we all went on board the Pensacola were roused up by the officer of the deck, who ordered all hands to quarters, announcing that the Pensacola was coming down. There was no piping nor calling to quarters, as it would have been heard on the Virginia shore, but the men quietly turned out. Soon a black object was seen moving between the lights of the opposite shore, which obscured the moon and stars, and every thing was hushed in silence. The object proved to be the Pensacola, which moved silently and majestically within a few hundred yards. Captain Gremley, hailing the Pensacola, ordered a light to be hoisted. This was done on our mast-head. A second light hung run up within a few feet of the truck. All hands were now at their quarters. The anxious watch was enjoined, and every thing was in readiness to weigh anchor, should the Pensacola refuse. The precaution was purposes. It guided the Pensacola in taking her bearings, while it deceived the rebels, who supposed it to be a Vessel for the Pensacola; and while the latter vessel was slowly steaming past the batteries at Cockpit Point they were awaiting her coming. A light is now seen gleaming from Cockpit Point. It is answered from the mast, so as to warn Freestone Point and intermediate places. These are the only batteries between Alexandria and the Potomac. The lights occasionally disappear, as if the vessel were turning. Soon the bow is now fine on block, and not a shot has been fired, for it is probable that the rebels would be allowed to pass unmolested, the rebel still deceived by our ruse. At length the Pensacola is seen to be under the fire the most formidable of the batteries at Cockpit Point, that being Mud-creek point. Cook will not forget Mud-creek point. The guns are a flash, followed, after a few seconds, by the roar of the guns. Soon from the other batteries opening, throwing their shells at long intervals, but the Pensacola does not reply. Seventeen shots are fired, when a more vivid gleam of yellow flame than any seen before issues from Mud-creek point. It is the Pensacola's long-awaited gun. It is the enemy's signal of distress. The Pensacola has passed the batteries.

The secret of the escape of the Pensacola is thus revealed in a letter from one of her officers to the Herald correspondent:

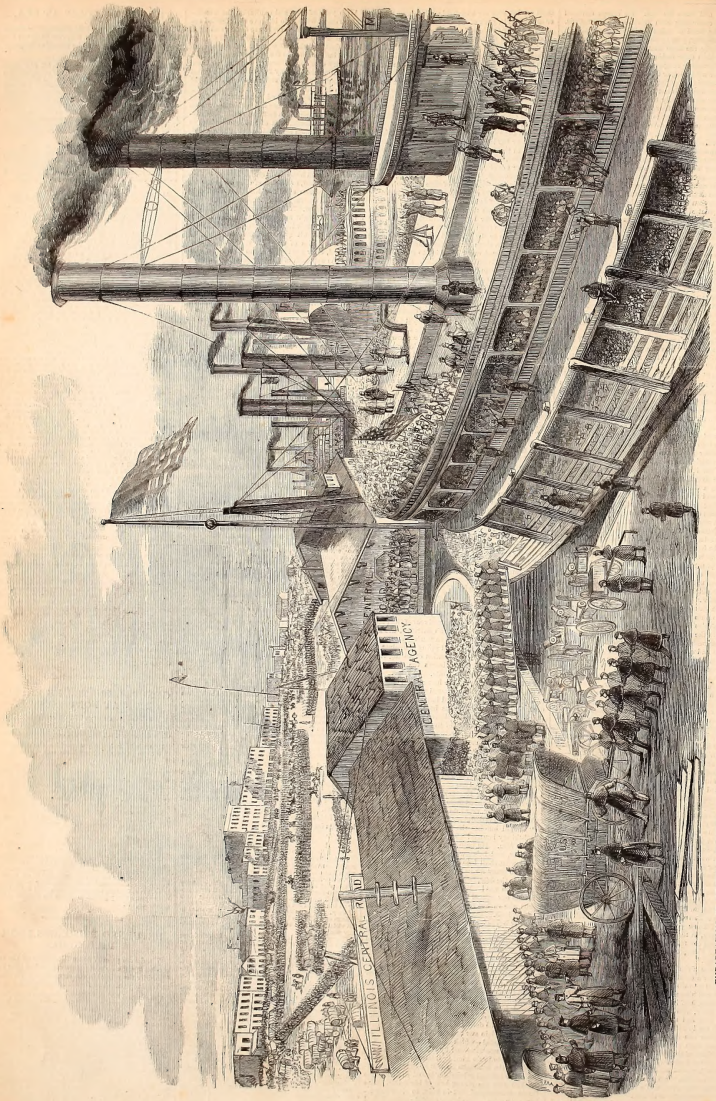
The first shot and shell flew through the rigging and around the lower mast-heads and lower yards. Shortly this, we knew that the hull of the good ship was safe; for unless we fired high our masts and rigging would soon be rectified. It was a severe trial for officers and men to stand with grim silence upon their quarters, and not to fire a reply. There never was a ship in better trim for a fight, or more deliberately governed, than the Pensacola. Every man at the moment of the action was ready to be crippled in the Potomac at any price, and to have died rather than surrendered, or even retreated, where we shell would to throw away in darkness.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S EXPEDITION AT FORT MONROE.

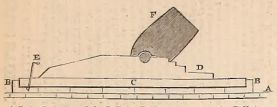
We illustrate a portion of the BURNSIDE EXPEDITION as it appeared off Fort Monroe on the eve of its departure. The Herald correspondent said:

Hampton Roads has only exhibited one such spectacle since the one presented at present, and that was during the Crimean war, when October, 1854, the combined fleets of Royal armada congregated here. The scene presented by the numerous vessels of various classes at present is most amazing. During the evening of yesterday all the vessels were illuminated, and the decorations and numerous bands with the regiments on the vessels was most striking and beautiful. The Rhode Island regiment of the Burnside silvery moon added additional splendor to the occasion.



Long after midnight was heard the inspiring strains of the Tenth Regiment New York Volunteers (Duryee's Zouaves), and there were also occasional strains through the "still night." A sail in the bay with the thermometer at sixty degrees, is a pleasure which can not be enjoyed in the month of January north of Dixie's land."

Our neighbors, the rebels, are not of course on the qui vive, and it must have been galling to them to listen to the deafening roar of Burnside's and Goldsmith's guns, and the constantly performing national airs on board of the vessels. The rebels must have thought that the Yankees were celebrating as it is at the fort, and already has a rebel flag of truce been sent to the Monroe pretext to opt out the strength of the expedition, etc.



RETURNED PRISONERS FROM RICHMOND.

We devote page 77 to an illustration of the recent exchange of prisoners between which has just been released by the rebels) in the camp of their division at Washington. The Herald correspondent says:

The returned prisoners but five prisoners belonging to the New York file regiment, numbering thirty-two, visited their former quarters, and were invited to dine with their comrades and furlough, and were invited. The scene was a touching portrait of a beautiful picture. Long-lost five months in the one, to the men and the hands of their more fortunate rebel prison ground, were welcomed home. Many of the fellow-soldiers dinners were present, and in the speeches officers of the regiment, and in the speeches which followed the happy occasion allusions were made in feeling terms to the absent ones. Many a tear was shed, and many a one to the memory of those of the regiment who died in their captivity, and whose remains the returned prisoners will be supply provided for in the camp.

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER LXXII.

I turned back alone. The sun was reddening the summits of the distant mountain range, but dark clouds, that portended rain, were gathering behind my way and deepening the shadows in many a chasm and hollow which volcanic fires had wrought on the surface of uplands undulating like diluvian billows fixed into stone in the midst of their stormy swell. I wandered on, and away from the beaten track, absorbed in thought. Could I acknowledge in Julius Faber's conjectures any bases for logical ratiocination? or were they not the ingenious fancies of that empirical Philosophy of Sentiment by which the aged, in the decline of severer faculties, sometimes assimilate their theories to the hazy romance of youth? I can well conceive that the story I tell will be regarded by most as a wild and fantastic fable; that by some it may be considered a vehicle for guesses at various riddles of Nature, without or within us, which are free to the license of romance, though forbidden to the caution of science. But I—I—know unmistakably my own identity, my own positive place in a substantial universe. And beyond that knowledge what do I know? Yet was not Faber so far right in his startling parallels, that my favorite Hume, on whose skepticism I had built my whole philosophical system, and by whose reasonings I had drilled all the raw early ideas which my youth had enlisted for bold conquests of truth, did, in fact, resolve my identity, the one conscious indivisible ME, into a bundle of memories derived from the senses, and reduced into a phantom, as spectral as that of the Luminous Shadow, the whole solid frame of creation?

While pondering these questions, the storm, whose forewarnings I had neglected to heed, burst forth with all the suddenness peculiar to the Australian climes. The rains descended like the rushing of floods. In the beds of water-courses, which at noon seemed dried up and exhausted, the torrents began to swell and to rave; the gray crags around them were animated into living waterfalls. I looked round, and the landscape was as changed as a scene that replaces a scene on the player's stage. I was aware that I had wandered far from my home, and I knew not what direction I should take to regain it. Close at hand, and raised above the torrents that now rushed in many a gully and tributary creek around and before me, the mouth of a deep cave, overgrown with bushes and creeping flowers tossed wildly to and fro between the rain from above and the spray of cascades below, offered a shelter from the storm. I entered, scaring innumerable flocks of bats striking against me, blinded by the glare of the lightning that followed me into the cavern, and hastening to resettle themselves on the pendents of stalactites, or the jagged buttresses of primeval wall.

From time to time the lightning darted into the gloom and lingered among its shadows, and I saw, by the flash, that the floors on which I stood were strewed with strange bones, some among them the fossilized relics of races destroyed by the Deluge. The rain continued for more than two hours with unabated violence; then it ceased almost as suddenly as it had come on. And the lustrous moon of Australia burst from the clouds, shining, bright as an English dawn, into the hollows of the cave. And then simultaneously arose all the choral songs of the wilderness—creatures whose voices are heard at night, the loud whirr of the locusts, the musical boom of the bull-frog, the cuckoo note of the morepork, and, mournful amidst all those merrier sounds, the hoot of the owl, through the wizard she oaks and the pale green of the gum-trees.

I stepped forth into the open air and gazed, first instinctively on the heavens, next, with more heedful eye, upon the earth. The nature of the soil bore the evidence of volcanic fires long since extinguished. Just before my feet the rays fell full upon a bright yellow streak in the midst of a block of quartz, half-embedded in the soft, moist soil. In the midst of all the solemn thoughts and the intense sorrows which weighed upon heart and mind, that yellow gleam startled the mind into a direction remote from philosophy, quickened the heart to a beat that chimed with no household affections. Involuntarily I stooped; impulsively I struck the block with the hatchet, or tomahawk, I carried habitually about me, for the purpose of marking the trees that I wished to clear from the waste of my broad domain. The quartz was shattered by the stroke, and left disburied its glittering treasure. My first glance had not deceived me. I, vain seeker after knowledge, had at least discovered gold. I took up the bright metal—gold! I paused; I looked round; the land that just before had seemed to me so worthless took the value of Ophir. Its features had before been as unknown to me as the Mountains of the Moon, and now my memory became wonderfully quickened. I recalled the rough map of my possessions, the first careless ride round their boundaries. Yes, the land on which I stood—for miles, to the spur of those farther mountains—the land was mine, and beneath its surface there was gold! I closed my eyes; for some moments visions of boundless wealth, and of the royal power which such wealth could command, swept athwart my brain. But my heart rapidly settled back to its real treasure. "What matters," I sighed, "all this dross? Could Ophir itself buy back to my Lilian's smile one ray of the light which gave 'glory to the grass and splendor to the flower?'"

So muttering, I flung the gold into the torrent that raged below, and went on through the moonlight, sorrowing silently; only thankful for the discovery that had quickened my reminiscence of the landmarks by which to steer my way through the wilderness.

The night was half gone, for even when I had gained the familiar track through the pastures the swell of the many winding creeks that now intersected the way obliged me often to retrace my steps; to find, sometimes, the bridge of a felled tree which had been providently left unremoved over the now foaming torrent, and, more than once, to swim across the current, in which swimmers less strong or less practiced would have been dashed down the falls, where loose logs and torn trees went clattering and whirled: for I was in danger of life. A band of the savage natives were stealthily creeping on my track—the natives in those parts were not then so much awed by the white man as now. A boomerang* had whirred by me, burying itself among the herbage close before my feet. I had turned, sought to find and to face these dastardly foes; they contrived to elude me. But when I moved on, my ear, sharpened by danger, heard them moving too in my rear. Once only three hideous forms suddenly faced me, springing up from a thicket, all tangled with honey-suckles and creepers of blue and vermilion. I walked steadily up to them; they halted a moment or so in suspense, but perhaps they were scared by my stature or awed by my aspect; and the Unfamiliar, though Human, had terror for them, as the Unfamiliar, although but a Shadow, had had terror for me. They vanished, and as quickly as if they had crept into the earth.

At length the air brought me the soft perfume of my well-known acacias, and my house rose before me, amidst English flowers and English fruit trees, under the effulgent Australian moon. Just as I was opening the little gate which gave access from the pasture-land into the garden, a figure in white rose up from under light feathery boughs, and a hand was laid on my arm. I started; but my surprise was changed into fear when I saw the pale face and sweet eyes of Lilian.

"Heavens! you here! you! at this hour! Lilian, what is this?"

"Hush!" she whispered, clinging to me; "hush! do not tell; no one knows. I missed you when the storm came on; I have missed you ever since. Others went in search of you and came back. I could not sleep, but the rest are sleeping, so I stole down to watch for you. Brother, brother, if any harm chanced to you, even the angels could not comfort me; all would be dark, dark! But you are safe, safe, safe!" And she clung to me yet closer.

"Ah, Lilian, Lilian, your vision in the hour I first beheld you was indeed prophetic—'Each has need of the other.' Do you remember?"

"Softly, softly," she said, "let me think!" She stood quietly by my side, looking up into the sky, with all its numberless stars, and its solitary moon now sinking slow behind the verge of the forest. "It comes back to me," she murmured, softly—"the Long ago—the sweet Long ago!"

I held my breath to listen.

"There—there!" she resumed, pointing to the heavens; "do you see? You are there, and my father, and—and— Oh, that terrible face—those serpent eyes—the dead man's skull! Save me—save me!"

She bowed her head upon my bosom, and I led her gently back toward the house. As we gained the door which she had left open, the starlight shining across the shadowy gloom within, she lifted her face from my breast and cast a hurried, fearful look round the shining garden, then into the dim recess beyond the threshold.

"It is there—there!—the Shadow that lured me on, whispering that if I followed it I should join my beloved. False, dreadful Shadow! it will fade soon, fade into the grinning, horrible skull. Brother, brother, where is my Allen? Is he dead—dead—or is it I who am dead to him?"

I could but clasp her again to my breast, and seek to mantle her shivering form with my dripping garments, all the while my eyes, following the direction which hers had taken, dwelt on the walls of the nook within the threshold, half lost in darkness, half white in starlight. And there I too beheld the haunting Luminous Shadow, the spectral effigies of the mysterious being whose very existence in the flesh was a riddle unsolved by my reason. Distinctly I saw the Shadow, but its light was far paler, its outline far more vague, than when I had beheld it before. I took courage as I felt Lilian's heart beating against my own. I advanced—I crossed the threshold—the Shadow was gone.

"There is no Shadow here—no phantom to daunt thee, my life's life," said I, bending over Lilian.

"It has touched me in passing; I feel it—cold, cold, cold!" she answered, faintly.

I bore her to her room, placed her on her bed, struck a light, watched over her. At dawn there was a change in her face, and from that time health gradually left her; strength slowly, slowly, yet to me perceptibly, ebbed from her life away.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

Months upon months have rolled away since the night in which Lilian had watched for my coming amidst the chilling airs under the haunting moon. I have said that from the date of that night her health began gradually to fail, but in her mind there was evidently at work some slow revolution. Her visionary abstractions were less frequent; when they occurred, less prolonged. There was no longer in her soft face that celestial serenity which spoke her content in her dreams; but often a look of anxiety and trouble. She was even more silent than before; but when she did speak there were now evident some struggling gleams of memory. She startled us at times by a distinct allusion to the events and scenes of her early childhood. More than once she spoke of commonplace incidents and mere acquaintances at L——. At last she seemed to recognize Mrs. Ashleigh as her mother; but me, as Allen Fenwick, her betrothed, her bridegroom, no! Once or twice she spoke to me of her beloved as of a stranger to myself, and asked me not to deceive her—should she ever see him again? There was one change in this new phase of her state that wounded me to the quick. She had always previously seemed to welcome my presence; now there were hours, sometimes days together, in which my presence was evidently painful to her. She would become agitated when I stole into her room—make signs to me to leave her—grow yet more disturbed if I did not immediately obey, and become calm again when I was gone.

Faber sought constantly to sustain my courage and administer to my hopes by reminding me of the prediction he had hazarded—viz., that through some malady to the frame the reason would be ultimately restored.

He said, "Observe! her mind was first roused from its slumber by the affectionate, unconquered impulse of her heart. You were absent—the storm alarmed her—she missed you—feared for you. The love within her, not alienated, though latent, drew her thoughts into definite human tracks. And thus the words that you tell me she uttered when you appeared before her were words of love, stricken, though as yet irregularly, as the winds strike the harp-strings, from chords of awakened memory. The same unwonted excitement, together with lengthened exposure to the cold night air, will account for the shock to her physical system, and the languor and waste of strength by which it has been succeeded."

"Ay, and the Shadow that we both saw within the threshold. What of that?"

"Are there no records on evidence, which most physicians of very extended practice will perhaps allow that their experience more or less tends to confirm—no records of the singular coincidences between individual impressions which are produced by sympathy? Now, whether you or your Lilian were first haunted by this Shadow I know not. Perhaps before it appeared to you in the wizard's chamber it had appeared to her by the Monks' Well. Perhaps as it came to you in the prison so it lured her through the solitudes, associating its illusory guidance with dreams of you. And again, when she saw it within your threshold, your phantasy, so abruptly invoked, made you see with the eyes of your Lilian! Does this doctrine of sympathy, though by that very mystery you two loved each other at first—though, without it, love at first sight were in itself an incredible miracle—does, I say, this doctrine of sympathy seem to you inadmissible? Then nothing is left for us but to revolve the conjecture I before threw out? Have certain organizations like that of Margrave the power to impress, through space, the imaginations of those over whom they have forced a control? I know not. But if they have, it is not supernatural; it is but one of those operations in Nature so rare and exceptional, and of which testimony and evidence are so imperfect and so liable to superstitious illusions, that they have not yet been traced; as, if truthful, no doubt they can be, by the patient genius of science, to one of those secondary causes by which the Creator ordains that Nature shall act on Man."

By degrees I became dissatisfied with my conversations with Faber. I yearned for explanations; all guesses but bewildered me more. In his family, with one exception, I found no congenial association. His nephew seemed to me an ordinary specimen of a very trite human nature—a young man of limited ideas, fair moral tendencies, going mechanically right where not tempted to wrong. The same desire of gain which had urged him to gamble and speculate when thrown in societies rife with such example, led him, now in the Bush, to healthful, industrious, persevering labor. Spes fovet agricolas, says the poet; the same Hope which entices the fish to the hook impels the plow of the husbandman. The young farmer's young wife was somewhat superior to him; she had more refinement of taste, more culture of mind, but, living in his life, she was inevitably leveled to his ends and pursuits. And, next to the babe in the cradle, no object seemed to her so important as that of guarding the sheep from the scab and the dingoes. I was amazed to see how quietly a man whose mind was so stored by life and by books as that of Julius Faber—a man who had loved the clash of conflicting intellects, and acquired the rewards of fame—could accommodate himself to the cabined range of his kinsfolks' half civilized existence, take interest in their trivial talk, find varying excitement in the monotonous household of a peasant-like farmer. I could not help saying as much to him once. "My friend," replied the old man, "believe me, that the happiest art of intellect, however lofty, is that which enables it to be cheerfully at home with the Real!"

The only one of the family in which Faber was domesticated in whom I found an interest, to whose talk I could listen without fatigue, was the child Amy. Simple though she was in language, patient of labor as the most laborious, I recognized in her a quiet nobleness of sentiment which exalted above the commonplace the acts of her commonplace life. She had no precocious intellect, no enthusiastic fancies, but she had an exquisite activity of heart. It was her heart that animated her sense of duty, and made duty a sweetness and a joy. She felt to the core the kindness of those around her; exaggerated, with the warmth of her gratitude, the claims which that kindness imposed. Even for the blessing of life, which she shared with all creation, she felt as if singled out by the undeserved favor of the Creator, and thus was filled with religion because she was filled with love.

My interest in this child was increased and deepened by my saddened and not wholly unremorseful remembrance of the night on which her sobs had pierced my ear—the night from which I secretly dated the mysterious agencies that had wrenched from their proper field and career both my mind and my life. But a gentler interest endeared her to my thoughts in the pleasure that Lilian felt in her visits, in the affectionate intercourse that sprang up between the afflicted sufferer and the harmless infant. Often, when we failed to comprehend some meaning which Lilian evidently wished to convey to us—we, her mother and her husband—she was understood with as much ease by Amy, the unlettered child, as by Faber, the gray-haired thinker.

"How is it—how is it?" I asked, impatiently and jealously, of Faber. "Love is said to interpret where wisdom fails, and you yourself talk of the marvels which sympathy may effect between lover and beloved; yet when, for days together, I can not succeed in unraveling Lilian's wish or her thought—and her own mother is equally in fault—you or Amy, closeted alone with her for five minutes, comprehend and are comprehended?"

"Allen," answered Faber, "Amy and I believe in spirit, and she, in whom mind is dormant but spirit awake, feels in that belief a sympathy which she has not, in that respect, with yourself nor even with her mother. You seek only through your mind to conjecture hers. Her mother has sense clear enough where habitual experience can guide it, but that sense is confused and forsakes her when forced from the regular pathway in which it has been accustomed to tread. Amy and I through soul guess at soul, and though mostly contented with earth, we can both rise at times into heaven. We pray."

"Alas!" said I, half mournfully, half angrily, "when you thus speak of Mind as distinct from Soul, it was only in that Vision which you bid me regard as the illusion of a fancy stimulated by chemical vapors, producing on the brain an effect similar to that of opium, or the inhalation of the oxide gas, that I have ever seen the silver spark of the Soul distinct from the light of the Mind. And holding, as I do, that all intellectual ideas are derived from the experiences of the body, whether I accept the theory of Locke or that of Condillac, or that into which their propositions are carried to their strict logical results by the wonderful subtlety of Hume, I can not detect the immaterial spirit in the material substance, much less follow its escape from the organic matter in which the principle of thought ceases with the principle of life. When the metaphysician, contending for the immortality of the thinking faculty, analyzes Mind, his analysis comprehends the mind of the brute, nay, of the insect, as well as that of man. Take Reid's definition of Mind, as the most comprehensive which I can at the moment remember: 'By the mind of a man we understand that in him which thinks, remembers, reasons, and wills.' But this definition only distinguishes the Mind of man from that of the brute by superiority in the same attributes, and not by attributes denied to the brute. An animal, even an insect, thinks, remembers, reasons, and wills.* Few naturalists will now support the doctrine that all the mental operations of brute or insect are to be exclusively referred to instincts; and even if they do, the word instinct is a very vague word—loose and large enough to cover an abyss which our knowledge has not sounded. And, indeed, in proportion as an animal, like the dog, becomes cultivated by intercourse, his instincts become weaker, and his ideas, formed by experience (viz., his mind), more developed, often to the conquest of the instincts themselves. Hence, with his usual candor, Dr. Abercrombie, in contending 'that every thing mental ceases to exist after death, when we know that every thing corporeal continues to exist, is a gratuitous assumption contrary to every rule of philosophical inquiry'—feels compelled, by his reasoning, to admit the probability of a future life even to the lower animals. His words are: 'To this mode of reasoning it has been objected that it would go to establish an immaterial principle in the lower animals, which in them exhibits many of the phenomena of mind. I have only to answer, be it so. There are in the lower animals many of the phenomena of mind, and with regard to these we also contend that they are entirely distinct from any thing we know of the properties of matter, which is all that we mean, or can mean, by being immaterial.'† Am I then driven to admit that if man's mind is immaterial and imperishable, so also is that of the ape and the ant?"

* A missile weapon peculiar to the Australian savages.

* "Are intelligence and instinct, thus differing in their relative proportion in man as compared with all other animals, yet the same in kind and manner of operation in both? To this question we must give at once an affirmative answer. The expression of Cuvier, regarding the faculty of reasoning in lower animals, 'Leur intelligence exécute des opérations du même genre,' is true in its full sense. We can in no manner define reason so as to exclude acts which are at every moment present to our observation, and which we find in many instances to contravene the natural instincts of the species. The demeanor and acts of the dog in reference to his master, or the various uses to which he is put by man, are as strictly logical as those we witness in the ordinary transactions of life."—(Sir Henry Holland, chapters on Mental Physiology, p. 220.) The whole of the chapter on instincts and habits in this work should be read in connection with this passage. The work itself, at once cautious and suggestive, is not one of the least obligations which philosophy and religion alike owe to the lucubrations of English medical men.

† Abercrombie's Intellectual Powers, p. 26. Fifteenth edition.

"I own," said Faber, with his peculiar smile, arch and genial, "that if I were compelled to make that admission, it would not shock my pride. I do not presume to set any limit to the goodness of the Creator; and should be as humbly pleased as the Indian, if in "My faithful dog should bear me company."

To me, however, the distinction between man and the lower animals, in reference to a spiritual nature distinct from the mental, is very clear. Whether ideas or even perceptions be innate or all formed by experience is a speculation for metaphysicians, which, so far as affects the question of an immaterial principle, I am quite willing to by aside. I can well understand that a materialist may admit innate ideas in Man, as he must admit them in the instinct of brutes, tracing them to hereditary predispositions. On the other hand, we know that the most devout believers in our spiritual nature have insisted, with Locke, on denying any idea, save of the Deity, to be innate.

But here comes my argument. I care not how ideas are formed, the material point is how are the capacities to receive ideas formed. The ideas may all come from experience, but the capacity to receive the ideas must be inherent. I take the word capacity as a good plain English word, rather than the more technical word "receptivity," employed by Kant. And by capacity I mean the passive power* in every creature Nature, whether in man or in any living thing by which ideas are received. A man and an elephant is such because of capacities to receive ideas best suited to the several places in the universe held by each.

"The more I look through nature the more I find that on all varieties of organized life is carefully bestowed the capacity to receive such impressions, be they called perceptions or ideas, which are adapted to the uses each creature is intended to derive from them. I find, too, that Man alone is endowed with the capacity to receive the ideas of a God, of Soul, of Worship, of Hereafter. I see no trace of such a capacity in the inferior races; nor, however their intelligence may be developed by culture, is such capacity ever apparent in them.

"But wherever capacities to receive impressions are sufficiently general in any given species of creature, to be called universal to that species, and yet not given to another species, there I find all analogy throughout Nature, those capacities are surely designed by Providence for the distinct use and capacity of the species in which they are given.

"It is no answer to me to say that the inherent capacities thus bestowed on Man do not suffice in themselves to make him form right notions of a Deity or a Hereafter; because it is part of the design of Providence that Man must learn to correct and improve all he receives by his own study and intelligence. He must build a hut before he can build a Parthenon; he must believe with the savage or the heathen before he can believe with the philosopher or Christian. In a word, in all his capacities, Man has only given him, not the immediate knowledge, but the perfect, but the means to strive toward the Perfect. And those of all animal accompanied by inferior reasoners, to whose lectures you must have listened with delight in your college days, says well:

"Accordingly, the science always stands in the clearest interest are those in a state of progress and uncertainty; absolute knowledge and absolute completion would be the paralysis of any study, and the last word calamity that could befall Man, as he is at present constituted. It would be that full and final possession of speculative truth which he now vainly anticipates as the consummation of his intellectual happiness.

"Well, then, in all those capacities for the reception of impressions from external Nature, which are given to Man and not to the brutes, I see the evidence of Man's Soul. I can understand why the inferior animal has no capacity to receive the idea of a Deity and of Worship—simply because the inferior animal has not (if provided by admission for a future life, may not therein preserve the sense of its identity. I can understand even why that sympathy with social nature in common possess, and which constitutes the great virtue we emphatically call Humanity, is not possessed by the lower animals (or, if it exist in very rare and exceptional degree), even where they live in communities like bees and ants, for instincts; because men are destined to meet, to know, and to love each other in the life to come, and the hour these new the brutes cease to be.

"Now the more, then, we examine the inherent capacities bestowed by Providence on Man, the more they seem to distinguish him from the other races by their comprehension of objects beyond his life upon this earth. Man alone,† says Muller,‡ 'can conceive abstract notions:' and it is in abstract conceptions of soul, time, space, matter, spirit, light, form, quantity, essence—that Man grounds not only all philosophy, all science, but all that profitable knowledge one generation for the benefit of the next. And why? Because all these abstract notions unconsciously the mind away from the world around into the immaterial; from the present into the future. But if Man cease to exist when he disappears in the grave, you must be compelled to say that he is the only creature in existence whom Nature or Providence has condescended to deceive and cheat by capacities for which there are no available objects. How nobly and how justly has Chalmers said: 'What inference shall we draw from this remarkable law in Nature that there is nothing waste and nothing meaningless in the feelings and faculties wherewith living creatures are endowed? For each desire there is a counterpart object; for each faculty there is room and opportunity for exercise either in the present or in the coming futurity. Now, but for the doctrine of immortality, Man would be an exception to this law—he would stand forth as an anomaly in Nature, with aspirations in his heart for which the universe had no antitype. His wide capacities of understanding and thought that never were to be followed by aspects of comprehension greatness through the whole history of his being!

"'With the inferior animals there is a certain squareness of adjustment, if we may so term it, between each desire and its correspondent gratification. The one is evenly met by the other, and there is a fullness and definiteness of enjoyment up to the capacity of enjoyment. But it is with Man, who, both from the vastness of his propensities and the vastness of his powers, feels himself formed and born for more than he receives for him. He alone labors under the discomfort of an incongruity between his circumstances and his powers, and unless there be new circumstances awaiting him in a more advanced state of being, he is the subject of hopeless disappointment. And in the recognition of these truths the Human society that exacts the society of heavens, and aims by purposed and well-directed efforts the improvement on the notions inherited from its progenitors, stands in bold relief. The one species is benefited for men by their belief in the next, while the society of brutes remains age after age the same, forfeiting no happiness in the present, in all probability, improved since the Deluge.

"But inseparable from the conviction of these truths is the inquiry of whether, in Nature, it does not touch my argument when a philosopher tells me that the capacity of receiving ideas is 'that the origin of prayer is in Man's ignorance of the phenomena of Nature.' That is it for ex ignorance which, when cooked for consumption by when ground the ground, taught the weak to lend, the proud to pray,' my answer is—and brutes are much more thoroughly improved by natural phenomena than Man is; the bird and the beast of prey know better than Man when the storm will rock and the ground groan, and their instinct leads them to shelter; but it does not lead them to pray. The whole question for the Soul is to be sought not in the question whether natural ideas be derived by his own observation by the senses, by association or habit, but in the inherent capacity to receive ideas—the capacity bestowed on Man alone, and bestowed by Providence herself with the idea of a Power superior to Nature, with which to hold communion, and communion with Himself which comes from prayer.'

"Even were this so," said I, "it not in Creator consistent with that of all-wise, all-foreseeing? of all-foreseeing, all-perdoraining? Can the Creator of His creature alter the ways of His will?"

"For an answer to that question," replied Faber, "which, if it be not to be given by the clever men of the world, I ought to refer you to the Philanthropists, who have so triumphantly exploited the reasoner over that fool of doubt which is crossed every day by the infant. But as we have not time for that, I am contented to draw my argument from the proposition—a proposition sought by geology and human observation of Nature. I can only guess at the Deity's Omniscience, of which we find no trace in His power, by the observation of His general laws; and of all His laws, I know of none so general as the principle which I call that of Economy, which makes Nature so set that all the phenomena of Nature in one connected system, which, as science has experienced, do not make the brute pray; but there is not a trouble that can happen to Man but what his instinct and his reason, combined—indeed, that he is not a philosopher. I say not this in scorn of the philosopher, but to show that the gaps are obligations are infinite, but simply because for all which is impulsive to Man, there is a corresponding law by which philosophy can explain away. I do not, then, bewilder myself by seeking to bind and limit the Omniscience of the Deity by the knowledge of His attempt will believing that, somehow or other, He has made provision for the exercise of His Omniscience that Man should have the impulses that leads him to believe that, in addressing a Deity, he is addressing a Power all-comprehending, benignant Father, and in that obedience should obtain benefit. Because that impulse is to me an illusion, then we must say that Heaven governs the earth by a lie; and that is impossible, because, reasoning from analogy, we find in truth—that—is, Nature gives to no species instinct or impulse which does not of purpose to which it should I not be a shallow physician if, where I find in the human organization a principle or a property so general that I must believe it normal to the healthful conditions of that organization, I should refuse to admit that Nature intended it for use? Reasoning by all analogy, must I not say the habitual neglect of its use must more or less injure the harmonious wellbeing of the whole human system? I could have much to add upon the point in dispute, by which the creed implied in your question would imbrail the Divine power to the necessities of its divine wisdom, and substitute for a benignant Deity a relentless Fate. But here I should exceed my province. I am no theologian. Enough for me that in all affliction, all perplexity, an impulse that I dare not suppress leads me at once to prayer. Do I find by experience that the prayer is heard, that the affliction is removed, the doubt is solved? I think, indeed, would be presumptuous to say. But it is not presumptuous to think that to the Creator of my heart he becomes more fortified against the horror, and my reason more serene amidst the doubt.'

I listened, and ceased to argue. I felt as if in that solitude, and in the pause of my wonted mental occupations, my intellect was growing languid, and all the subjects gazing in dimness. My pride took alarm. I had so from my boyhood cherished the idea of fame, and in pursuit of the search after knowledge, that I recoiled in dismay from the thought that I had relinquished knowledge, and myself off from them. I resolved to resume my once favorite philosophical pursuits, re-examine and complete the task in which I had once committed my hopes of renown and, simultaneously, a restless desire seized me to commence, though but at brief intervals, with other minds than those immediately within my reach—minds fresh from the old world, and from the supreme centres of its civil civilization. Emigrants frequently passed my house in the Far West, who shrunk from rendering the hospitalities so universally accorded in the colony. I could not endure to expose to such strangers my habits and mental disorder, and that thought was not less intolerable to Mrs. Ashlight. I now built commodiously for a building a few hundred yards from the house, and near the main track taken by travellers through the vast pasture. I was overjoyed to this building my books and scientific instruments. In an upper story I placed my telescope and microscope, globes and retorts. I removed my chemical experiments—I ought to investigate my minds and the laws of science which I had hitherto less cultured—meditated new theories on Light and Color—collected specimens in Natural History—subjected animal cules to my microscope—geological fossils to my hammer. Then, in those unoccupied moments of thought, I sought to distract myself from sorrow, and strengthen my reason against the illusions of my heart. The Luminous Shadow was not seen again on my wall, and the thought of Margrave was rarely present to me.

In this building I passed many hours of each day, more and more earnestly plunging my thoughts into the depths of science already, as Lilian's unaccountable dislike to my presence became more and more decided. When I thus ceased to disturb her joy she cheered and comforted here, my heart's occupation was gone. I had answered to the appeal consistent with myself in this log-hut a couple of spare rooms, in which I could accommodate passing strangers. I learned to welcome them for their company and interest, and to see them depart with regret. Thus, for the most part, the society of the ordinary class of colonial adventurers: bankrupt tradesmen, unlucky farmers, forlorn mechanics, hordes of unskilled laborers now and then a heedless barrister, or a sporting collegian who had lost all on the turf. Now and then, however, a young man of education and manners that unmistakably proclaimed the cultured gentleman of Europe would knock at my door. He was a cadet of a noble Prussian family, which for some political reasons had settled itself in the Far West. He had formed an intimate with young French nobles, and, living the life of a young French noble, had soon exhausted the paternal purse, forestalled his slender inheritance, and been compelled to fly his father's frown and his tailor's bill. He had become with a lively Frenchman which proved how much the wit of a German could be refined by the atmosphere of Paris. An old college friend of birth inferior to his own had been as unfortunate in seeking to make money as he had been prodigal but in obtaining it. Through the friend, a few years previous, he had joined one of the first commercial houses in Australia, and was already thriving: the penniless noble was on his way to join the bankrupt trader, as the latest intelligence fifty miles distant from my house. This young man was unlike any German I ever met. He had all the vivacity borne by which the well-bred French man gives to the doctrines of the Cynic the grace of Epicurus. He cannot himself even be good for nothing with an elegance of candor which not only disarmed censure, but seemed to challenge admiration. He was the happy spendthrift was so inebriate with hope—sure that he should be rich before long. How and whence, therefore rich?—he could have no more explained, than I can square the circle. When the grand sections Continuous does Providence be in illusion, then we must say that Heaven governs the earth by a lie; and that is impossible, because, reasoning from analogy, we find in truth—that—is, Nature gives to no species instinct or impulse which does not of purpose to which it should I not be a shallow physician if, where I find in the human organization a principle or a property so general that I must believe it normal to the healthful conditions of that organization, I should refuse to admit that Nature intended it for use? Reasoning by all analogy, through the Mulberry Gardens with a Hochester and a Buckingham, or smiled from the death-cart with a Richelieu and a Lauzun—a gentleman's disdain et a mob!"

I was so thinking as we sat, his light talk freshing up from his careless lips, when suddenly from the spray and the sparkle of that light talk was flung forth the name of Margrave.

"Margrave!" I exclaimed. "Margrave. What of him?"

"What of him! I asked if, by chance, you knew the only Englishman I ever had the meanness to envy?"

"Perhaps you speak of one person, and I thought of another."

"Parbleu, my dear host, there can scarcely be two Margraves! The one I mean flashed like a meteor upon Paris, bought from a prince of the Bourbon a palace that might have lodged a prince of the blood royal, eclipsed our Jew bankers in splendor, our pensieux dore in good looks and luck-brain adventures, and, strangest of all, filled his salons with philosophers and charlatans, chemists and spirit-rappers; insulting the gravest dons of the schools by bringing them face to face with the most impudent quacks, and the most audacious dreamers—and, withal, himself so racy and charming, so bon prince, so bon enfant! For six months he was the rage in Paris; perhaps he might have continued to be the rage there for six years, but all at once the meteor vanished as suddenly as it had flashed. Is this the Margrave whom you know?"

"I should not have thought that the Margrave whom I knew in England could have risen to the life of crises."

"Nor could he, man: cities were too tame for him. He has gone to some far-remote wilds in the East—some say in search of the Philosopher's Stone, some for actual gold—buried in his house a Sicilian adventurer, who, when at work on that treasure, is guarded by sentries by the fumes of his own crucible. After that mixture tune Margrave took Paris in disgust, and we know why."

"So this is the only Englishman whom you envy? Envy him! Why?"

"Because he is the only Englishman I ever met who contrived to be rich and yet free from the spleen; to be a world his debtor and not ask to look at his face, and see how thoroughly he enjoyed the life of which your countrymen seem to be so bitterly tired! Because I have satisfied your curiosity, pray satisfy mine. Who and what is this Englishman?"

"Who and what was he supposed at Paris to be?"

"Conjectures were numberless. One of your countrymen suggested that which was most generally favored. 'This gentleman,' he said, 'came here forget, but who was one of those odd roots who fancy themselves young because they live with the young, and sooner cut off their fingers than be reclaimed, 'Louis Grayle come to life again, as I saw him forty-four years ago in Paris. Margrave, still handsome—must be his son!'"

"Louis Grayle, who was said to be murdered at Aleppo?"

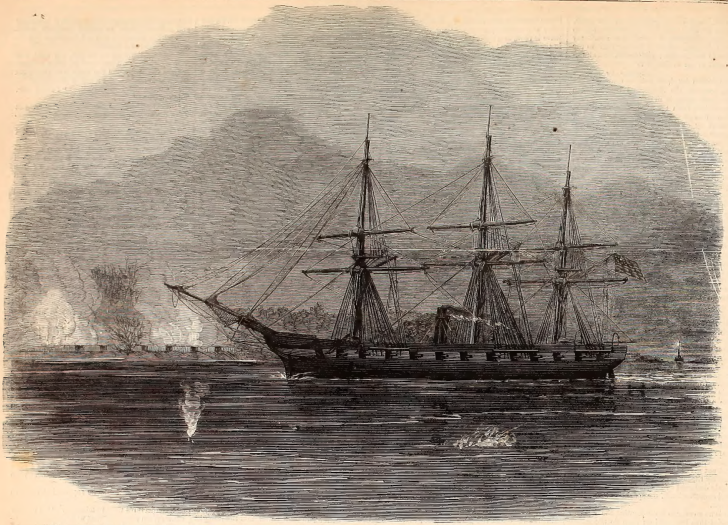
"The same. The strange old man was enormously wealthy, but it seems that he hated his lawful heirs, and left behind him a fortune so far below that which he was known to possess, that he must certainly have disposed of it secretly before his death. Why so dispose of it, if not to bequeath it to a natural son, whom, as his own son, he might not have wished to acknowledge, or point out to the world by the natural bequest of his will? All that Margrave ever said of himself and the source of his wealth confirmed his birth as Louis Grayle's natural son, rather than legal son, enriched by a father whose name he knew not nor cared to know."

"It is true. And Margrave quitted Paris for the East? When?"

"I can not the date within a day or two, for his flight preceded mine by a week; and, happily, all Paris was so busy in taking of it that I slipped away without notice."

And the Prussian then named a date which it thrilled me to hear, for it was that of the month, and about that very day, that the Luminous Shadow had stood within my threshold.

"I left Margrave," the Count went on into other subjects of talk: nothing more was said of Margrave. At last, after or two afterward he came his way, and I remained long gazing musingly on the embers of the fire dying low on my hearth.



THE MORTAR FLOTILLA.

We present our readers on page 73 with a picture of the Mortar Flotilla. Farragut will set to service under CAPTAIN DAVID D. PORTER, U.S.N. The vessels are schooners of rested speed, drawing in loaded from eight to nine feet each armed with one 13-inch mortar weighing 17,000 pounds, and which throws a shell weighing 241 pounds. The range of this destructive weapon is about three miles. Besides the mortars, these vessels will carry two small guns, probably howitzers. The fleet will be divided into three divisions, each under the command of a lieutenant-commander. Captain Porter will fly his flag from the Octorara, a side-wheel steamer which was built at the Brooklyn navy-yard. She will be armed with two 11-inch guns; and from her peculiar model she can go up or down a narrow river without turning around, as she has a rudder at each end.

The first division, to be commanded by Lieutenant W. Smith, will consist of the following schooners: Norfolk Packet, Para, G. H. Lee, Arabine, W. Bacon, and C. P. Williams.

The second division, under the command of Lieutenant-Commander C. W. Pickering, will consist of the schooners F. A. Ward, M. J. Carlton, A. J. Vaughan, G. Mercer, Sarah Bruen, Racer, Carlton, E. J. Hinds.

The third division, under Lieutenant K. R. Breese commanding, consists of the schooners J. Griffiths, Henry P. Smith, Sea Foam, H. Jones, and S. Bruen.

MISSING: PRIVATE WILLIAM SMITH

SERGEANT! enter on your roll,
"Missing—Private William Smith."
Death is but a passing dream,
Life a false and shadowy myth.
Commrace, close your gaping ranks!
He was of the first platoon;
Missing private William Smith
Dubbin will be heard of soon.

Missing private William Smith
Led the charge that turned the day;
Through the thickest of the fight,
Step by step, he clove his way.
When I last saw Private Smith
He was grimed with smoke and gore;
What if private William Smith
Should be heard of never more?

Comrades! soldiers should not mourn.
He was every inch a man!
Men have fallen in the fight
Ever since the world began.
Yet I would I knew for truth,
Now the fight is past and done—
Missing private William Smith
Has a wife and little one.

Would I knew that clanking chains
Bound his iron muscles o'er!
Would I knew a prison wall
Held his limbs, though wounded sore!
Would that missing Private Smith
May be heard of once again!
Wounded, captive, so that he
Be not of the nameless slain.

Missing private William Smith
Has a wife and little one;
Ere my life had scarce begun.
I should learn like to speak
To her of so strange a myth,
When the war is over, as
Missing, private William Smith.

TANGLED AND RAVELED.

I.

MISS CONWAY, spinster, came home from the morning church-service all in a flutter, walked straight up to the little glass, settled the bow under her chin, patted the coil over the left ear approvingly, without a salutation to the round, stout little body in a wonderful black lace cap, who stood in the relation maternal to Sophy.

"Oh, ma, I declare I am so nervous I don't know what to do!"

Ma Grump was not very quick of comprehension, but always ready to do a kindly deed, so she locked up two more potatoes in process of peeling, looked and said,

"Sophy, just you take the ladle a minit and I'll go right off and make you some Wild Isaac tea;" and she had already wiped her poor old willing hands on the crash roller when Sophy's petulant reply put an end to her designs.

"Wild Isaac! Ma, I do wish you wouldn't talk so outlandish. It's wild hyson, and you know and I don't want any of it either. I am only kind of flustered at seein' Grant Ryland this morning sitting right opposite to me in church, and he lookedat me so I didn't know which way to turn. Every time I looked up his eyes were perfectly set, and I know I blushed dreadfully. Well, I shan't make an objection on account of Sophy's nonsense; he will find that I am not going to forget old times."

"Did he come home with you, Sophy?"

"Why, no. I am sure he did mean to, but old Miss Beaufort and Pollitoy sat right behind him, and they must have a vile some motion to him, and he couldn't do any other way than go with them. I have he was dreadful coy as ever."

Ma put a bit of butter in the steaming potatoes and said, in her old-fashioned way,

"Why, Polliny would be a bit-rate match for him. She's rich enough for both. I shouldn't wonder if he took to her."

"Take to her indeed, ma!"

There was malice in the damsel's eye; there was grim determination in the way the head the bandbox cover over the split straw beneath it; and there was energy of purpose in the movement of the ends of her cape before her spare person. What she then and there intended was sure to be done; and she digitulated a message to the old Grant Ryland didn't propose to herself he never should do that child, Polliny Beaufort. Sundry convictions not pleasant to encourage came over her, that a fair young face like Pauline's just behind her might have accounted for something in the earnest glances from Grant Ryland's deep dark eyes in that direction. She scarcely knew, completely, as was her wont to do. Ma, in her secret soul, really thought that a little "Wild Isaac" tea would do wonders, but in her fear of saying anything more on the subject to her strong-willed daughter, especially as her preconceived ideas of the name of the herb in question had received a considerable shock. So she said nothing more, but meekly announced that dinner was ready, in her homely, cheery way, and succeeded in restoring the ruffled dignity of her tartaric offspring. Still she looked dangerous all the afternoon, as she sat biting her nails viciously, and planning, thinking, and plotting what could be said and done to prevent a new rival coming on the stage. Youth—grace—wealth. It was a dangerous combination; but she fancied she could combat any one more than that by a little skilful diplomacy.

When I announce a village sewing circle the reader will know at once all the dramatis personæ. The kindly matron, sublime in her knowledge of biscuit-making and preserving; the fierce collector of dues and donations, with an anxious eye on unprotected single men, whom she regards as lawful prizes for the benefit of fairs and bazaars; the anxious mother of a family, who is fancying the baby is crying at home all the while; and the ladies maiden, who wonders if Jim or Bob will come for her at nine o'clock to escort her home.

This present gathering was not for the benefit of the Bible Society, nor for that for the soldiers' help and comfort. Piles of great stout warm shirts, made in the most liberal proportions, were there, where they couldn't fail to meet the corresponding button-hole and collars of wonderful dimensions, lay in one corner, while near by were seen, in all stages of progress, from the "setting up" to the narrowing off, were in the hands of the fifteen who assembled then and there. It wouldn't be fair to criticise the woolen articles already finished, and I dare say the fine, single cotton thread used; but there was not much symmetry displayed in their construction. If that pair of "Jim's" fingers narrowed so gradually to a termination, found crippled with corresponding feet, why—very well; but it would not do to have Jim's fingers and toes from some peculiarity in their construction, would keep one turning them over from hand to hand, hoping to find a way to wear them, than wouldn't twist the mouth askew in sympathy.

Miss Sophy Grump didn't think those—not she! If there was one thing she prided herself on more than another it was upon the shape of the articles she knit. That it came of her mother was authority on all doubtful points of seaming and making stitches, and things over the head were not before tried the business came clustering around her. "Oh, Miss Grump, I'm in trouble again; there's a great hole here!" and straightway Miss Ryland sat herself down on the stool at her feet with a puzzled face.

"Ls, child!"—and she took the work up—"you've dropped three stitches away back, and you just go off and pull all you've done, and I'll fix it for you."

Minnie, crest-fallen, went off to a corner and commenced the task, while Miss Grump continued her discourse to her companion in the loud whisper peculiar to a village gossip:

"That child is Jack's cousin, you know. Well, as I was sayin', the house Grant Ryland was in has all gone to smash—the big house of Grey, Jackson, & Co., you know. Well, they made money is gone too, and so that's an end of his fine pretensions. Old Ryland was a proud, stuck-up sprigs and proud, and there's no reason that she should'n be brought down."

And the speaker knit a stitch or two with such energy that her needle slipped.

"I should say that it would be should look out for a rich wife. There's Miss Sheddy, she'll be worth cool'sh after the old man's death."

"And Sophy Polliny," whispered Miss Avon, and jarked her thumb over her shoulder in the direction where a slight, pale, grey-eyed girl sat quietly knitting a soldier's mitten, glancing now and then at the strange faces about her, for Pauline Beaufort was a stranger right the first time in visiting at the large old white house on the hill, where her uncle, John Beaufort, had lived those many years, and she had come with her aunt to the "sewing society." Mrs. Beaufort was on the other side of the room in deep discourse with the minister's wife, so the girl, Miss sat and knit and dreamed over old scenes. Sitting with her two white hands folded together over her black dress, and her pale, sad, yet sunshine worn in her hair, one would not guess that the orphan girl was an heiress; but so it was. Young as she was, already had she learned how quickly friends in name cluster about wealth, and already she had found them only in name. She was practical, and did not despise her riches. Ah no; she valued them, not for the diamonds it brought to her casket, but for the sweet loving face it would ever in winter time; not for the silks and laces of her child, but for the bread and shelter they could gather around her; and better still, they could buy for her such happy smiles on faces sad before, such pleasant memories of those made grateful by her bounty. Ah yes! Pauline thanked God that he had made her rich, and thanked Him, too, that no offering always down. And so it came to pass that, foremost in every good work, she had come to find that she and her gold could be of little account.

She started from her reverie, for a familiar name fell on her ear: "Grant Ryland, is your cousin coming for you to night?" and one of the knot of fair girls in the bay window touched the maiden's rosy cheek. "Ryland, Ryland, if it should be—" and Pauline flushed and trembled. The name brought a remembrance of a summer meeting not so very long ago, off among the hills. It seemed to recall an hour of danger, when the frightened horse she rode was plunging madly down a steep, beyond control—of a strong hand on the bridle-rein of a strong arm thrown around her, a strange low voice saying softly, "Thank God you are safe, Linda." After that a bouquet of wild-wood flowers, a moonlight walk, a ride, and then the memory of Grant Ryland was not forgotten; and when among her worshipers a heart after heart was laid at her feet, she grew cold, and persuaded herself that they came to gain her wealth and not herself, and this was why no lover's prayer was answered.

Dreaming was a luxury in which Pauline did not often indulge, so she presently stole up to the side of Miss Grump. Presently she took for adjustment to the wondrous fagots of that renowned knitter and talker—"Please tell me about that thumb!"

"Oh la, yes, Polliny! Excuse me, but it don't seem a minit hardly since I saw you down here with your ma one summer, and you was in short frocks then. I s'pose you don't remember that time." And the speaker fixed the wiry little curl over her left eyebrow; while the girl's pale face grew whiter, for the black dress told the story—she was motherless now.

"There! you just see how I hold the yarn so, and take up stitches this way—the long men has mostly gone to the war—put your yarn over your finger. There's one home from the city now, Grant Ryland; I guess he will come after Minnie. Oh, Polliny, don't draw your thread so tight! Miss Beaufort, dear, now he's goin' to look out for a rich wife. Now knit three stitches, and widden again."

But Pauline, gray eyes of the spinster never left the girl's face; she saw its deep flush, and half guessed—at least plainly perceived another thing. "I don't think he and Minnie would make a match, but there's an end to that now. I declare you have got into over two inches of work, and you must up—there! Sarey Jackson said that Minnie said that Grant Ryland was dreadful fond of her, and he have a hundred thousand any way."

Then, pretending to notice her reddened cheek for the first time, she added, "Ls! you're sick, you know Mr. Ryland?"

"Yes; I am glad he will think he will marry as you say," said Pauline, hastily, as she moved aside, for she had caught a glimpse of a well-known form in the door, and made her escape before he should enter. Sitting in the dimly-lighted "keeping-room," awaiting her aunt's pleasure, she seemed to be in lingering mood for long twilight, she could see all that took place in either room, while in the shadow, muffled in a heavy gray cloak, she was herself unseen—saw Grant enter, and glance swiftly around the circle, and quickly stepping up behind Minnie Ryland, whisper something—holding her gaze from who it was—saw her blush and tremble as he stooped to whisper over the little girl's curls—saw presently, underneath the great lamp in the hall, saw her take from his grasp a photograph, which he held out to her, and, passing her way—glancing from the picture to the man before her, saying, softly, "It is like you." Yes! there was the picture, and the picture clear enough to see that though it was Grant Ryland's face it was in soldier's uniform. That he was a Captain Pauline could guess, that he was going off to join the army. He had hinted somewhere in his conversation during their moonlight walk from church; and she remembered that he had sighed deeply when he spoke of it. Her last word to him seemed to say his purpose, when she had said, "Don't join the army yet!" She had fancied something more than gallantry had prompted the words, and now he was going! Grant Ryland, the dark mustache, but now she, Minnie, held his hand. That he was a favorite cousin she was sure, for one moment credited; that he loved Minnie she did not suffer herself to doubt. When the heiress had left her room there was a strange pain in watching her company. On the hearth yet lay the ashes of the wishing-bone, sown there when the fire was first made, and burned with a trembling hand—the only love-token she had ever valued. She sat long in the window looking over to the hill-side, where the white grave-stones glimmered in the moonlight, and where the mother she had loved so well was laid. Then she crossed over to her. That Grant had revealed to her how, in all these months, she had kept Minnie's heart from the one she loved, and for beyond others; so frank and manly, so good and tender; and now—he belonged to another! Minnie's bright curly head should rest on his breast for shelter, her tiny hand should cling to his for guidance. She strove to talk cheerfully to the young girl; and looking from the shining grave-stone over her mother's resting-place on earth up to the shining stars that marked her future home, she asked His grace to bear the trial, and His brightest blessings on Grant Ryland's lot, even though another walked life's pathway beside him.

WHAT made Grant Ryland think he ought to call on old Miss Sophy Grump? He had sat quietly drawn up in a snarl, no mitten that looked more like a mitten for that any other name, as he straightened and shaped. Pauline Beaufort had, and it was quite natural that she should call and thank Minnie's cousin for the greater part in the town; and sitting in the window, her diamond earrings glittered in the sunlight bravely, and caught the idle gazer's eye. Perhaps it was because of those ear-rings nearer. He knew no one else in the room that could be, and so he naturally thought he should like a closer view. Yes, it must have been the diamonds. Miss Sophy actually blushed with pleasure as he took the welcome hand. The ball of yarn of course rolled quite away; but the bow with which he returned it compensated for the annoyance of having Polliny looking fresh and fair so close beside her.

Pauline hardly looked up, and spoke but little. She always found a pair of eyes fixed on her with an earnest, yearning look, whenever unnoticed she and so she bent lower and lower over her work while Miss Sophy, not at all abashed, kept up the day.

"You see, Mr. Ryland, we are busy for the soldiers as usual. Speaking of soldiers, now do tell if you are going off to the war, as I've heard to day."

"I suppose I shall. Miss Sophy, I should go mad to stay idling here. I am sorry to leave mother alone;" and the moist eyes looked through the dim window-pane off toward the little white cottage with its clustering vines, for he knew that the grave-yard heart would hold its watch there in the days to come.

All this time Pauline never looked up or spoke, but Miss Grump remarked, softly,

"I s'pose there's others besides Miss Ryland who will miss you;" and the damsel Grump let the gray yarn roll off across the room.

Grant, slowly winding it up in an absent mood, laid it by mistake in Pauline's lap, saying, absractedly, "Are there?" And then he sighed a little, and looked around. She heard it all, and involuntarily raised her eyes to meet a sad, real looking out from his. She glance made her tremble, and the diamonds quivered like a star, but whispering to herself, "Courage, Pauline," she rose to go, and with a voice as calm as might be, said, "Good-by." Tying the dainty little handkerchief over her head, and winding her scarf about her, she was gone. It was Grant's first impulse to follow her, but her manner forbade it. He could not guess that she dared not permit it. He threw himself in the chair she had just quitted to watch her graceful figure floating off away—away until lost to view, and then his idle dream was broken by Miss Sophy's voice.

"Polliny's in a great hurry to go. She expect, ed to stay till the afternoon service was done. She's rather queer; don't you think so? Always thinking the men are after her money. I should think she might have known you better than to make such speeches. Oh dear, what am I saying? I declare I'll have to you just to keep you from—"

And Sophy coughed in girlish confusion.

Grant Ryland wheeled straight round in front of her and laughed. "Ha! ha! you're better than even she desired, while his black eyes dilated as he looked down at "Speeches! what speeches did she—" And he pointed over his shoulder. "Does she call me a fortune-hunter? Does she think because I am poor I would court the heir, Sophy?"

"Oh, Grant—Mr. Ryland—I ought not to have said any thing to you."

"Once more, Sophy," said he, almost fiercely; "Does Pauline Beaufort think so meanly of me as that? I will know what she said."

Sophy was getting angry—both at the detaining hand and the deep feelings her allusion had brought to the surface her companion appeared reluctantly.

"Yes: I said I guessed you might better look for a rich wife; and she said, quite shortly, 'Well, he won't marry me, I can tell you!'"

"Were those her exact words?" and the young man's face grew white.

"Well—yes, as near as I can remember. I don't see what makes you take on oh about it!"

Grant shut his eyes and leaned back in the chair with a movement, but caught himself with the muttered exclamation—"I've been a fool, that's all, Miss Sophy; been dreaming, and I am awake now, thank-God!" and he hailed the sunlight striking off down the street, looking neither to the right nor the left, but as in a state of doubt whether she had gained or lost.

THE widow Ryland was waiting tea for her son, who staid late to-night. The wood-fire burned brightly on the hearth, and shimmering in its flickering light the tea-service sparkled and seemed to dance on the hearth, while the tea-kettle furnished the music. Minnie had come out, and Mrs. Ryland going to the window often put up her hand to shade her hands to shade her face as she looked out into the gathering gloom, for it was a tall figure coming through the little gate. It came at last; but the face was so sad and weary, the crisp curls all heavy with dampness, that the mother's heart involuntarily sighed that she started involuntarily. "Why, Grant, what is the matter?" and the word over 'tis a woman's question, when the man she loves looks sick or sad—"What's the matter?" "Oh nothing, mother, dear, only I am tired, that's all;" saying pressure of her hand, and a loving smile reassured her.

The dainty meal was over, the hearth newly swept, and Mrs. Ryland sat knitting again by the hearth anxious and troubled, while Grant stood leaning against the mantle, with one hand shading his eyes, which yet looked straight into the fire-light.

"Mother?"

"Well, my son!"

"Do you love me, mother?"

She was startled, and could make no reply, no word, but nestling close to his broad shoulder.

He took the head with the soft brown hair lovingly, looking down on her diminutive stature and little hands, of which he was so proud.

"I had a dream to-night, dear heart if her boy goes off to the army? Always loving her, always thinking of her, and always dreaming of the one when he should be gone—is she ever remembering better and greater than now?"

There was a great sob gurgling up, a tight choking of her throat, and then a gush of tears on his breast breast.

"Mother, dear, I can not stay here idle. Already have I been made to feel the bitterness of poverty and already heard the sneer in my own ranch that she, Pauline, has said I should never win her and her cursed wealth"—and he set his strong white teeth together, and his eyes flashed. "I must go without your blessing. With it, I shall find some happiness every of yonder, where men are living real earnest lives. Mother, dear, will you let me go?" and he raised her face and wiped the tears away.

She trembled yet, but looked up with a current: "Grant, you have been my brightest blessing. George is gone, and I can not bid you stay. Bless you, my son, my darling, my darling!" saying, waking and sleeping. He can watch you and preserve you where the birds forget the snare, and then you we shall be sure to meet some time again—if not here, up yonder."

And this was how Grant Ryland's mother blessed her child and bid him go.

Pauline Beaufort lingered strangely, the villagers said, and lingering did not seem to find happiness. She took long walks over the breezy hills and through the dim woods, alone, except for such companionship as that of her greyhound, "Birch-bark," whose cognomen, given in merry mood, was now its name in sober earnest. Off on the farthest range of hillocks toward the west, looking from thence over to the dim horizon, she often stood, and her heart beat fast to remember that even new, beyond her vision, a battle might be raging, and he, Guard Ryland, might be—Heaven only—dying. Then when weary she came home at last, it was to search again the newspaper for the latest news from the scene of war. She would fain have passed many hours with Mrs. Ryland, but the love with which Minnie blushed and spoke of her soldier lover left a vague, dull pain in Pauline's heart which she could not overcome. She often stopped a moment at the cottage, just to hear that he was well and happy, or to leave a bundle of newspapers for their perusal.

"A battle at Lexington!" It dashed along the pipes, and heart-strings quivered in sympathy! Then came newspapers, with that dreadful list each weary waiting; of the field where "some one had blundered;" how "to the jaws of death rode forth six hundred;" of the thirst that maddened; of the hope of succor fading out, while brave men stood their ground as brave men will. A day or another the fatal list "Killed and wounded." Mothers, sisters, wives, and sweethearts asked of God, before they stopped to read it; and, alas! the help was sorely needed when the page was scanned.

Pauline was going to the postoffice. Fresh and ill she certainly looked, for her eyes were glistening and her mouth dry and burning. She had not slept these two nights, and would sleep no more until she heard Grant Ryland's fate. Ah, bravely had she struggled, and the shame and regret that she had won the victory until now. But the vision of the strong arm that once saved her from death by powerless and still—oh! how still—now light she had dared so seldom to encounter staring blank and fixed, unwarned to the daylight, when the voice stilled forever—ah, Pauline could not hush the beatings of her heart, though she pressed her hands almost over it.

"Miss Polliny—Polliny!" and Sophy Grump's shrill voice and beckoning finger fell upon her closer within her own door. "There's terrible news—have you heard it? I've got to-day's paper, and I'm going over to Mars Ryland's with it. Here it is," and running her long finger down the list of "Killed" it stopped—"G. Ryland." Pauline saw it clearly. It seemed to burn into her brain. "G. Ryland, killed." It was over; there was no disguise longer; and Sophy and Miss Grump stood aghast to see the fierce agony that convulsed the young girl's frame until insensibility came to her relief. Then came the wild fever that shook her brain. Days added became weeks, and yet she was too ill to be removed to her uncle's home—and no kinder or more faithful nurse than Mrs. Grump could have been found. It was infinitely better than if Mrs. Ryland had been in the house. She kindly soul, who never left her bedside, began to puzzle herself sorely over the scraps of delirious muttering that fell upon her ear, and sometimes in faint light seemed to dawn upon her mental horizon; but she kept the key idea, which was in her brain. SKATING ON THE PARK.

Resuming into tunes,
Crashing into cars,
Pushing over ice-packs,
Like a pack of bears;
Crinoline on "rockers,"
Bulmorals on a "lark"—
Bless me! this is pleasant,
Skating on the Park!

Crowds of easy Bloomers
Gyrate with a grace;
Crowds of "boozy" mercshaums
Puff them to their face:
Floods of rosy pippins,
Nough to fill an ark—
Jums! this is jolly,
Skating on the Park!

Shouls of scaly small-fry
Crack their jokes and pates;
Schools of "amphibilia"
Flounder flat on skates;
Pedagogick "ic" noaums,
Bound to "make their mark,
Jot down their disasters,
Short-hand, on the Park.

Now you "cut" an "eagle,"
Now you cut a "spread;"
Now you backward wriggle,
Now you "crack a head;"
Now you're "up" to Mercury,
Now you zero mack—
Jeh! ain't it jolly,
Gymning on the Park!

"Cup of coffee, Mister?"
"Mister, take a skate?"
"Ha! my pretty sister!"
"Ho! my cousin Kate!"
Off she shoots, the rocket!
Off fly I, the "spark!"
Smack! was that a pocket-
Paishon on the Park?

"Venus! what an ankle!"
"Phoebus! what a 'cloud'"
"How my fingers tingle!"
"Smoking's not allow'd!"
"Heigh! you 'cloud compelling.'
(Mind whom shins you bark!)
Jove'-ial, happy fellow!"
"This the ladies' Park?"

Jaunty little "jockey"
(Here it "smack you" dumb!)
Takes your chalk and (cracky!)
Chnir 't 'gins to hum!
Lika a top you're whirling—
Scal'd lips do them work?
And so you win your darling,
Skating on the Park.

Floating is't, or flying!
Is't like sky 'ots clniving?
Are we of hasheesh dying?
Are these "stars" of heaven?
What 'wakes' fills the vision?
What angel voices?—Hark!

THE UNION VICTORY AT SOMERSET, KENTUCKY.

Full details have been received of the Battle of Somerset, Kentucky. By the strategy of General Buell, Zollicoffer's army was surrounded by the divisions of General Thomas and Schoepff: perceiving which, Zollicoffer made a desperate attack upon the Union camp on Sunday morning, January 19. His force was 10,000 strong, and that of the Union army consisted of five regiments—the Tenth Indiana, Fourth Ohio, the Second Minnesota, the Fourth Kentucky, and the First Tennessee, the last-named not being engaged in the thickest of the fight. The battle began at four o'clock A.M., and lasted all day. General Zollicoffer was killed by Colonel Fry, of Kentucky, and his body found in a wagon. The rebels retreated, and were followed to their intrenchments, which they abandoned during the night. We give, on the preceding page, a picture of the picket of the Tenth Indiana Regiment discovering the approach of the rebels; on page 81 and 89 a spirited engraving of the battle; and on page 84 of 87 Mays showing the results of the conflict.

The Union loss is 39 killed, 127 wounded; that of the rebels is 115 killed, 116 wounded, and 45 taken prisoners. Ten cannon with their ammunition, 100 fine horses wagons, 1200 horses and mules, and several boxes of small-arms were captured by our forces. The rebels crossed the Cumberland River at Oak Springs, and dispersed in every direction. Our forces have also crossed in pursuit. General Thomas having secured the abandoned encampments used by the rebels. General Thomas has not been heard from since he crossed the river, but he will probably occupy Monticello, which the rebels have deserted. The rebel tent was complete, but the Southern papers profess to doubt the news of the affair. Our new Secretary of War has issued the following stirring General Order in relation to this affair:

War Department, January 19, 1862.

The President, Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, has received information of a brilliant victory achieved by the United States forces over a large body of armed traitors and rebels, at Mill Spring, in the State of Kentucky. He returns thanks to the gallant officers and soldiers who won that victory; and when the official reports shall be received, the military skill and generalship displayed in battle will be acknowledged and rewarded in a fitting manner. The carnage that ensued among and vanquished the greatly superior numbers of the rebel force pursued and animated them in their intrenchments, and passed not until the enemy was completely routed, merits and receives confidence. The purpose of this war is to pursue and destroy a rebellious enemy, and to deliver the country from danger. Menaced by traitors, insulted, darling, courageous spirit, and patriotic zeal, on all occasions and in all circumstances, are the best auspices of success and of victory. In the present instance the general movements and during at the battle of Mill Spring the nation will accept the victory; and the people of the United States will rejoice to honor every soldier and officer who proves his courage by combining with his bravery and stirring intrenchments, or in the hlaze of the enemy's fire. By order of the President.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

SCENES AT FORT PICKENS.

We give on page 85 sketches of the two Bombardments of Fort Pickens, furnished by our special artist. The first of these bombardments began on the 22d of November. A heavy firing was kept up, with little damage, only one man in the fort being killed. But two days after, eighteen men were handling a shell which had been thrown from the rebel batteries without exploding. While they were endeavoring to withdraw the fuse the shell exploded, killing six and wounding several others. Our artist has depicted this scene. The second engagement between Fort Pickens and the rebel batteries took place on New-Year's Day, 1862. Colonel Brown, commanding at Fort Pickens, provoked by the conduct of the rebels at Pensacola in firing our camp and their shells, opened fire upon them. This was returned. During the day the Navy-yard at Warrington was set on fire by our shells. Our artist has furnished a view of the conflagration, as it appeared from the fort. He also gives us views of the Fort and its surroundings just before and during the last bombardment.

THE UNION VICTORY IN KENTUCKY.

Before this time our readers will have fully informed themselves in regard to the recent Union victory in Somerset, Kentucky. This plan, the manner, and the results of that brilliant achievement are already familiar. The stirring General Order of the Secretary of War, and the no less stirring chronicles of the newspaper reports, have allotted to the officers and privates of the Union regiments engaged in the battle their due meed of praise. In the advantage which this victory gives us in clearing East Kentucky and in helping to open the way to the capture of Bowling Green and an immediate advance into Tennessee are evident. It remains only for us to consider the direct and indirect effects of our triumph on the people of the rebel States.

We have thus far carefully refrained from expressing any over-sanguine hopes of the speedy issue of the war. So complex are the questions involved, so nice is the discrimination required, and so many are the haps and mishaps in the subjection of this rebellion, that one who sets times and circumstances for the end of the war, runs great risk of belying his prediction falsified by occurrences the most singular and unexpected. Still, if we may trust at all to the signs of the times, the victory at Somerset inaugurates the close of the rebellion, and may be not inappropriately termed "the beginning of the end." And we propose it to be so, not from any knowledge of General M'Clellan's plans and the influence this battle may exert upon them, but for reasons which are more palpable to everyone—and we think, quite as satisfactory.

In the first place, then, whatever may be the strategical value of this victory, it undeniably begins a more active and decisive period of the campaign. The rebels attacked us, for almost the first time, at Somerset, and the encouragement they to hold the fortile though bloody fields of Kentucky that they will again attack us if we do not follow them up. We, ergo rebels, are ready for treason draws a great deal of its sustenance from Kentucky and Tennessee, and will not readily surrender those States. The rebels are in too great straits even to admit of delay. In the Border States are their principal defences and their greatest resources. Kentucky is a Border States, and the rebellion is mortally wounded. Our generals know this. The rebel leaders know it. With characteristic skill and informed, and with both hostile armies so well prepared, neither party has the power to avoid conflicts except by an absolute surrender of all that is worth fighting for. Therefore, as neither the Union nor the rebel armies can afford to decline battle, we may look for conflicts soon and immediately ensue in Kentucky; and we believe that fair, hard fighting will soon end this rebellion.

But the moral aspect of this victory upon the South is disastrous to the rebel cause. Lately there has been a great deal of discontent and complaining among the rebels, and it is very easy to see the uprising of a genuine Union sentiment among the more honest of the traitors. There seems to have been a growing conviction recently that we are too strong for them, and that, after all, they have gained nothing by rebelling against a Government which they themselves had framed, and against laws which they themselves had made. They only to live under a Government and laws which are oppressive, unjust, and unpopular, and which, indeed, they had no hand nor voice in forming. We look to this Somerset victory to strengthen and deepen this conviction, and give it efficacy and direction. The very fact that, at first, the rebel journals unanimously affect to disbelieve the news of the victory, will only make its effect the greater when the suppression of it useless and impossible; as disappointment is always most painful when hope has been most high.

From a variety of sources of information, and from our own personal knowledge, we are led to believe that the strength of this rebellion lies in its misrepresentation. The people of the South are told that New York is as desolate as New Orleans; that our army is as ill-equipped and disorganized as theirs; that our Government is as tyrannical, unjust, and bully conducted as that of Jeff Davis: in short, that we at the North are the same as they are much as they are, and that really the only question is one of endurance. The Southern people would be more than mortal—they would be Americans, if they did not endure as long as possible while they held this belief. But let them be once fully undeceived, let them be shown their own weakness compared with our strength, and, through the natural stages of despondency, despair, desperation, they will turn against their incendiary, traitorous deliders, the Southern people will be rid forever of this fever of rebellion.

The Union victory and those which will follow it will accomplish this undeception. It will be impossible to conceal Zollicoffer's death, impossible to conceal the rout of his army, impossible to conceal the inevitable results of our victory from the Southern masses; and when once our strength and our policy are understood rebellion will hesitate—totter—fall!

THE LOUNGER.

WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

Here and of the rebellion is to be read, perhaps, more nearly the raving fancies of a lunatic than speeches and papers than in any other way. The frantic devices to "sell" the jealousy and hatred of the rebel section toward the Government, so that it may remain as virulent as ever; the amusing perfunctory with which the Government of the United States is called "Lincoln," and loyal citizens "Lincolnites;" the utterly ludicrous statements that of the excellent Mr. Maury to Admiral Fitzroy, that Wilson's Zouaves were furnished each with a halter to hang the rebels that he might capture to the nearest tree; or of the Memphis Avalanche, that Lincoln had emptied his penitentiaries for the border, and had given every criminal a torch to kindle a Confederate city! the hope avowed by the Governor of Georgia and statesman, Foote, that "Lincoln and his infernal Cabinet may be brought to the scaffold for their atrocious offences against the Constitution, which they have perjuriously violated;" and the grave assertion that the war springs from the malignant jealousy of Seward and Secretary—all these signs point directly to that desperation which precedes defeat.

The desponding, querulous bitterness of the Richmond Examiner, in criticising the spectral Government of Jeff Davis, betrays the same sulking and gnawing consciousness of impending disaster. If the rebels at home are now doubtless striking by the National troops are uniformly successful, the spirits of the rebels, now drooping, will be again revived.

And yet they will not "give it up so." A people, like a man, under the exasperation of mingled rage and disappointment, will do very wild and wanton things. If there be any considerable body of rebels remain at the South after the Government they reveal themselves they will be violently attacked by the ingrained Secessionists. The furious, frantic, desperate men of the rebel armies will as willingly turn upon their fellow-citizens and recruit Union regiments as they will attack Federal forces. As every man is, in their estimation, an Abolitionist who does not think chattel slavery the best thing in the world for every one, and who in any circumstances and for any reason is for yielding to the power of the Government, will be denounced and hunted as a Lincolnite. We have had several civil war among themselves; and while our army is steadily moving toward the lines of peace, there be only an armed peace, as it is in Maryland at this moment.

But there is not Peace. For many a month yet the quiet of the rebel section can be maintained only by the bayonet. The great Union army of the Union will be by no means immediately disbanded. Having suppressed rebellion, it will have to protect peace and loyalty. And only as the great root of rebellion is loosened and destroyed, and the Slavery on which the war is waged disappears, will the permanence of peace be secured. After the revelations of this rebellion, and in the circumstances of this time, whoever organizes or defends Slavery—whatever may be his views of the true method of Government—he is held a heart a traitor. Yes; and even if he abstractly thinks Slavery to be right, after this bloody evidence of its utter inconsonance with our government and the popular conviction, he can not labor for its protection or extension without condemnation as a dangerously impracticable visionary. So long as he talks only, he will be pitied and contemned. Should he try overtly to help Slavery, he will be an open traitor.

WORK AND WAGES.

The immediate excitement about Mr. Morgan's purchases for the Government has passed; but the question remains, and it will, under other names, occur again.

One thing is pretty clear—if Mr. Morgan had not undertaken to do the Secretary of the Navy we should have heard very little of the matter. And that shows conclusively that the difficult is in fix a public officer to give public employment and emolument of the kind in question to a relative, without to some extent exposing that act and full to provoke sharp comment.

Another thing is equally clear—that a Government board must ask itself, "How can I get this work done most economically?" That question was asked, and the Secretary answered, and the result was that hundreds of thousands of dollars were saved to the treasury.

Ah, but Mr. Morgan ought to have done it for nothing! The country was in peril, and he should assist in its necessities. It was not generous; it was not patriotic."

Perhaps not. But the Navy Department wanted vessels, and expected to get them. And it got the most faithful service, and made its bargains with economy. That its agent was paid, and justly, is true. But do Government offer the conscientious of virtue as a commission? Would their zeal be well done, or less done, if they did? Mr. Morgan might have done all the work, and have paid his own expenses. Granted. But was the Government to advertise for such a person if Mr. Morgan declined? That gentleman found the whole affair a most laborious transaction, and dealt honorably by all parties, although profitably by himself. And it was a business transaction. If he chose to do it as such, and then add entire renunciation of the profits, it would have been an admirable thing. But that was an utterly different question. Every Government must expect to pay for work. Mr. Morgan did the work well, and was paid.

"Yes; but he was paid too much."

But the record shows that the Government unquestionably saved money through its services, and 2½ per cent. is not an enormous commission when it saves the employer thirty or fifty.

If the purchases and contracts of the War Department had been managed as those of the Navy Department through Mr. Morgan have been, Mr. Dawes could not have made so scathing a speech. Is it not worth while for the Government in future to secure the services of business ability, general ability, special skill and experience, and pay well for his work, rather than "economize" him because somebody ought to be found who may be equally qualified, and may be willing to take his pay in a salary or a great rather than a percentage?

AN ADVANCE AT LAST.

While there has been clamor enough for a forward movement, there has been one who and one of great significance, and that is the advance of the lyceum lecturers upon Washington. In fact, some of these gentlemen, and the accounts of the establishment of our army at Hilton Head and Beaufort and Ship Island, and of the coming of Burnside's expedition, as if it were merely a movement of the van, while the major-generals and the staff and the bream will bring up the rear.

"In the name of good meals, sound hearing, exact science, and the fine arts," exclaimed a lecturer, "there's room enough for all of them." Here we not for fifteen resolis and heroic years lain in the cold load, eaten the cold pie and the cold and the rough steak in the morning, drunk the boot-heel coffee and the straw tea, and through slush and snow and ice and sleet and blizzard held our way, and shall there be no reward? After the vigil and the fasting shall there be no triumphant accolade of knighthood?

Of course there shall be. Henceforth the lyceum lecturer, like the bobolink and the quail he southward way as winter comes, and sit and sing upon the orange-bough and the February rose-tree. Why, the whole tone of public conversation last year, in October he may begin in Boston; by November he will have begun in New York and be still delivering in Pennsylvania and Maryland. Christmas shall find him across the Potomac, and the exact Washington birthday he will be in the Examiner catching his notes as they fall. In January the weary Canadians shall ring with his skill—the dreamy Carolinas that would now so gladly wring his neck. Florida and the Gulf shore shall break into song at his coming for him; and the Rebels, in Natchez, and New Orleans shall his parting song be heard.

The war has not yet lasted a year, and already an American citizen can say what he thinks in the capital of the country. It is a great advance a year, and already he can say in the shadow of Congress that he loves liberty and hates slavery! Who says that the war is not a good thing? Who has been no advance? In the salons of the national metropolis it may not yet be "fashionable" to say it is tolerated, to think that a gentleman pays for the labor he employs, and does not sell the children of other people to pay his own debts. Hallelujah! And there are people who complain of inaction! Hallelujah! Those who can and to be people who think that Liberty once having a fair hold of Washington :: going to let go again! There were people who knew that Washington could not make an egg stand on end. There were people who saw him into his field and say, "Ah, he's done!" and they thought him a fool. They had nearly got through saying, 'I told you so; gone to the bottom,' when he returned with a new continent. The descendants of those people shake their heads in the old way, and prattle the old twaddle, only they do it in newspapers now; and just as they are saying, 'Stuff! nonsense! It always was night, and it always will be'—pop! up comes the sun!"

"Possibly," answered I, as patiently as I could; "but hadn't you better save your lecture for those who will pay for it?" Yet I knew he was right.

THE ROAD TO THE WHITE HOUSE.

There comes occasionally a painful rumor that many officers of the army are not really in earnest in the war; that they think it is an error of the rebels to take up arms to overthrow the best of governments; to shoot their fellow-citizens, and to do all they can to ruin the prosperity of the country, and to blast the hope of constitutional liberty —an error, but still a venial error; an error to be borne with, to be extenuated, to be guarded as much as possible from its natural consequences: in fine, that although most of the people in the Slave States are in open rebellion, it is the people of the Free States who are really guilty. As a consequence of this view, the story is that such officers are nervously anxious to show that they do not share the guilt of loyal citizens, who believe slavery to be the root of rebellion, and try to prove it by the most unscrupulous servility to slave masters.

This may be true of some officers. It is doubtless true of the Colonel who advertised, after the election of Mr. Lincoln, that he was raising a regiment to resist the Government. But it certainly is not true of many officers who had, before the war, been politically allied with the South. It is not true, for instance, of General Burnside; and the war will winnow the earnest men from the trifling—the patriots from the compromisers—fast enough. This nation has been dragged long enough at the tail of slavery. Every other question has long enough been lost in that one: Is he sure for slavery? Every one of the myriad national offices has been long enough a loophole from which a shot was fired at the principles of the Government and at human rights. Not a postmaster, not a custom-house officer, not a man who was paid ten dollars or ten thousand by the national Government, but has been the slave or the apologist of slavery, or has held his tongue and bowed his head in a silence that shamed himself.

The first gun fired at Sumter shot all this stuff away. Henceforth the word Liberty, and not Slavery, is the test word of nationality. Henceforth an American gentleman is a man who pays other men for the labor they do for him; and who does not sell other people's wives and children, or his own, to pay his debts. Henceforth it is not treasonable to repeat the Declaration of Independence, nor fanatical and incendiary to believe it. The people of this country have smothered their convictions—have apologized, and shirked, and submitted to the unscrupulous tyranny of slavery in the Government and in society—because they wanted peace at any price. Now they see precisely what its character is. They know that it can never do any thing worse than it is doing now, and therefore they have no inducement to cringe any longer. They have done licking Mr. Slidell's shoes, and kissing the toe of Mr. Mason's boot. Of course they are not so foolish as to suppose that all slaveholders are bad people; but they are sagacious enough to know that they are all more or less sophisticated. You can not breathe mephitic air and not be poisoned.

Neither are the people of this country so exquisitely silly as to suppose that those who have said that when the fire reached the powder there would be an explosion are responsible for the explosion. To say, "Don't discuss the Slavery question: do let it be: let it take care of itself," was to say, "Don't think: don't feel: don't have any conscience, or reason, or common sense: the devil has the best of it; so let's all go to pot together."

Slavery in this country is doomed; and the rebel leaders knew it, or they would have raised no insurrection. After this rebellion no man of sense will doubt whether or not there is an irrepressible conflict between the rights of man and the wrongs of man. Do you say that it can not be touched? My friend, every thing that withstands the supremacy of the Government can be touched. The log on which you rest your rifle to shoot an honest citizen can be knocked away, and the slave who stands by with another rifle for you, or who stays at home and does your work while you come up to murder us for defending our Government, he also can be knocked away. And he will be.

If any General of the United States army supposes that this nation is going to return to grovel in obsequiousness to slavery, like a dog to his vomit; that a young, vigorous, sagacious people is going to forge again the chains it has once broken—and thinks that the road to the Presidency, it were better for him that he had remained an ensign all the days of his life. Not unconstitutionally—not against the law—but by the will of the people Slavery is doomed. If the bond allow it a pound of flesh, the pound of flesh it shall have, but not a drop of blood. Henceforth, O General, if you would be President, take the road marked "To the Right," not that "To the Wrong."

THE ENNOBLING INSTITUTION.

A good many years ago, the Irish barrister Philips, in a famous speech declared that whenever any slave, of whatever race or color, touched the soil of Great Britain, he rose "redeemed, regenerated, disenthralled." At the present time Great Britain is the especial ally and friend of a faction which is trying to establish a system of society of which the following are incidents. Can a decent Englishman read such things without bitter shame and loathing, that his nation throws the mantle of its sympathy over them? And this war is waged by the rebellion because the people of this country wished that the area in which such things are possible should not be extended.

—"The question of the status of Edward S. Gentry, who is claimed to be both a white man and a darkey, was still further argued before Judge William H. Lyons, on yesterday, but no decision was rendered. The Mayor condemned Gentry to some penalty as a colored person, and he appealed to Judge Lyons to determine his standing."

—"Alec Taylor, an emancipated slave, was brought before the Mayor yesterday for remaining in the State contrary to law; and it being proved that one year since he had been tried and allowed one month to vamose the ranche, the Mayor sent him before the Hustings court, which tribunal will, no doubt, in pursuance of law, order him to be sold into perpetual slavery. The prospect before the darkey is gloomy or gay, as he may choose to regard it."

How justly says the Memphis Avalanche, that "the civilized nations of the earth are beginning to open their eyes to the elevating and salutary effects upon society of this ennobling institution. They see a people reared under its influences displaying * * * all that justice, humanity, magnanimity, moderation, and stainless chivalry, which enter into the highest type of human civilization."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Consoling a Widow.—A clergyman, consoling a young widow on the death of her husband, remarked that she could not find his equal. "I don't know about that," remarked the sobbing fair one, "but I'll try."

Many "contrabands" are very pious in their way, though they have an odd way of expressing themselves even in prayer. We all know about the good darkey who prayed that his beloved mistress might be "like a great roarin' lion seekin' somebody to devour." Down at Port Royal, the other day, an old negro was heard pouring out his soul in a company of his fellows.

"O Lord!" he cried, "bress them Yankee bobolitionist mudsills!"

"Amen!" was shouted vigorously by all his companions.

"De Lord bress ebery one of the dear good mudsills. Dey pays us for pickin' cotton, and massa don't!"

Poor old Sambo had never heard his new Yankee friends designated in any other terms, and so he used the words in his prayer in their behalf.

A Scotch pedestrian, attacked by three highwaymen, defended himself with great courage and obstinacy, and was at last overpowered and his pockets rifled. The robbers expected, from the extraordinary resistance they had experienced, to lay their hands on some rich booty; but were not a little surprised to discover that the whole treasure which the sturdy Caledonian had been defending at the hazard of life consisted of no more than a crooked sixpence. "The deuce is in him," said one of the rogues; "if he had had eighteenpence I suppose he would have killed the whole of us."

Two Irishmen were in prison, the one for stealing a cow, and the other for stealing a watch. "Hallo, Mike! what o'clock is it? said the cow-stealer to the other. "And sure, Pat, I haven't any time-piece handy, but I think it is most milking time."

"Silence! keep silence in Court!" said an angry Judge. "Here we have judged a dozen cases this morning, and I have not heard one of them." Justice was blind as well as deaf.

Lord Campbell, it is well known, was fond of a joke, and sometimes had the tables turned upon himself. A few days before his death he met a barrister who had grown very stout of late, and remarked, "Why, Mr. ——, you are getting as fat as a porpoise." "Fit company, my lord, for the great seal," was the ready repartee.

John Hunter, in demonstrating the jaw-bone, observed that the bone was known to abound in proportion to the want of brains. Some students at the time were talking instead of attending to the lecture, upon which Hunter exclaimed, "Gentlemen, let us have more intellect, and less jaw."

The latest advertisement of an air-tight coffin is, that it protects the form from decomposition, "and can be retained in the parlor as an elegant piece of furniture, without any annoyance whatever."

What is society, after all, but a mixture of mister-ies and miss-eries?

Collins, the sweet poet, was much attached to a young lady who was born the day before him, and who did not return his passion. "Yours is a hard case," said a friend. "It is so indeed," replied Collins, "for I came into the world a day after the fair."

A Tight Fix.—They say there is a man living in this city who attends church regularly, and clasps his hands so tight during praying-time that he can't get them open when the contribution-box comes round.

"Wife," said a man, looking for his bootjack, "I have places where I keep my things, and you ought to know it." "Yes," said she, "I ought to know where you keep your late hours."

"Give me a nice polish, you young scamp," said a dirty swell with a pipe and pork pie cap. "I can't give you one," said the lad; "it would take a cleverer 'man' nor me to do that. But I can polish your boots, Sir."

"I have turned many a woman's head," boasted a young nobleman of France. "Yes," replied Talleyrand, "away from you."

"It is very curious," said a young lady, "that a tortoise, from whom we get all our shell combs, has no hair."

"A man who'll maliciously set fire to a shed," said Mr. Slow, "and burn up twenty cows, ought to be kicked to death by a donkey—and I'd like to do it myself!" Slow is very severe sometimes.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, January 21, in the Senate, petitions for a continuance of the Coast Survey, for a naval depôt at Sandusky, Ohio, and in favor of the emancipation of slaves, were presented. The resolution to allow certain naval officers to receive presents from Japan was adopted. The Judiciary Committee was instructed to consider the expediency of amending the naturalization laws so as to confer the right of citizenship upon foreigners serving in our army. Bills to regulate the compensation of District-Attorneys, and to authorize the examination of certain parties in the Courts of the United States, were presented and referred. The amendment of the House to the bill for the completion of the defenses of Washington was agreed to. An amendment to the act allowing the discharge from the army of enlisted minors was agreed to, providing that no persons under eighteen years of age should be enlisted, and that the oath of enlistment should be conclusive as to age. The amendment imposing the death penalty upon spies and those forcing safe-guards was agreed to. A bill authorizing the President to appoint two Assistant Secretaries of War, to serve one year, at a salary of $3000, was passed. A resolution regulating the compensation of Customs Collectors and Naval Officers was referred. The report of the Judiciary Committee against the expulsion of Senator Bright, of Indiana, was then debated, and Senators Sumner, Lane, of Indiana, and Bright made speeches.——In the House, the Senate bill authorizing the appointment of Assistant Secretaries of War was passed. The bill requiring postage upon printed matter carried outside the mails was debated, and, on motion of Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, it was laid on the table, 75 against 66, thus killing it. Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, gave notice that the Committee proposed levying a tax—perhaps by stamp—on newspapers, and a tax on telegraphic communications.

On Wednesday, 22d, in the Senate, the resolution appropriating $10,000 for expenses of the Joint Committee on the War was passed. The House bill repealing the act exempting witnesses before Congressional committees from criminal prosecution was passed. A bill authorizing the President to take military possession of certain railroad and telegraph lines was referred. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, made a strong speech in favor of the expulsion of Senator Bright, of Indiana, and against the Abolitionists. ——In the House, the bill for the increase of the clerical force of the War and Navy Departments was passed, and also the Senate bill authorizing certain naval officers to receive presents from Japan. The Committee on Ways and Means reported a bill authorizing the issue of United States notes, and providing for the redemption and funding thereof, and for the funding of the national floating debt, which was made the special order for Tuesday, 28th. A bill was reported from the Military Committee for the paying of field-officers of volunteer regiments for services rendered prior to the complete organization of their regiments. The President was requested to inform the House if the act requiring officers of new regular regiments appointed from civil life to be assigned to recruiting service had been complied with, and how many officers had been thus employed. A resolution was adopted asking the Secretary of War whether and when a military force can be detailed to guard the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, so that the road may be repaired. Messrs. Diven, of New York, and Stevens, of Pennsylvania, spoke upon rebellion and slavery.

On Thursday, 23d, in the Senate, petitions for the employment of homeopathic physicians in the army, a joint resolution of the Michigan Legislature in favor of exchanging prisoners of war, and a remonstrance against suspending the Coast Survey were presented. The amendments to the Washington Defense bill, providing that no new works be commenced, and imposing the death-penalty upon spies and those forcing safe-guards, were agreed to and the bill passed. The House amendment to the bill increasing the clerical force of the War and Navy Departments was concurred in, and the bill passed. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, concluded his speech in favor of expelling Senator Bright, of Indiana, and advocated the hanging of secessionists and abolitionists in pairs.——In the House, the Naval Appropriation bill, a bill establishing a postal money-order system, a bill regulating the prize laws, and a bill for a military and mail railroad from Kentucky to Tennessee, were reported. Mr. Alley, of Massachusetts, Mr. Harrison, of Ohio, Mr. Van Horn, of New York, and Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, made speeches.

On Friday, 24th, in the Senate, the credentials of Robert Wilson, appointed Senator from Missouri, vice Senator Polk expelled, were presented, and Mr. Wilson took the oath and his seat. The resolution appropriating $10,000 for expenses of the House Special War Contract Investigating Committee was passed. The bill relating to judicial districts of United States Circuit Courts was passed. Bills creating two new naval bureaux and granting charters for banks in the District of Columbia were referred. Senators Davis, Harlan, Sumner, Cowan, Harris, Ten Eyck, and Clark, debated the resolution regarding the expulsion of Bright, of Indiana. The Senate went into executive session.——In the House the joint resolution appropriating $10,000 for expenses of the War Contract Investigating Committee was adopted. The Senate bill appropriating $25,000 for protection of emigrants on overland routes to the Pacific was passed. The bill providing more stringent regulations of the sale of liquors to Indians was passed. Resolutions of the Legislature of New York in favor of enactments to prevent frauds in furnishing Government supplies, were referred to the Special Committee on the Investigation of War Contracts. The House non-concurred in the Senate's amendments to the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill including Florence among the Consul Generalships and striking out Hayti and Liberia. Mr. Blair's bill for the emancipation and colonization of slaves of rebels was postponed till Tuesday, and both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, 28th, in the Senate, petitions for the establishment of a national armory west of the Alleghanies; against all traffic in public lands; in favor of continuing the coast survey; for the employment of homeopathy in the army, and in favor of the emancipation of slaves, were presented. Resolutions of the New York Assembly in regard to frauds upon the Government were received. Committee on Naval Affairs reported upon the reply of the Secretary of the Navy in regard to vessels purchased for the Government, censuring the action of the Secretary. By joint resolution the Superintendent of the Census Bureau was ordered to furnish the War Department with statistical information. A resolution inquiring whether the ship-of-the-line Alabama can be converted into a steamer was laid over. Senator Wilson introduced a bill providing for the more effectual suppression of the slave-trade. An amendment to the joint rules providing that both Houses may go into secret session, upon certain contingencies, to act upon matters pertaining to the rebellion, was discussed. Senator Latham, of California, opposed the expulsion of Bright, of Indiana. Executive session followed.——In the House, a bill for the construction of a military road to Denver City was referred. Mr. Colfax introduced a bill to render postage on printed matter more uniform. A debate on rebellion and slavery took place, and the Military Appropriation, bill was passed without amendment. The appropriations for the executive, judicial, and legislative branches of the Government were discussed, but the House adjourned without action.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

A special messenger, with dispatches from General Burnside, reached Washington on the morning of the 28th Jan. They are dated "Head-quarters, Department of North Carolina, Hatteras Inlet, Jan. 26, 1862."

General Burnside states: We left our anchorage at Annapolis on Thursday, the 9th, and, after a protracted passage, owing to dense fogs, arrived at Fortress Monroe on Friday night, at twelve o'clock. Leaving Fortress Monroe on Saturday, at ten o'clock in the morning, we proceeded at once to sea, but, owing to fogs on Sunday night, our progress was very slow. On Monday, the 13th, the weather cleared, with a heavy wind and a rough sea, which caused our vessels to labor very heavily, and some were obliged to cut loose from the vessels they were towing. Most of them, however, passed over the bar, and anchored inside the harbor about twelve o'clock noon on the 15th, just in time to escape the severe gale of Monday night and Tuesday.

The propeller New York ran on the bar at the entrance to the harbor, and, owing to the severe weather and want of small boats, we could render her no assistance. She was laden with stores, and was lost.

The General also says he had been led to believe that he would find experienced pilots at Hatteras, but had great difficulty in accomplishing his wish for want of proper accommodations. He adds that he would commence that day to build a wharf for landing supplies. The men were cheerful and patient, and he would proceed with confidence.

An accident occurred in an effort to relieve the steamer New York, by which a boat was swamped, and the lives of Colonel Allen, of the Ninth New Jersey, his surgeon, and a mate of the boat were lost.

After the arrival of the expedition at Hatteras the enemy made their appearance in one or two vessels, on a reconnoitering expedition. Our boats gave chase and drove them back.

The health of the men is excellent: the deaths from disease unusually few. The troops are cheerful, and full of confidence in the General commanding, who is at work night and day. There can be little doubt that in a few days every thing will be ready for the advance.

THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

All the members of the gun-boat navy are ordered to report at Cairo immediately, as a sudden and speedy movement is expected.

WISE RATS DESERTING A SINKING SHIP.

The French residents of New Orleans have applied to our Government through General Phelps, at Ship Island, for permission to leave New Orleans in a body, as they despair of the blockade being raised or the Confederacy recognized.

REBEL STONE FLEETS.

The Southern journals are calling upon the rebel government to save "Lincoln's stone fleet" trouble by obstructing Southern harbors and rivers for us, so as to prevent the entrance of our expeditions. The London Times will please make a note of this.

GOVERNOR LETCHER DRUNK.

The Richmond Examiner of the 23d rebukes Governor Letcher for entering the legislative chamber drunk, and sitting with a cigar in his mouth during the session—"a spectacle for the whole house, and a butt for the jokes of the gallery."

CAPTURE OF CEDAR KEYS, FLORIDA.

We have intelligence, via Savannah, of the capture of Cedar Keys, a group of islands on the west coast of Florida, by the Union forces. These islands form the western terminus of the Florida railroad, which runs across the Peninsula, and their capture cuts off a most important route of rebel communication between the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

General M'Clellan has fully recovered his health and resumed his duties. In spite of the prevalent inclement weather the amount of sickness in the army does not exceed that of any community of the same number of persons. The Hutchinson band of minstrels were turned out of the camps recently for singing Abolition songs to the soldiers. Governor Sprague has offered three regiments of infantry and two batteries of artillery to defend Washington when the forward movement is made.

DEPARTMENT OF MISSOURI.

The accounts from interior Missouri are indefinite, but Price is probably still in retreat. General Halleck has issued an order that any attempt to interfere with the execution of an order from head-quarters will be regarded and punished as a military offense; and he has ordered Mr. Engel, a wealthy secessionist, to leave the Department of Missouri, for resisting, by civil process, the assessment ordered upon all secessionists for the benefit of Union refugees. General Jim Lane has arrived at Chicago on his way to take command of his Southern overland expedition. In a speech he promised to give each one of his 34,000 soldiers a freed slave to wait upon him. General Price has written to ask whether General Halleck intends to hang bridge-burners and received an affirmative reply.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Secretary Stanton has ordered that two United States Commissioners be appointed to visit the cities of the South where our officers and men are confined, and adopt such measures for their comfort as the rebel authorities will permit. This action looks toward an exchange of prisoners, and is received with great rejoicing. Ex-Governor Hamilton Fish, of New York, and Bishop Ames, of Ohio, have been appointed as the Commissioners, have accepted, and will go South with the next batch of exchanged rebels.

FROM THE REBEL STATES.

The rebel journals are still attacking Jeff Davis's Government, and complain of inactivity, disease, and want, in and out of the army. The rebel government has prohibited the publication of any war news, except by authority, to suppress, probably, the news of the Kentucky defeat. Ex-President Tyler deceased, at Richmond, Virginia, on the 17th inst. A plan for governmental smuggling was broached at Richmond.

ANOTHER EXPEDITION IN EMBRYO.

Besides Captain Porter's mortar fleet, not yet sailed, there appears to be another expedition in embryo, as the War Department has inquired of the authorities of Massachusetts and Rhode Island what number of troops from these States can be put in active service within seven days.

THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The Treasury Note Bill reported to Congress by the Committee of Ways and Means provides for the issue of $100,000,000 of demand notes without interest, and $500,000,000 of twenty years' six per cent. bonds, the demand notes to be fundable. The Secretary of the Treasury approves the bill.

DISCOVERY OF RELICS OF WASHINGTON.

The Hon. Caleb Lyons has discovered, at Arlington House, Virginia, a set of porcelains presented to Washington by the Society of Cincinnati; pieces of a tea set presented to Mrs. Washington by Lafayette; Washington's field tent, portmanteau, tea-table, cabinet, punch-bowl, treasure chest; two vases presented by Mr. Vaughn, of London; two candelabra, presented by Count Rochambeau, and the blanket under which Washington died. Arlington House was the residence of General Lee (rebel), whose wife was the daughter of G. W. P. Custis, the favorite of Washington. The articles are deposited at the Patent Office.

NEW YORK STATE DEFENSES.

In his recent report, General Arthur, Engineer-in-Chief of the State of New York, recommends a large increase of our harbor and lake fortifications; the immediate manufacture of guns of large calibre; the construction of iron-clad steam gun-boats for the lakes, and the exercise of the militia in the management of heavy sea-coast artillery.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE MASON AND SLIDELL AFFAIR.

The City of Washington arrived at Queenstown on the 8th instant with the news of the surrender of Mason and Slidell by the United States Government. The news was gratifyingly received in financial and commercial circles.

The London Times and other English journals state that the settlement of the Trent affair is perfectly satisfactory. The Times hopes that no ovation will be given to Mason and Slidell, whom it pronounces "blind and habitual haters and revilers of England;" and it adds, "England would have done as much to rescue two negroes." The Tuscarora is still watching the Nashville at Southampton. The expenses of England in the Trent affair are estimated at £2,000,000.

FRANCE.

French official circles felt much satisfaction at the settlement of the Trent affair, and on the Bourse there was an immediate rise of one per cent. The Moniteur says that profound regret and indignation has been aroused by our destroying the port of Charleston. The Emperor has appointed Marshall Magnan grand master of the Free Masons in France. The Masons have hitherto chosen their own grand masters.

SPAIN.

The American consul has received orders to protest against the admission of the Sumter to the port of Cadiz. It was said that Spain would protect the American prisoners made by the Sumter.

RUSSIA.

It was reported that Russia had threatened to recognize the Kingdom of Italy if the Pope does not condemn the Polish clergy. The St. Petersburg Journal (official organ) congratulates Mr. Seward upon his upright policy, and demands that England shall solemnly guarantee neutral rights, apropos to the Trent affair.

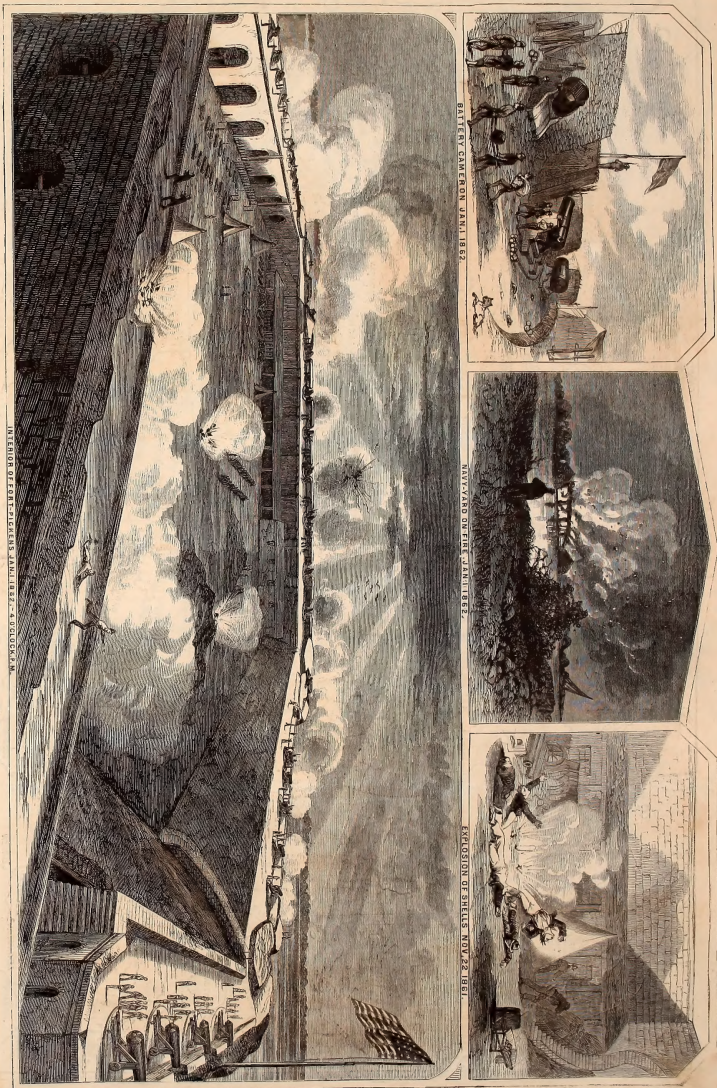
CHINA.

We have news from Canton to the 30th November. Prince Kun, Chief of the Regency, had executed an imperial coup d'etat in Pekin, by imprisoning all the members of the Cabinet of the Emperor, and organizing a new Ministry.

HON. EDWIN M. STANTON, SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE REBEL GENERAL ZOLLICOFFER, KILLED AT THE BATTLE OF SOMERSET.

HON. EDWIN M. STANTON.



EDWIN M. STANTON, now Secretary of War, whose portrait we here give, is about 55 years of age. He was born at Steubenville, Ohio, where he began the practice of law, after having graduated at Kenyon College. He is the author of a portion of the Reports of the Supreme Court of Ohio, which bear his name. In 1848 he removed to Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, where he at once took his place at the head of the bar. Early in the administration of Mr. Buchanan Mr. Stanton was selected by Attorney-General Black to represent the Government in the important land cases in California. When Mr. Case, a little more than a year ago, resigned his post as Secretary of State, Mr. Black, the only loyal member of the Cabinet, was appointed to the place; and at his request the Attorney-Generalship, which he had vacated, was urged upon Mr. Stanton, who accepted it reluctantly, and at great loss to himself. In the Cabinet he soon found himself associated with Holt and Dix, and to their efforts is due the patriotic courge which marked the last few weeks of Mr. Buchanan's Administration. Mr. Stanton has been through life a firm and uncompromising Democrat, and his nomination and unanimous confirmation as head of the most important Department under a President of another party is the best proof of his eminent fitness for the post. He brings to it great administrative skill and executive firmness. His recent order in respect to the transaction of business shows that he is fully aware of the work to be done.

GENERAL ZOLLICOFFER.

FELIX K. ZOLLICOFFER, whose portrait appears on this page, was born May 19, 1812, in Maury County, Tennessee. After receiving an ordinary school education he served a few months in a printing-office, and then, at the age of seventeen, took the management of a country newspaper. His principal occupation has been that of an editor, though he held at various times offices in his own State. He was originally a Whig in politics; and when, in 1855, all the parties in Tennessee opposed to the Democrats united under the name of the American party, Mr. Zollicoffer was elected to Congress from the Nashville district. When his State seceded he went with the majority, and was appointed a Brigadier-General in the Confederate Army, although he had no previous military experience. He was a man of considerable ability and undoubted courage; by the rebels he was considered as one of the most promising of their officers. He fell at the battle of Somerset (or Mill Springs), fought on the 19th of January, in a vain attempt to break a link in the chain which is being wound around the rebel body in the West.

GOD'S SOLDIER.

"If I were only a strong man!"

A sick girl sat propped up with cushions, near an open window, in the early September days, while summer yet lingered among the green leaves and flowers with which she had beautified the land. Her face was almost ghostly in its whiteness. Far back in their sockets lay her eyes, which neither pain nor wasting sickness had been able to dim. Her shadowy hands, with their long transparent fingers, lay, one upon the other, on the other resting, like a piece of exquisitely cut marble, on a purple cushion.

Not very far away from the gates of death. The mad had slowly gone down from the sparkling plain, and was crowding in among the shadowy cypresses. Not far away from the gates of death. She knew it, and was not afraid.

"If I were only a strong man!" The tremulous life, shrill but exhilarant; the throbbing drum, changing the tune in her head; the sharp, sudden thing; the reverberant tread of armed men—these were yet in her ears, though the pageant was gone. Weak, sick, dying as she was, she was also quickened by a new inspiration.

"But I am nothing." She sighed a little while afterward, letting the white lids, with their thick fringe, fall over glittering eyes.

"Nothing. Alive?"

The shut lids flew open, and the bright eyes were in the questioner's face.

"Fear and I do? I am not a man."

"No. You are a weak, sick girl."

"So weak, that even your hands can not even knit."

"Just so, weak. Alive!" The voice was pondered with tenderness.

There are sick soldiers in our hospitals. But I can not even knit, much less, nor do so much as to hold a cup of cold water to feverish lips."

"No, you can not do such work."

"I am helpless. I can do nothing! And, yet, I would give my life, if that would avail any thing, for our country. To me, people do not seem to be half in earnest, and seem to comprehend but in part in which we are involved. Men talk of business and gain, and women of dress and pleasure, as if no enemy were at the gates, mad for our destruction. Yet, sometimes, as I pass the street or from the windows, and warn the people of a danger they do not appear to heed."

"If you could infuse your spirit into one who has the strength to stand up in the face of our enemies."

The sick girl raised her head from among the cushions, as if half surprised way.

"My spirit into another?" she said.

"Yes."

"Into whom?"

The answer did not come until her question was repeated. Then the name "Howard" was spoken.

"Howard!" It was evident that a new light gone through her heart. Her lids fell quickly, and her face burned itself among the purple cushions.

"When our country is in danger, God lays upon us the duty of praying for its deliverance from the precious things."

The sick girl lifted her head again. If the pale face could be paler, it was paler now.

"Howard is a good patriotic," she said.

"I believe it. Alive."

The eyes were shut again. A hard struggle was in progress.

"If I were not so weak, Aunt Phebe. If the time were not so near at hand." Her lips quivered, and tears fell over her cheeks. Silence followed.

"Only in the degree that God gives us strength are we willing to offer for my little life," she then answered. "You asked 'What can I do?' and the question is answered. Our nation cannot have your strong enthusiasm. Vitalize another soul with your strength. Alive! Alive! Howard stands closely, Alive, when Howard has been here. You are not, supposedly, the same as when he left you, are when he is absent. You do not talk as strongly, by about the war, and if he shows any thing like military order, are silent. Not a single stimulus, so far as observed by me, have you offered to his love of country. Is this right? Are you doing your highest duty in thus seeking to hold him back from the noble path of patriotism and defendant? Howard brave; I know him to be sound in principle. He longs to take chief rank among our brave best soldiers. And why is he not in the army? The answer is with you. You have the power to go, and he will move at once to the call of duty. Into his manly strength you war your life. Alive! Alive! On the battle-field your brave words will be in his thought and inspire him invincible. Alive what you do, Alive? You can give a man to the army of freedom—you filled with your own spirit—nothing can bring to her so that his country is saved."

Leave me to myself, Aunt Phebe," said the sick girl. "God will no doubt give me strength, but I feel very weak now."

Aunt Phebe laid her lips tenderly on Alice's forehead, and then went out.

For a long time, shadowing lashes lay close upon white cheeks. The pale thin mouth was shut. It was a sad mouth now. Was there strength enough? Could the sick girl bear this parting with her lover? and parting in which there was a risk of separation? And deeper still than this went the pang. She thought of wounding and of death. Could she give that precious one to these? Send him away by a word to encounter in his very prime of life the terrible things of which she had read as befalling in battle? Her weak heart shuddered. She grew faint and sick when the images she summoned wrought into almost life-like existence. But this state passed. Gradually the flowerlike strength changed the character of its creations. She did not see the dark things of fear, but the great success that lay beyond the strife of battle-field. And now was revived the old ardor of patriotism. Up from the valley of doubt and fear she walked with firm step and a new light on her face. Her crutches lay unused. She had opened and a young man entered. He was in age not past twenty-three; yet he had a firmly-set mouth, an eye of piercing, and the step of one who has studied, were already maturing into distinct life purposes.

"Dear Alice!" he said, and kissed her. Then taking her little hand, thin and colorless almost as a snow-flake, he held it very tenderly, looking down and bending toward her as she lay among her purple cushions—gazing into her face and drinking of its sweetness.

"If you were not so weak, Alice. There was a moment in which I was torn beyond the mere reason of regret. Alice felt this, and, as the tightened hold on his hand told me."

"If I were not so weak—what then, Howard?"

"I should have gone to the war in the army for a little while, and then his eyes dropped to the floor.

"What then?" She pressed him for an answer.

"I could not from you for a little while."

He saw her start. But instead of grief or pain, a soft smile lay upon her lips.

"Where?"

He stood up, drawing his form erect.

"I am a soldier, Alice, by birth and nature." She did not answer, but her eyes were in his face.

"Do you understand me, Alice?" His voice was just a whisper, and he bent his head down, taking the hand he had relinquished a moment before.

"I think so." She spoke very evenly.

"I would not go from you upon you, Alice, God calls."

"I believe it," she answered.

It has called upon me—has been calling for months. The summons is in my ears day and night, and, without it, I can not breathe calmly disobedient. But how can I go, and you so weak to-day? Alice, I am a soldier, and you love, husband, but the call of duty grows more and more imperative every hour."

"You speak truly, Howard," was the firmly-given answer. "I am not afraid of sacrifice and for God calls. I have heard the voice, and recognize it. Go, my brave love, and God be with you. What can I do? I, so weak, so helpless—just able to be lifted from my bed to the sofa? Is the minister even to my own needs. Oh, I have trembled in every nerve with excess of desire to respond."

"Let me take of your spirit, darling!" said the young man, bending down to her again. His face was upon her cheeks. "Let me lift from your weak bleeding heart the load of sacrifice for me and for it upon my own. Strengthen me with your love! Say to me, as Alice has, words of power of my hearts. I am ready to bear your gage of honor to the battle-field for you, and for God and right."

No fear came upon her heart. God was giving strength unasked. She felt it in her warm, and the shrunken flesh, instilled by stronger pulse, then, seemed to receive a new and fuller blood.

"Go forth!" she answered, "and may God give you courage and endurance!"

The sick girl laid her head upon the bosom of her lover, and in the enthusiasm of the hour was happy.

But did not her steps falter as she moved along this new path of duty? Did not all sorts of fears and gloom, and the ardor that flowed from the love on occasion, fall back? Alice knew that her steps were daily descending to the river of death, and that the dark waters of the world be amidst the encompassing waves. Over the river feels one can not be disheartened, and the shining ones on the bank ready to receive her soon. She had conquered the human weakness that would hold her from the path of duty, and found strength given him to his country in the hour of need.

How brave he looked in his uniform! How manly and noble! Alice felt a thrill of pride at his love. Never a word of weakness—never a look of pain—never a tear. Alice was strong in an inspiring strength. She hardly seemed to him a sick girl, but one who, having received new power, the way through danger to duty.

The time of parting came. Alice had not dared to trust herself to think of this hour. Would she have strength for trial? Strength of spirit? Yes! But the heart would be weak, and the stronger with human emotions; and the frail body might not meet the test.

"God's love and God's strength go with you, Howard!" Alice said, in a firm voice. "Be a true soldier! I shall be near you, always near you, Howard."

He kissed her over and over again. Drew her closely to his heart, and then left her in the long fold of impassioned love. Then, without utterance, took his manly strength.

A messenger reached him an hour afterward as he was assisting to the duties of embarkation. his regiment having been ordered to the front. The nature of this summons was such that he obtained leave to remain with Alice for a few moments on the next day.

The detail of parting had been too severe for Alice. The strength that came to her was unnatural, as the strength of soldier before his duties. The scene passed she became to weak and tremulous that she could no longer sit among the cushions in her great arm-chair, but had to be lifted to the bed, where she lay, with eyes closed, and breath so low that Aunt Phebe, as she stood over her, was somewhat in doubt as to whether she moved or not. Half an hour she thus lay. Then her lips moved, and to Aunt Phebe bent down her ear she caught the whispered name of Howard. It was then that she dispatched the messenger, who was just in time to find the young soldier before his departure.

"Alice!" The voice went down to the region of consciousness. Slowly the eyelids unclosed themselves, and there was light and joy in eyes that looked up to Howard.

"Oh, Howard!"

"How is dear Alice?"

She smiled sweetly, but feebly; and her eyelids fell, as if the weight of the world pressed them down.

"Alice!" he called, tenderly—"Alice!"

"I am better now, Howard."

"Do you know me, Alice?"

"Yes."

"Who am I?"

Her eyes, now fixed and becoming glassy, were looking steadily into his eyes.

"God's soldier!"

As the words left her lips a brief smile played over them. Then the eyelids fell, and a veil was drawn over the sullen face. It was the veil of death!

"God's soldier!" said the young man, sit, then, upon, turned to tears from a new-made grave, "God's soldier! fear, and without reproach!" Amen!"

Prompt to the call of duty; patient under suffering; all-enduring; tender to the sick as a woman; quick to help the weak; pure from all sin; and, at the end, the step of one who has fought a good, into whose life had flowed the lofty enthusiasm of another life, move among his fellows. That your spirits his spirit was infused. They felt the motive, and the unconquered courage, and found, in his true words fitly spoken, an inspiration to noble deeds. Give your own to our armies, and having justice on our side, victory is sure to perch upon our banners.

God's soldiers! Men inspired by no thirst of blood—no hatred of their fellow-men—no mere love of danger and adventure, but self-devoted for their country; strong and brave from duty; ready to go forward to battle to defend great principles of human rights when assailed. Such are the soldiers of God, whose cause is righteous and holy. Send them forth, true wives, mothers, sisters, maidens! Yes, maidens. Lay no restraining hands upon their garments—put no hindrances in their way. God requires this now by the fall, for all the powers of hell are moving to destroy the outposts of civil freedom.

POULAILLER THE ROBBER.

A BRETON legend said that the devil adopted Poulailler from the hour of his birth.

When Guy Eder was born under mansion which had his parents to suppose that, while the bodily part was to be his care, the spiritual part is subjected to a course of infernal influences between—that are his father and mother to do with him? They had not the best they can—which was enough—what Poulailler and his wife did with the hero of this story.

In the first place, they had him christened instantly. It was observed with horror that his infant face was marked with grimaces, and that his infant voice reared with a preternatural lustiness of tone the moment the priest touched him. "Ugly and bad-tempered," said the neighbors, "and he was old enough to go to school. "Thrash him," said Poulailler, and his master thrashed him well. "He won't come to his first communion," said the priest. "Thrash him," said Poulailler—and the young man, released by the farmer's cudgel, went and robbed; the neighboring rabbit-warrens were depopulated; lines were stolen from the gardens, and were found in the pockets of the boy. "Thrash Poulailler's boy!" was the general cry. "The devil is in the boy!" said Poulailler's master. "And yet he is a nice-looking boy," said Madame Poulailler. And he was—as tall, as strong, as handsome as any young man in the parish of Fraisce. "Let us pray for him," said Madame Poulailler. "Thrash him," said her lord and master. "Our son has been thrashed till all the sticks in the neighborhood are broken," pleaded his mother. "Let us try him with kindness to the end next," retorted his father; "he shall go to sea, and live in an atmosphere of thrashing. Our son shall be a sailor." It was all one to Poulailler Junior—he knew as well as his father who had adopted him—and he went to sea, and became, pine—and a cabin-boy he became at ten years old.

After two years of the rope's-end (applied quite indiscriminately by the mate and the boatswain) the captain, and ran away in an English port. London became the next scene of his adventures. At twelve years old he persuaded society in the Metropolis that he was the forsaken natural son of a Breton Count, by an English lady, and that, having providing for him for four years, opened its eyes and found him out at the age of sixteen; upon which he refused to own him, and entered the army in the capacity of drummer. At eighteen he deserted, as he had done at sea, and, having by this fortunes, h. conjured, he danced on the tight-rope, he acted, he sold quack medicines, he almost starved, he was a member of a troupe of mimes, he fell in love with the vivacities of his new regiment in the Portuguese major of the company, tended by the same amiable weakness, already represented his attentions to the lady. Poulailler (generally supposed to be married himself to Madame Poulailler's cast. Out fathed the swords on both sides, and in went Poulailler's blade through and through the left forearm of the opposing champion. The frontier was close at hand. Poulailler wiped his sword, and crossed it.

Sentence of death was recorded against him in his absence. When society has condemned us to die, if we are not very quiet, how are we to return the compliment? By condemning society to destroy itself. Poulailler went north, by rubbing right and left for a living. Feudalism in Brittany was now accomplished. He was picked out to be the Seigneur Thief in his age; and when Napoleon mined him to his place in the world he stepped forward and took it.

His first exploits were performed in Germany. They showed such novelty of combination, such originality of conception, such a mixture of audacious moments, such irresistible gayety and goodhumor, that a band of congenial spirits gathered about him at once.

On a Monday in the week he had stopped on the highway, and robbed of all his valuables and all his papers, an Italian nobleman—the Count Ferucci, of Sienna. On Tuesday, he was ready for another adventure. He was dressed in the coat of a stout bill, he watched the road which wound up to the entrance of the castle, while his followers were ensconced on the road which led down from it on the other. The prize expected, in this case, was the treasure-chest (which held a large sum of money inside) of the Baron de Kirbergen.

Before long Poulailler discovered the carriage after all, at the bottom of the hill, and in advance of it, ascending the eminence, two ladies on foot. They were the Baron's daughters—Wilhelmina, a fair beauty; Frederica, a brunette—both lovely, both accomplished, both susceptible, both young. Poulailler sauntered down the hill to meet the fascinating travelers. He looked, bowed, introduced himself, and let the carriage pass on before the spot. Both the charming girls acknowledged, in the gentlest manner, that confinement to the carriage had given them the fidgets, and that they were walking up the hill to try the remedy of gentle exercise. Poulailler's heart was touched, and his infinite facility to the sex was roused in the nick of time. With a polite apology to the young ladies, he ran back by a short cut to the ambush on the other side of the hill in which his men were posted. "Gentlemen!" cried the gallant Thief, "in the charming name of Wilhelmina de Kirbergen, I charge you all, let the Baron's carriage pass free." The band were astonished, but they obeyed. Poulailler knew the men, and he had studied to their hearts in vain—he now appealed to their pockets. "Gentlemen!" he resumed, "excuse my momentary misconception of your sentiments. Here is my own half share of the Kirbergen property. Enjoy it. I divide it among you will you let the carriage pass free?" The band knew the value of property, accepted the terms, Poulailler came back back up the hill, and arrived at the top just in time to hand the young ladies into the carriage.

"Charming man!" said the white Wilhelmina to the brown Frederica, as they drove off. Innocent soul! what would you have said if she had known that her personal attractions had saved her father's property? What else ever so much more than one again? Yes: she was to see him the next day—and, more than that, Fate was hereafter to link her fate to the robber's life and his career.

Confiding the direction of the band to his first lieutenant, Poulailler followed the carriage on horseback, and ascertained the place of the Baron's residence that night.

The next morning a superbly-dressed stranger knocked at the door. "What name, Sir?" said the servant. "The Marquis Petrucci, of Sienna," replied Poulailler. "Have you any letters of introduction?" The Marquis was shown into a room, and introduced to the Baron. The Baron was naturally delighted to receive a brother nobleman —Miss Wilhelmina was modestly happy to see the charming man she had met in the morning—she affectionately pleased on her sister's account. Not being of a disposition to lose time when his affections were concerned, Poulailler expressed his sentiments to the beloved object that evening. The next morning's post-bag contained a letter for the Baron, at which he produced the papers which proved him to be the Marquis. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the result of the correspondence—the two noblemen embraced. They were still in each other's arms when a stranger was announced at the door. "What name, Sir?" said the servant. "The Marquis Petrucci, of Sienna," replied the stranger. "Impossible!" said the servant; "this lordship is now in the house." "Show me in, scoundrel," cried the visitor. The servant submitted, and the two Marquises stood face to face. Poulailler's composure was not shaken in the least; he had come there for a purpose, and he had got the papers. "You are the villain who robbed me!" cried the true Petrucci. "You are drunk, mad, or an impostor!" said the false Petrucci. "Send to Florence, where I am known," exclaimed one of the Marquis, apostrophizing the servant. "Send to Florence by all means," echoed the other, addressing himself to the Baron also. "Gentlemen," replied the noble Kirbergen, "I am the guest of the honor of taking your advice"—and he sent to Florence accordingly.

Before the messenger had advanced ten miles on his journey Poulailler had said two words in private to the Baron's daughters, and had the pair eloped from the baronial residence that night. Once more the subject of this Memoir crossed the frontier and re-entered France. Insensible to the attractions of rural life, he forthwith established himself with the beloved object in Paris. In that superb city he met with his strangest adventures, performed his boldest achievements, committed his most prodigious robberies, and, at the end of all himself and his infernal patron the fullest justice.

Once established in the French metropolis, Poulailler planned a series of robberies, the extent of perpetual robbery and occasional homicide which made him the terror of the respectable people of Paris. In-doors, as well as out, his good fortune befriended him. No domestic anxieties harassed his mind and diverted him from his career. He had established public career. The attachment of the charming creature with whom he had fled from Germany survived the discovery that the Marquis Petrucci was Poulailler the robber. True to the principles of his education, the fierce Breton shared his fortunes and kept his house. And why not, if she loved him?—in the name of Cupid, why not? Poulailler was free from his fair-weather wife's sorrows, and by new revivities gotted together in Paris, Poulailler soon found himself in circumstances of affluence. Cartouche himself was his inferior in audacity and cunning. In course of time the whole city was paralyzed by the news of a robbery in the hand—the very Boulevards were deserted after midnight. Monsieur Hénault, Minister of police of the period, in despair of laying hands on Poulailler by any other means, at last offered a reward of a hundred thousand francs and a place worth sixty two thousand livres a year to any one who would apprehend the robber. "I will have nobody but myself over Paris—and, the next morning, they produced the very last result in the world which the lieutenant of police would have anticipated.

While Monsieur Hénault was at breakfast in his study, the Count de Villeneuve was announced as desiring to see him. The Count de Villeneuve was by name only, as belonging to an ancient family in Provence, or the Languedoc. Poulailler had secured him to be shown in. A perfect gentleman appeared, dressed with an admirable mixture of magnificence and good taste. "I have something for your private ear, Sir," said the Count. "Will you give orders that no one must be allowed to disturb us?" Monsieur Hénault gave the orders. "May I inquire, Count, what your business is?" he asked, when the door was closed. "To earn the reward you offered for taking Poulailler," answered the Count. "I am Poulailler!" Before Monsieur Hénault could open his lips the robber produced a pretty little dagger and some rose-col-cred silk cord. "The point of this dagger is poisoned," he observed; "and one scratch with it, my dear Ike, would be the death of you." With these words, Pouhalier gagged the lieutenant of police, bound him to his chair with the rose-colored cord, and lightened his writing-desk of one thousand pistoles. "I'll take money down, instead of taking the place in the office which you kindly offer," said Pouhalier. "Don't trouble yourself to see me to the door. Good-morning!"

A few weeks later, while Monsieur Hérault was still the popular subject of ridicule throughout Paris, lieutenant-cols. Fairfax and Rolph in Lille and Cambrai. The only inside passenger in the coach to Calais himself was the venerable Dean Potter, of Hesselia. They fell into talk on the one interesting subject of the time—not the weather, but Pouhalier. "It's a disgrace, Dr. Potter," said he, "and the Dean," that such a miscreant is still at large. I shall be returning to Paris, by this road, in two days, and I shall not be easy in my mind, Hérault to suggest a plan of my own for catching the scoundrel." "May I ask what is it?" said Pouhalier. "Excuse me," replied the Dean.

"you are a stranger, Sir—and, moreover, I wish to keep the merit of suggesting the plan to myself." "Do you think the lieutenant of police will see you?" asked Pouhalier; "he is not accessible to strangers when the lieutenant you speak of placed him that trick at his own breakfast-table." "I will see Denis Potter, d'Hesselia," was the answer delivered with the slightest possible tinge of offended dignity. "Oh, unquestionably!" said Pouhalier—"I beg your pardon, my—" "Simply, Sir," said the Dean—and the conversation flowed into other channels.

Nine days later the wounded pride of Monsieur Hérault was soothed by a very remarkable letter. It was signed by one of Pouhalier's aliases, who offered himself as King's evidence, in the hope of obtaining a pardon. The letter stated that the venerable Dean Potter had been wrapped and murdered by Pouhalier, and that the robber, with his customary generosity, was about to escape from the Lisle coach, the next day, disguised in the Dean's own clothes, and furnished with the Dean's own papers. Monsieur Hérault took the precautions without losing a moment. Picked men were stationed, with their orders, at the barrier through which the coach must pass to enter Paris; and even the lieutenant of police waited at his office, in the company of two French gendarmes who had speak to the Dean's identity, in the event of Pouhalier's impudently persisting in the assumption of his victim's name. At the appointed hour the coach appeared, and out of it got a man in the Dean's costume. He knew himself in spite of the precautions; the papers of the murdered Potter were found on him, and he was dragged off to the policeoffice in triumph. In the door opened, and the posse comitatus entered with the prisoner. Instantly the two swimmers burst out with a cry of recognition, and turned indignantly on the lieutenant of police. "Gracious Heavens, Sir, what have you done?" they exclaimed in horror; "this is our old friend—here is our venerable friend; here is the Dean himself!" At the same moment a servant entered with a letter for Denis Potter. It was a note of Monsieur Hérault, Lieutenant of Police." The letter was expressed in these words: "Venerable Sir,—Profit by the lesson I have given you. Be a Christian for the future, and never again try to injure a brother minister. At this price I remain, Entirely yours, Pouhalier."

These feats of cool audacity were matched by others, in which his generosity to the sex asserted itself as magnanimously as ever.

Hearing, one day, that large sums of money were kept in the house of a great lady, one Madame de Brienne, whose door was guarded, in anticipation of a visit from the famous robber, by a number of approved trust-worthiness and courage, Pouhalier called to ask to be hired in spite of these precautions, and succeeded. With a stout pair of leather straps and buckles in his pocket, and with two of his band, disguised as a coachman and footman, he followed Madame de Brienne one night to the theatre. Just before the close of the performance the lady's coachman and footman were tempted away for five minutes by Pouhalier's disguised subordinates to have a glass of wine. The exchange was made to detain them, or to drug their liquor. But, in their absence, Pouhalier had himself driven to the carriage, had hung his leather straps round the box—one to hold by, and one to support his feet—and, with every single passenger, was now ready to await for events. Madame de Brienne entered the carriage—the footman got up behind—Pouhalier hung himself horizontally under the pole, and was driven home with them, under these singular circumstances. He was not suspected in any bad position, after the carriage had been taken into the coach-house; and he only left it when the doors were locked for the night. Provided with food beforehand, he waited patiently, hidden in the coachhouse, for two days and nights, before finding an opportunity of getting into Madame de Brienne's boudoir.

On the third night the lady went to a grand ball —she servants relaxed in their vigilance while her back was turned—and Pouhalier got into her bedroom. He found two thousand louis d'ors, which was nothing like the sum he expected; an à peck-de-book, which he took away with him, and left at home. It contained some stock-warrants for a comparatively trifling amount. Pouhalier was far too well off to care about taking them; and, on the opposite, where a lady was concerned, not to send them back again, under those circumstances. Accordingly, Madame de Brienne received her warrants with a note of apology from the polite thief. "Pray excuse my visit to your charming boudoir," wrote Pouhalier, "in consideration of the false reports of your wealth, which arose indeed me to enter it. If I had known what your pecuniary circumstances really were, on the honor of a gentleman, Madame, I should have been incapable of robbing you. I can not return your two thousand louis d'ors by post, as I return your warrants. But if you are at all pressed for money in future, I shall be proud to assist so distinguished a lady by lending her, from my own private resources, double the sum of which I regret to have deprived her on the present occasion."

On another occasion Pouhalier was out one night taking the air and watching his opportunities on the roofs of the houses, a member of his band being posted in the street below to assist him in case of necessity. While in this position, who will grown suddenly from an open back-garret window caught his ear. A parapet rose before the window, which Pouhalier was able to climb down and look in. Starving children surrounding a dying mother, and clamoring for food, was the picture that met his eye. The robber was one of the most beautiful; and Pouhalier's hand impulsively clutched his purse, as a necessary consequence. Before the charitable thief could enter by the window a man rushed in by the door, with a face of horror, and cast a bundle into the lap of the dying woman. "My honor is gone," he cried, "but our children are saved! Listen to the circumstances! I met a man in the street below; he was tall and thin; he had a green patch over one eye; he was talking so suspiciously at this house, apparently waiting for somebody. I thought of you—I thought of the children—I seized the suspicious stranger by the collar. Terror overwhelmed him on the spot. 'Take my watch, my money, and my fine valuable coat-buttons,' he said, 'but spare my life.' I took them." "Nothing else?" said I, cried Pouhalier, appearing at the window. The astonished father screamed, and dropped his children half themselves. "Let me entreat you to be composed," continued Pouhalier. "Sir, I enter on the scene for the purpose of soothing your agony conscience. From your vivid description I recognize the man whom you describe. Here are your wife's lap. Resume your mental tranquillity. You have robbed a robber—in other words, you have vindicated society. Accept the congratulations of your restored innocence. The miserable coward whom I rather you would have killed himself. He has lost his stolen property as the fit punishment for his disgraceful want of spirit." "Who are you?" exclaimed the father. "I am Pouhalier," replied the illustrious man, with the simplicity of an ancient hero. "Take this purse, and set up a business with the contents. Good-night, Apollyon, Sir, in favor of honesty. Give that prejudice a chance. There is my card." Such was the money I regret to feel it no longer. Under all varieties of misfortune an honest man has his consolation still left. Where is it? Here! Let me strike his heart—and the faithful fly on their knees before him. "Thousand thunders!" cried the brave husband, "how can I show my gratitude?" "You can permit me to kiss the hand of Madame," said Mr. Pouhalier. Madame did so, and fled for fear and embraced the generous stranger. "What else can I do?" continued the lovely woman, eagerly. —Oh, Heavens! what else?" "You can help your husband to light the down stairs," replied Pouhalier. He knocked out their hands, dropped a generous tear, and departed.

This last anecdote closes the record of Pouhalier's career in Paris. The lighter and more agreeable aspects of that career have hitherto been de liquidly preserved in the contemporary memoirs, in contrast which the tragic side of the picture must now present. Comedy and Sentiment, twin sisters of French conversation, "farewell!" and enter next on the stage, and enters welcome.

The various and contradictory conclusive observements in the art of robbery may be realized by reference to one terrible fact. In the police records of the period many of the most daring and lifemen and women are reckoned up as having met their deaths at the hands of Pouhalier and his band. Such was not the practice of the honorable robber to take life as well as property, unless life happened to stand between him and his prey, in which case he immediately swept off the obstacle without hesitation and without remorse. His deadly determination to kill Pouhalier, if he fell into the population in general, was matched by his deadly determination to spare the life of every man hit by followers in particular. One of their number, for example, having withdrawn from his allegiance, and having afterward set himself up as a security leader, was tracked to his hiding-place in a cellar, and was shot through the heart.

To attempt the arrest of such a man as this by tampering with his followers was impossible. He had not unnecessarily put his life in his own capture, first by eloping with Mademoiselle Williamina de Kriegsau, and secondly by maintaining her, it is more than doubtful whether the iron arm of the law would ever have reached far enough to fasten its grasp on him. As it was, the extremes of love and hatred met at last in the bosom of the devoted Wilhelmina; and the vengeance of the latter passion, combined with the love of the whole police force of Paris had been powerless to achieve.

Pouhalier, however, had his weaknesses as well as attachments, had wearied at an early period of the companion of his flight from Germany—but Wilhelmina was not to be shaken off. Her affections, once aroused, will not take No for an answer. She persisted in attaching herself to a man who had ceased to love her. Pouhalier's patience became exhausted; he tried twice to rid himself of his unhappy mistress—once by the knife and once by poison—and failed on both occasions. For the third and last time, by way of attempting an experiment of another kind, he established a rival to drive the German woman out of the house. From that moment his fate was sealed. Abandoned by jealous rage, Wilhelmina cast the last fragments of her fondness to the winds. She secretly communicated with the police—and Pouhalier met his doom.

A night was appointed with the authorities, and the robber was invited by his discarded mistress to a farewell interview. His contemptuous confidence in her folly led him to the accustom of his customary precautions. He accepted the appointment; and the two supped together, on the understanding that they were henceforth to be friends, and nothing more. Toward the close of the meal Pouhalier was startled by a ghastly change in the face of his companion.

"What is wrong with you?" he asked.

"Nothing," she answered, looking at her glass of wine. "I can't help loving you still, badly as you have treated me. You are a dead man, Pouhalier—you shall not survive me."

The robber started to his feet, and seized a knife on the table.

"You have poisoned me!" he exclaimed.

"No," she replied. "Poison is my vengeance on myself—not on you—not on you. You will rise from this table as you sat down to it. But you will be hanged in Lille prison; and your life will be ended on the Wheel."

As she spoke the words the door was burst open by the police, and Pouhalier was secured. The same night the poison did its fatal work; and his mistress rose to meet him with her life for the first last act of treachery which had ever betrayed her to the man she loved.

Pouhalier lodged in the hands of justice, the robber tried to gain time to escape in by promising to make important disclosures. The manœuvre availed him nothing. In those days the Laws of the Land had not yet made acquaintance with the Laws of Humanity. Pouhalier was put to the torture—was suffered to recover—was publicly broken on the Wheel—and was taken off it alive to be burned at the stake. By these merciless means Society rid itself of a murderous man, and the Hero on the Boulevards took their evening walk without him.

LILY.

In that part of Virginia where the scenery is wild and grand, and the districts thinly settled, in the year 1—, there lived a widow lady named by the name of Fairfax. As only son and herself composed the whole household, with the usual retinue of house-servants and field-hands, for Mrs. Fairfax died soon after the family returned to the old homestead.

Randolph Fairfax was a bright lad of fourteen when his father died—a bright, handsome lad, not a little spoiled by his pranks. Indeed, the only thing very winning in his high spirit and joyous face; but it was impossible to be angry with him, excepted in him to see how completely his mother was under his thumb—led around hither and you, yielding all her will to his every caprice, petting him in his nonsense and mischief, no matter what were the results, as if she were something to make further than to check; but she was very loving, and her only her husband made her tender and easy with her boy. She was a timid mistake that made her so bad as he should have been educated who was in every thing—never made to study—never tried to be a man—always pursuing pursuit, and determined to grow as vines do in the woods, twining themselves where they can find a tree to climb upon. Randolph became dictatorial, and the servants served. They winked at his mischievousness, and he, in return, was fond with gifts; yet there was no love him too, for he had a frank, merry way with him, for all his domineering and commanding manner, amounting to imperiousness.

In this desultory way he grew to be a man of fifteen, and then sixteen, though, still, at that time a cousin of Mr. Fairfax from New Orleans was invited to visit, bringing two or three servants with her—one, a beautiful quadroon, so white that she was called Lily. This girl pleased the fancy of Mrs. Fairfax, and when the cousin went away she begged Mrs. Fairfax to keep Lily as a souvenir of her visit.

To please Mrs. Fairfax was delighted; and Lily too, was much pleased, as she was an orphan, and had no kin in the world. She was the tenth and tidiest servant imaginable, and exhibited astonishingly mild to Mrs. Fairfax, she soon proved herself to be a treasure. She was quick to learn, and did not turn her hand to. Never had the point looked so clean, the dishes so bright, the curtains so spotless, nor the whole air of the house so comfortable till Lily held sway. She made the negroes work, she worked just as hard herself, always dressed jauntily and neatly, and always singing as she moved about like an industrious bird.

Randolph was getting wilder than ever, and his mother could do little with him except indulge him. He thought the work of her, and it was no wonder the poor girl's heart was in a tumult. She always dressed him in his scraps—for he tried to have some consideration for his mother—so Lily was generally in his sight.

Randolph taught Lily to read, and often when she was at work in his mother's room he would bring his book there, and books to read aloud, strictly for Lily's benefit, as Mrs. Fairfax was getting very deaf, and she did dislike to read aloud—edge it, and listened as if she heard every word.

Randolph used to meet Lily in the woods, and Lily would bring him in his scraps—and, indeed, at if he had quite forgotten that her position was the hundred one in the world, Lily knew. It was wrong; very wrong; but Mrs. Fairfax was so easy and indolent, never during to interfere with her son's pleasures, or not liking the exertion of combating his tastes.

About a year or so passed away. Lily had been absent on a visit, as it was said, of several weeks. One morning there was rather a stormy scene between Mrs. Fairfax and her son in her room. It was very unusual: she was seldom roused to remonstrance, and even then she seemed to be begging a simple request as if it were a great favor.

"Oh, go, Randolph! will you not?" she implored.

"Well," said he, "if you promise to treat her the same as ever—show no difference in your manner—I will go."

"Yes, Randolph, I am willing; but it is a terrible disgrace."

A mocking laugh answered her.

"Randolph, my son, do you wish to kill me with unkindness?"

"Oh no, mother; but you look upon an everyday affair too solemnly."

"Dear, dear! Well, I do not mean to be harsh, Randolph." That was the customary finale to her weakest suggestion of reproof.

"So I am to go to Philadelphia next month and begin my studies?"

"Yes; and no knows but what you may be the physician of our State?"

Again Randolph laughed his derisive laugh. It was not to be endured at. He lay on the sofa next to the man, he would never deny himself pleasure long enough to win fame.

Lily came home, pale and weak, with a little child in her arms.

No one would have believed she had ever been a gay, light-hearted girl, she was so sad and woebegone, so dull and spiritless; her large, lustrous eyes had lost their rich tears, and she seemed to have blown in a listless, indifferent way.

The sober servants did not dare to say any thing, but their looks were disagreeable enough. There was one man, the coachman, black as the sea of spades, who had tried to be very gallant to Lily, but whom she had always disdained to notice; he would never show any of them.

Ah! it was pitiable to see poor Lily, so dejected and forlorn, working as busily as ever, but never singing, never smiling, and crying. Her little child grew prettier every day, and its mother seemed to care for nothing else. She avoided Randolph as if he had been a rattlesnake, and never spoke to him if she could help it. He went to Philadelphia, but in a few months returned, a confirmed of the medical school, as might easily have been predicted.

One stormy night, when the forest trees were bending and swaying about, the old house creaking and shaking, the shutters rattling, and the doorfastenings, and the wind screaming through the keyholes, Lily, lying wide awake in her little bed in one of the mistress's apartments, thought she heard a tapping on her window-pane. She often heard sounds at night, and had become used to singular sounds; so she was not frightened, but rose with her child in her arms, and looked out. It was a dreadful night, and in the bright flash she saw Randolph with hat and cloak on.

"Lily," said he, "I am going away in the early stage, and I thought I'll bid you good-by."

"Well!" said she, in the coldest tone, but with a heart-throb of pain and pain under every word.

"Is that all you care? Then I need not have spoken, it seems. You seem to think I am an ogre, he continued.

"Oh, Randolph, don't talk to to me. I am sometimes tortured to know what to say or entertain. Don't taunt me."

"I am not taunting you, Lily; but you are unkind, you never even speak to me."

Again she repressed her feelings, and he said some kind and tender things to her, that caused her fretting child closer, and shook her head sadly. At last he said:

"Well, Lily, as you may hear it rather roughly, I may as well tell you."

She looked up in alarm.

"Don't be frightened; I will always see that you are kindly treated."

"What is my child!" she almost screamed.

"Hush, hush, little simpleton, no one wants your child. I am going to marry, and have you in my way. I am going away to be married. Good-by!" And he bounded over the fence and was gone.

Lily sank down on her bed with her crying child, clasping it even tighter though clear fear was past. Tears slowly rolled down her face; but as she had been heartbroken before, the worst of her unhappiness could not well be heavier. No one knew of her sorrow, and none after that; but what a poor, crushed life was hers!

It was true—Randolph had gone to be married to a lady-love, whom he had met at Mr. Fairfax, and in a few weeks would bring his bride home.

Mrs. Fairfax and there was preparing for the young married people; such sweeping, and dusting, and rubbing, and cooking!

Lily was very busy when Mr. Fairfax was expected; game and jellies, creams and cakes, filled all the tables. Her own sorrowful heart-ache would compel to find itself so full, and looked condescendingly down at the eggs-nog, fruity and delicious, beside it. She had to taste it, and every one could determine, and visitors were arriving constantly.

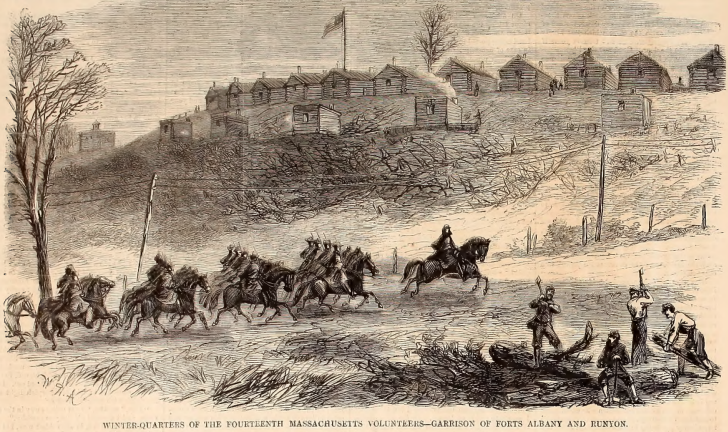
Mrs. Fairfax had told Lily to arrange flowers in the bride's dressing-room, and she was standing at the mirror wreathing the candle-brackets, her spoon hopped up and full of flowers, when a lovely girl came in laughing; her eyes were blue, her hair a golden brown, and happy and joyous looking indeed that Lily paused to admire her—just as an unhappy person will be fascinated by one who seems sorrow to have.

"Is this Mrs. Fairfax?" asked Lily.

The sweet voice that laughed, and answered:

"Yes, though I hardly know myself yet by that name. Oh, what lovely flowers! Do arrange some in my hair."

Lily assisted her off with her bonnet and traveling dress, and attired her in an exquisite, pearly silk; her curls just touched her snowy shoulders, while around the coil of braids Lily wove a wreath of white and delicate-hued flowers.



The servant stood, of course, behind her young mistress, who handed the rose, one by one, to her. That rose pricked her finger.

"Ah, lady, all roses have thorns," said Lily, sadly.

"And all pleasures their alloy, of course," said Mrs. Fairfax, wiping her pretty finger. Just then Randolph appeared at the door.

"Ah, what a lovely picture!" he said, casually. "Only something to complete it, perfect it," said his wife, putting her round, white arm in his and leading him away.

Lily was very pale, and a fearful light flashed in her eye. Who could tell what dreadful thoughts were lurking in her poor mind?

Randolph's wild oats seemed to have rendered the soil of his heart too unfruitful to bear even the commonest virtues. He was no longer the joyous, bright-faced boy of former years. He even tired of his young and lovely wife. Long days she sat alone, with Lily and old Mrs. Fairfax; for Lily was as useful as ever. She seemed to have conquered the demon of jealousy, which had prompted revengeful feelings, and under the religious teaching of her mistress she was becoming patient and resigned.

I have mentioned that there was an ugly fellow, the coachman, who had been gallant, or tried to be, to poor Lily. Just as she was regaining peace of mind he made new overtures, which she indignantly rejected. In sheer spite and malicious wickedness he managed to convey to young Mrs. Fairfax the history of the year previous to her coming to her Virginia home. It nearly killed her; she became very ill. Randolph sold the man; but now that his secret was out he became more and more reckless, riding fast and drinking hard—what a changed man he was!

All during young Mrs. Fairfax's illness Lily had been kept out of the room; indeed, she knew enough to stay out, much as she loved the gentle girl who had been so kind to her. She had been sitting on a fallen tree, just beyond the garden-gate, one day, her child playing with grass and pebbles, when she saw a horse come dashing up the road. She seized the child just in time to save him; but a glance at the empty saddle was sufficient to confirm her worst fears. Hastily running in the house she told the news: the servants startled out, but soon returned, bringing the lifeless body of Randolph Fairfax. He had been thrown, probably while intoxicated, and instant death must have ensued the blow which his head had received.

Ah, what a scene of misery was there in that lonely old house in the Virginian forest! The rooms were resonant of echo; the servants were like children in their unrestrained grief. Old Mrs. Fairfax was frantic; and Lily, almost beside herself, was the only one fit to attend to her young mistress, who had heard the terrible sounds, and insisted upon knowing the truth. Lily had to break the news, but the shock was too great; swoon succeeded swoon in fearful rapidity. Toward midnight she became conscious, but it was evident she was dying. Calling Lily to her, the sweet young creature put out her hand to her.

"Come here, Lily, come here! I have felt very wrongly toward you."

Lily made no answer; but on her knees by the bedside buried her face in the clothes, weeping bitterly.

"We must both forgive him, Lily."

Only a low groan and a quivering sigh.

"Lily, look up in my face. I can not die tranquilly until I know that you will try to feel no bitterness in your heart, and that you will forgive my want of charity—for I felt very wrongly toward you."

Lily looked up in the sweet face, growing paler, the soft blue eyes, drooping with the sleep which would cease her sorrow; eagerly she grasped that outstretched, soft, white hand, and bathed it with her tears and kisses. The blue eyes closed; the faint breath faltered and ceased; the glowing hopes of life had taken wing before—with one slight hand, even heavy with its wedding-ring, lying on her motionless breast, the other in poor Lily's, that life had ended.

In the room beneath, alone and stiffened in the rigidity of death, with all his sins upon him, the sins fostered by indulgence, lay Randolph Fairfax.

I have little more to add; for Lily and the old lady lived on in that lonely house quietly enough after all that misery. When old Mrs. Fairfax died she gave Lily free papers for herself and her son, which, with a small sum of money, enabled them to go to Canada.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

My Work, my Philosophical Work—the ambitious hope of my intellectual life—how eagerly I returned to it again! Far away from my household grief, far away from my haggard perplexities. Neither a Lilian nor a Margrave there!

As I went over what I had before written, each link in its chain of reasoning seemed so serried, that to alter one were to derange all: and the whole reasoning was so opposed to the possibility of the wonders I myself had experienced, so hostile to the subtle hypotheses of a Faber, or the childlike belief of an Amy, that I must have destroyed the entire work if I had admitted such contradictions to its design!

But the work was I myself! I, in my solid, sober, healthful mind, before the brain had been perplexed by a phantom. Were phantoms to be allowed as testimonies against science? No; in returning to my Book I returned to my former Me!

How strange is that contradiction between our being as man and our being as author! Take any writer enamored of a system—a thousand things may happen to him every day which might shake his faith in that system; and while he moves about as mere man, his faith is shaken. But when he settles himself back into his old fleshless form of author, the mere act of taking pen in hand and smoothing the paper before him restores his speculations to their ancient mechanical train. The system, the beloved system, reasserts its tyrannic sway, and he either ignores, or moulds into fresh proofs of his theory as author, all which, an hour before, had given his theory the lie in his living perceptions as man.

I adhered to my system: I continued my work. Here, in the barbarous desert, was a link between me and the Cities of Europe. All else might break down under me. The love I had dreamed of was blotted out from the world and might never be restored; my hearth might be lonely, my life be an exile's. My reason might at last give way before the spectres which awed my senses, or the sorrows which stormed my heart. But here, at least, was a monument of my rational, thoughtful Me—of my individualized identity in multiform creation. And my mind, in the noon of its force, would shed its light on the earth when my form was resolved to its elements. Alas! in this very yearning for the Hereafter, though but the Hereafter of a Name, could I see only the craving of Mind, and hear not the whisper of Soul?

The avocations of a colonist, usually so active, had little interest for me. This vast territorial lordship, in which, could I have endeared its possession by the hopes that animate a Founder, I should have felt all the zest and the pride of ownership, was but the run of a common to the passing emigrant, who would leave no sons to inherit the tardy products of his labor. I was not goaded to industry by the stimulus of need. I could only be ruined if I risked all my capital in the attempt to improve. I lived, therefore, among my fertile pastures, as careless of culture as the English occupant of the Highland moor, which he rents for the range of its solitudes.

I knew, indeed, that if ever I became avaricious, I might swell my modest affluence into absolute wealth. I had revisited the spot in which I had discovered the nugget of gold, and had found the precious metal in rich abundance just under the first coverings of the alluvial soil. I concealed my discovery from all. I knew that did I proclaim it, the charm of my Bush-life would be gone. My fields would be infested by all the wild adventurers who gather to gold as the vultures of prey round a carcass; my servants would desert me, my very flocks would be shepherdless!

Months again rolled on months. I had just approached the close of my beloved Work when it was again suspended, and by an anguish keener than all which I had previously known.

Lilian became alarmingly ill. Her state of health, long gradually declining, had hitherto admitted checkered intervals of improvement, and exhibited no symptoms of actual danger. But now she was seized with a kind of chronic fever, attended with absolute privation of sleep, an aversion to even the lightest nourishment, and an acute nervous susceptibility to all the outward impressions, of which she had long seemed so unconscious; morbidly alive to the faintest sound, shrinking from the light as from a torture. Her previous impatience at my entrance into her room became aggravated into vehement emotions, convulsive paroxysms of distress. So that Faber banished me from her chamber, and, with a heart bleeding at every fibre, I submitted to the cruel sentence.

Faber had taken up his abode in my house and brought Amy with him; one or the other never left Lilian, night or day. The great physician spoke doubtfully of the case, but not despairingly.

"Remember," he said, "that, in spite of the want of sleep, the abstinence from food, the form has not wasted as it would do were this fever inevitably mortal. It is upon that phenomenon I build a hope that I have not been mistaken in the opinion I hazarded from the first. We are now in the midst of the critical struggle between life and reason; if she preserve the one, my conviction is that she will regain the other. That seeming antipathy to yourself is a good omen. You are inseparably associated with her intellectual world; in proportion as she revives to it, must become vivid and powerful the reminiscences of the shock that annulled for a time that world to her. So I welcome rather than fear the over-acuteness of the awakening senses to external sights and sounds. A few days will decide if I am right. In this climate the progress of acute maladies is swift, but the recovery from them is yet more startlingly rapid and complete. Wait—endure—be prepared to submit to the will of Heaven; but do not despond of its mercy."

I rushed away from the consoler—away into the thick of the forests, the heart of the solitude. All around me there was joyous with life; the locusts sang amidst the herbage; the cranes gamboled on the banks of the creek; the squirrel-like opossums frolicked on the feathery boughs. "And what," said I to myself—"what if that which seems so fabulous in the distant being, whose existence has bewitched my own, be substantially true? What if to some potent medicament Margrave owes his glorious vitality, his radiant youth? Oh! that I had not so disdainfully turned away from his hinted solicitations—to what?—to nothing guiltier than lawful experiment. Had I been less devoted a bigot to this vain schoolcraft, which we call the Medical Art, and which, alone in this age of science, has made no perceptible progress since the days of its earliest teachers—had I said in the true humility of genuine knowledge, 'these alchemists were men of genius and thought; we owe to them nearly all the grand hints of our chemical science—is it likely that they would have been wholly drivelers and idiots in the one faith they clung to the most?'—had I said that, I might now have no fear of losing my Lilian. Why, after all, should there not be in Nature one primary essence, one master substance, in which is stored the specific nutriment of life?"

Thus incoherently muttering to the woods what my pride of reason would not have suffered me gravely to say to my fellow-men, I fatigued my tormented spirits into a gloomy calm, and mechanically retraced my steps at the decline of day. I seated myself at the door of my solitary log-hut, leaning my cheek upon my hand and musing. Wearily I looked up, roused by a discord of clattering hoofs and lumbering wheels on the hollow-sounding grass track. A crazy, groaning vehicle, drawn by four horses, emerged from the copse of gum-trees—fast, fast along the road, which no such pompous vehicle had traversed since that which had borne me—luxurious satrap for an early colonist—to my lodge in the wilderness. What emigrant rich enough to squander, in the hire of such an equipage, more than its cost in England, could thus be entering on my waste domain? An ominous thrill shot through me.

The driver—perhaps some broken-down son of luxury in the Old World, fit for nothing in the New World but to ply for hire the task that might have led to his ruin when plied in sport—stopped at the door of my hut, and called out, "Friend, is not this the great Fenwick Section? and is not yonder long pile of building the Master's house?"

Before I could answer I heard a faint voice within the vehicle speaking to the driver; the last nodded, descended from his seat, opened the carriage-door, and offered his arm to a man, who, waving aside the proffered aid, descended slowly and feebly; paused a moment as if for breath, and then, leaning on his staff, walked from the road, across the sward rank with luxuriant herbage, through the little gate in the new-set fragrant wattle-fence, wearily, languidly, halting often, till he stood facing me, leaning both wan, emaciated hands upon his staff, and his meagre form shrinking deep within the folds of a cloak lined thick with costly sables. His face was sharp, his complexion of a livid yellow, his eyes shone out from their hollowed orbits, unnaturally enlarged and fatally bright. Thus, in ghastly contrast to his former splendor of youth and opulence of life, Margrave stood before me.

"I come to you," said Margrave, in accents hoarse and broken, "from the shores of the East. Give me shelter and rest. I have that to say which will more than repay you."

Whatever till that moment my hate and my fear of this unexpected visitant, hate would have been inhumanity, fear a meanness, conceived for a creature so awfully stricken down.

Silently, involuntarily, I led him into the house. There he rested a few minutes with closed eyes and painful gasps for breath. Meanwhile the driver brought from the carriage a traveling-bag and a small wooden chest or coffer, strongly banded with iron clamps. Margrave, looking up as the man drew near, exclaimed, fiercely, "Who told you to touch that chest? How dare you? Take it from that man, Fenwick! Place it here—here by my side!"

I took the chest from the driver, whose rising anger at being so imperiously rated in the land of democratic equality was appeased by the gold which Margrave lavishly flung to him.

"Take care of the poor gentleman, squire," he whispered to me in the spontaneous impulse of gratitude; "I fear he will not trouble you long. He must be monstrous rich. Arrived in a vessel hired all to himself, and a train of outlandish attendants, whom he has left behind in the town yonder! May I bait my horses in your stables? They have come a long way."

I pointed to the neighboring stables, and the man nodded his thanks, remounted his box, and drove off.

I returned to Margrave. A faint smile came to his lips as I placed the chest beside him.

"Ay, ay!" he muttered. "Safe, safe! I shall soon be well again—very soon! And now I can sleep in peace!"

I led him into an inner room, in which there was a bed. He threw himself on it with a loud sigh of relief. Soon, half raising himself on his elbow, he exclaimed, "The chest—bring it hither! I need it always beside me! There, there! Now a few hours of sleep; and then, if I can take food, or some such restoring cordial as your skill may suggest, I shall be strong enough to talk. We will talk!—we will talk!"

His eyes closed heavily as his voice fell into a drowsy mutter. A moment more and he was asleep.

I watched beside him in mingled wonder and compassion. Looking into that face so altered, yet still so young, I could not sternly question what had been the evil of that mystic life, which seemed now oozing away through the last sands in the hour-glass. I placed my hand softly on his pulse: it scarcely beat. I put my ear to his breast, and involuntarily sighed as I distinguished in its fluttering heave that dull, dumb sound in which the heart seems knelling itself to the greedy grave!

Was this indeed the potent magician whom I had so feared? This the guide to the Rosicrucian's secret of life's renewal, in whom but an hour or two ago my fancies gulled my credulous trust?

But suddenly, even while thus chiding my wild superstitions, a fear that to most will seem scarcely less superstitious, shot across me. Could Lilian be affected by the near neighborhood of one to whose magnetic influence she had once been so strangely subjected? I left Margrave still sleeping, closed and locked the door of the hut, went back to my dwelling, and met Amy at the threshold. Her smile was so cheering that I felt at once relieved.

"Hush!" said the child, putting her finger to her lips, "she is so quiet! I was coming in search of you, with a message from her."

"From Lilian to me—what! to me?"

"Hush! About an hour ago she beckoned me to draw near to her, and then said, very softly, 'Tell Allen that light is coming back to me, and it all settles on him—on him. Tell him that I pray to be spared to walk by his side on earth, hand-in-hand to that heaven which is no dream, Amy. Tell him that—no dream.'"

While the child spoke my tears gushed, and the strong hands in which I veiled my face quivered like the leaf of the aspen. And when I could command my voice I said, plaintively,

"May I not, then, see her?—only for a moment, and answer her message, though but by a look?"

"No, no!"

"No! Where is Faber?"

"Gone into the forest, in search of some herbs, but he gave me this note for you."

I wiped the blinding tears from my eyes, and read these lines:

"I have, though with hesitation, permitted Amy to tell you the cheering words, by which our beloved patient confirms my belief that reason is coming back to her—slowly, laboringly, but, if she survive, for permanent restoration. On no account attempt to precipitate or disturb the work of Nature. As dangerous as a sudden glare of light to eyes long blind and newly regaining vision, in the friendly and soothing dark, would be the agitation that your presence at this crisis would cause. Confide in me."

I remained brooding over these lines and over Lilian's message long and silently, while Amy's soothing whispers stole into my ear, soft as the murmurs of a rill heard in the gloom of forests. Rousing myself at length, my thoughts returned to Margrave. Doubtless he would soon awake. I bade Amy bring me such slight nutriment as I thought best suited to his enfeebled state, telling her it was for a sick traveler resting himself in my hut. When Amy returned I took from her the little basket with which she was charged, and having meanwhile made a careful selection from the contents of my medicine-chest, went back to the hut. I had not long resumed my place beside Margrave's pillow before he awoke.

"What o'clock is it?" he asked, with an anxious voice.

"About seven."

"Not later? That is well; my time is precious."

"Compose yourself and eat."

I placed the food before him, and he partook of it, though sparingly, and as if with effort. He then dozed for a short time, again woke up, and impatiently demanded the cordial, which I had prepared in the mean while. Its effect was greater and more immediate than I could have anticipated, proving, perhaps, how much of youth there was still left in his system, however undermined and ravaged by disease. Color came back to his cheek, his voice grew perceptibly stronger. And as I lighted the lamp on the table near us—for it was growing dark—he gathered himself up, and spoke thus:

"You remember that I once pressed on you certain experiments. My object then was to discover the materials from which is extracted the specific that enables the organs of life to expel disease and regain vigor. In that hope I sought your intimacy. An intimacy you gave, but withdrew."

"Dare you complain? Who and what was the being from whose intimacy I shrunk appalled?"

"Ask what questions you please," cried Margrave, impatiently, "later—if I have strength left to answer them. But do not interrupt me while I husband my force to say what alone is important to me and to you. Disappointed in the hopes I had placed in you, I resolved to repair to Paris—that great furnace of all bold ideas. I questioned learned formalists; I listened to audacious empirics. The first, with all their boasted knowledge, were too timid to concede my premises; the second, with all their speculative daring, too knavish to let me trust to their conclusions. I found but one man, a Sicilian, who comprehended the secrets that are called occult, and had the courage to meet Nature and all her agencies face to face. He believed, and sincerely, that he was approaching the grand result, at the very moment when he perished from want of the common precautions which a tyro in chemistry would have taken. At his death the gaudy city became hateful; all its pretended pleasures only served to exhaust life the faster. The true joys of youth are those of the wild bird and wild brute in the healthful enjoyment of Nature. In cities, youth is but old age with a varnish. I fled to the East; I passed through the tents of the Arabs; I was guided—no matter by whom or by what—to the house of a Dervish, who had had for his teacher the most erudite master of secrets occult, whom I knew years ago at Aleppo— Why that exclamation?"

"Proceed. What I have to say will come—later."

"From this Dervish I half forced and half purchased the secret I sought to obtain. I now know from what peculiar substance the so-called elixir of life is extracted; I know also the steps of the process through which that task is accomplished. You smile incredulously? What is your doubt? State it while I rest for a moment. My breath labors; give me more of the cordial."

"Need I tell you my doubt? You have, you say, at your command the elixir of life of which Cagliostro did not leave his disciples the recipe; and you stretch out your hand for a vulgar cordial which any village chemist could give you!"

"I can explain this apparent contradiction. The process by which the elixir is extracted from the material which hoards its essence is one that requires a hardihood of courage which few possess. This Dervish, who had passed through that process once, was deaf to all prayer, and unmoved by all bribes, to attempt it again. He was poor, for the secret by which metals may be transmuted is not, as the old alchemists seem to imply, identical with that by which the elixir of life is extracted. He had only been enabled to discover, in the niggard strata of the lands within range of his travel, a few scanty morsels of the glorious substance. From these he had extracted scarcely enough of the elixir to fill a third of that little glass which I have just drained. He guarded every drop for himself. Who that holds healthful life as the one boon above all price to the living, would waste upon others what prolongs and recruits his own being? Therefore, though he sold me his secret he would not sell me his treasure."

"Any quack may sell you the information how to make not only an elixir, but a sun and a moon, and then scare you from the experiment by tales of the danger of trying it! How do you know that this essence which the Dervish possessed was the elixir of life, since it seems you have not tried on yourself what effect its precious drops could produce? Poor wretch! who once seemed to me so awfully potent, do you come to the Antipodes in search of a drug that only exists in the fables by which a child is amused?"

"The elixir of life is no fable," cried Margrave, with a kindling of eye, a power of voice, a dilation of form that startled me in one just before so feeble. "That elixir was bright in my veins when we last met. From that golden draught of the life-spring of joy I took all that can gladden creation. What sage would not have exchanged his wearisome knowledge for my lusty revels with Nature? What monarch would not have bartered his crown, with its brain-ache of care, for the radiance that circled my brows, flashing out from the light that was in me? Oh again, oh again, to enjoy the freedom of air with the bird, and the glow of the sun with the lizard; to sport through the blooms of the earth, Nature's playmate and darling; to face, in the forest and desert, the pard and the lion—Nature's bravest and fiercest—her first-born, the heir of her realm, with the rest of her children for slaves!"

As these words burst from his lips there was a wild grandeur in the aspect of this enigmatical being which I had never beheld in the former time of his affluent, dazzling youth. And indeed in his language, and in the thoughts it clothed, there was an earnestness, a concentration, a directness, a purpose, which had seemed wanting to his desultory talk in the earlier days. I expected that reaction of languor and exhaustion would follow his vehement outbreak of passion; but after a short pause he went on with steady accents. His will was sustaining his strength. He was determined to force his convictions on me, and the vitality, once so rich, rallied all its lingering forces to the aid of his intense desire.

"I tell you then," he resumed, with deliberate calmness, "that, years ago, I tested in my own person that essence which is the sovereign medicament. In me, as you saw me at L——, you beheld the proof of its virtues. Feeble and ill as I am now, my state was incalculably more hopeless when formerly restored by the elixir. He from whom I then took the sublime restorative died without revealing the secret of its composition. What I obtained was only just sufficient to recruit the lamp of my life, then dying down—and no drop was left for renewing the light which wastes its own rays in the air that it gilds. Though the Dervish would not sell me his treasure, he permitted me to see it. The appearance and odor of this essence are strangely peculiar—unmistakable by one who has once beheld and partaken of it. In short, I recognized in the hands of the Dervish the bright life-renewer, as I had borne it away from the corpse of the Sage of Aleppo."

"Hold! Are you then in truth the murderer of Haroun, and is your true name Louis Grayle?"

"I am no murderer, and Louis Grayle did not leave me his name. I again adjure you to postpone, for this night at least, the questions you wish to address to me.

Seeing that this obstinate pauper possessed that for which the pale owners of millions, at the first touch of palsy or gout, would consent to be paupers, of course I coveted the possession of the essence even more than the knowledge of the substance from which it is extracted. I had no reward fear of the experiment, which this timid driveler had not the nerve to renew. But still the experiment failed. I poured the mixture out, and sat to find the fit place for it. While in the rage of the Dervish, the unfailing result of the experiment was at hand. The Dervish suspected my design—he dreaded my power. He fled up the vein in which I had meant to secure him, while he refused to sell me. After all, I should have done him good rather than evil. I should have left him wealth enough to transport him safely to my soil in which the material for the drink may be found abundant, and the descendants of this would have given his shrinking nerves the courage to replenish its refreshed store. I had not time to pay, who obeyed me as friends the minister. I chased the fugitive. I came on him. I touched a house in a narrow street in which, I was told, he had entered but an hour before. The day was declining: the light in the room struck full. I saw on a corner what seemed to me the form of the Dervish—stooped in pain, and my hand closed over it. The timid Dervish had so piled his rags that they took the shape of the form they had clothed, and he had left, as a substitute for his own body, the venomous reptile of death.

"The strength of my system enabled me to survive the relief of the poison; but during the hour that numbed me my Arabs, alarmed, gave me cause to my quarry. I was, though enfeebled and languid, I was again on my horse; again the pursuit—again the trick! I learned —but this time by a knowledge more than nearly—that the Dervish had taken his refuge in a hamlet that had sprung up around the tomb of my once famed through Assyria. The same voice that informed me of his whereabouts warned me not to pursue. I disregarded the warning. In my eager impatience I sprang on to the chase; in my fearless resolve I felt sure of the prey. I arrived at the hamlet—I was told that my forces were no longer the same since the loss of the tribe. The Dervish could not be long he had left the doors, on which I sank exhausted, but a few minutes before my horse stopped at the door. The carpet on which he had rested still lay on the ground. I dismissed the escort and lessen of my troop to attend to the fugitive. Sure that this time he would not escape, my eyes closed in sleep.

"How long I slept I know not—a long dream of solitude, fever, and anguish. Was it the curse of the Dervish's carpet? Was it a taint in the walls of the house, or of the air, which drinks sickly and rank over places where cities lie buried? I know not; but the dream of the East had seized me in slumber. When my senses recovered I found myself alone, plundered of my arms, despoiled of such gold as I had about me. All had deserted and left me, as the living leave the dead whom the Plague has claimed for its own. As soon as I could stand I crawled from the threshold. The moment my voice was heard, my face seen, I was hailed with popular rose as on a wild beast—a mad dog. I was driven from the place with imprecations and stones, as a miscreant who had left the tomb of a sorcerer, while plotting the death of a holy man. Bruised and bleeding, but still undaunted, I turned in wrath on that dastardly rabble; they shunk away from my path. I knew the trail for miles around. I had been in that land for years, long years, ago. I came at last to the trail which the caravans take on their way to Damascus. There I was found, speechless and seemingly lifeless, by some European travelers. They took me to Damascus, I languished for many weeks between life and death. But for the virtue of that essence, which lingered yet in my frame, I could not have survived—more than I be shattered. I need not say that I now abandoned all thought of discovering the Water of Youth. I had at least his secret, if I had failed of the paltry supply he had drawn from its uses. My sophistimeses as he had told me would be all procured in the East with more ease than in Europe. To sum up, I returned to the studies and the knowledge, and supplied with all the aids, which warrant me in saying, 'Do for cure for your life in its richest enjoyment, if not for yourself, for one whom you love, and will rejoyce from the grave?' Then share with me as a task than a single night will accomplish, and vanish a prize by which the life that is value the most will be secured to the dust and the worm, to live on, ever young, ever blessing, while each infant—love-born while I speak—shall have passed to the grave. Nay, there is the limit to life while the earth hides the inheritance by which life is renewed?

I give, as faithfully as I can recall them, the words in which Margrave addressed me. But his own pages by cold words removed, even here they artfully ranged by a master of language, the effect words produce when warm from the breath of the speaker? Ask one of the radicians which some orator held enthralled why words do not quicken a heart to the throb of pulse, and the answer of one who had listened to it, "The words took their charm from the voice and the eye, the aspect, the manner, the time?" So it was with the incomprehensible book before me. Though his presence was gone, though his beauty was dimmed, though my fancy clothed him with memories of abhorrent dread, though my reason opposed the audacious beliefs and assumptions, still he charmed and fascinated me; still he was the magician, the creator; still, if the legends of magic had truth for their basis, he was the born magician; a magician, in what calling soever, is born with the gift to enchant and subdue us.

Constraining myself to answer calmly, I said, "You have told me your story; you have defined the object of the experiment in which you ask me to aid. You do right to bid me postpone my replies or my questions. Seek to recruit by sleep the strength you have so sorely tasked. To-morrow—"

"To-morrow, ere night, you will decide whether you will or will not aid me in what I have selected to aid me shall be the foe to condemn me to perish! I tell you plainly I need your aid, and your prompt aid. Three days from this and all aid will be too late!"

"I will gladly consult the close of the room, when he called to me to come back.

"You do not live in this hut, but with your family yonder. Do not think that I am here. let no one but yourself see me as I now am. Look the door of the hut when you quit it. I should not close my eyes if I were not secure from intruders."

"There is but one in my house, or in these parts, whom I would except from the interfect you impose. You are aware of your own temperament danger; the life which you believe the discovery of a Dervish will indefinitely prolong is sacred in the eye of physician to hang on a thread. I have already formed my own conjectures as to the nature of the disease that enfeebles you. But I must have more exact information with the weightier opinion of one whose experience can guide us, we shall charge for forwarding Our Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, and to whom I can refer with the confidence which the honor of a physician will not allow to be slighted. BURNSIDE AT WORK.

AT length we hear of firing at or near Newbern and Roanoke Island, which is equivalent to saying that Burnside's expedition, having worked its way through the shallows of Hatteras Inlet, has divided its force, and struck out boldly to the north and south simultaneously. Before these lines reach the public eye full details of the operation will probably have arrived.

We have reason to believe that the main object of Burnside's expedition was to cut off railway communication between Virginia and the Gulf States by intercepting Weldon, while General Thomas seized the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad in the neighborhood of Knoxville.

If this be true, the sound, the attack on Roanoke Island is a false one, and the movement upon Fort Macon and Newbern the real aim of the expedition. It is possible that General Burnside may at present proceed no further than these two points, securing them as a base for future operations into the interior. Many military strategists deem it unlikely that he will advance so far as Weldon into an enemy's country with only 12,000 men. But reinforcements are at hand, and if we hear of him at Fort Macon and Newbern next week, it will be easy to swell his force to 25,000 men in a week.

FOREIGN INTERVENTION.

QUITE a hubbub was created last week by a few articles in obscure London journals suggesting an armed intervention of the great Powers of Europe in our quarrel. The papers in question are not known, even by name, to the bulk of our readers, and their utterances are entitled to no more notice than would be paid here to the disquisitions of any of our fourth or fifth rate political sheets. Yet our people are so absurdly sensitive on every thing that relates to them abroad, and foreign papers are somehow regarded as so much more reliable than journals at home, that the idle nonsense of the London Observer and the Manchester Guardian disturbed men's digestion, and caused a general decline in the stock market.

It is hard to see what either England or France would gain by intervening in our quarrel. They want cotton in the one case, and a market for cotton and silk goods in the second: in other words, they want to see their old commercial relations with the South restored. No one surely supposes that they can achieve this by becoming parties to the war. They can not lay an embargo on their own manufactures, nor can they expect to import cotton from the Southern States in the teeth of our privateers and our armies. If the war has already deprived them of one half their customers in this country; intervention would strip them of the other half. Their true policy is to hasten a peace; and as soon as our armies begin to "earn their living," as Secretary Stanton says, they will perceive that this can best be done by ceasing to afford shelter to Southern privateers and to isolate rebeldom. No other kind of intervention could be either safe or feasible, or reconcilable with the interests of their commerce.

International usage is very clear in regard to the intervention of one power in the domestic quarrels of another. Seventy-five years ago such intervention was common, and England, the great bully of the world, was actively prone to them. She spent over $5,000,000,000 in an intervention against Napoleon. She and France, again, in 1823, intervened in Spain, and the fall of the Bourbon dynasty was partly due to the odium the measure reflected on the Orleans Government. In 1827, France, England, and Russia intervened in Greece, and secured its independence. The consequence of this intervention was the Crimean war. In fact, there has not been an intervention of any kind for a century which has not been productive of evil to the nation intervening. This principle is so well understood in Europe that non-intervention has long been a cardinal principle of European international polity. Some of the British papers draw fanciful analogies between the affair of Greece and Turkey and the relations of the Southern States. If the analogy existed it would afford the best possible reason for letting us alone, for every European statesman is aware that Navarino was a gigantic political blunder. But the cases are, in fact, widely dissimilar. Greece had been struggling for freedom against a brutal, God-forsaken, Moslem despotism for six long years, and for many months before the battle of Navarino the Turkish general, Ibrahim Pacha, had been causing the blood of all Christians to curdle in their veins by cropping the ears of every male Greek upon whom he could lay his hands, and selling the young girls into Turkish harems—dealing with his enemy, in fact, much as the officers of the British army dealt with their enemy in the Indian rebellion of 1857. Even our English critics will admit that no such horrors have taken place here.

A favorite falsehood of the British newspaper writers is to assert that France is urging England to break the blockade. Not a line or a word in support of this theory is to be found in any French paper; and there is, in fact, no reasonable ground for supposing that the sagacious sovereign of France is really pursuing so unwise a course. The silk manufacturers of Lyons are distressed, it is true, by the falling off in the demand for French silks at the North. But it is hardly the right way to remedy this mischance to go to war with nations in the love of adventure, bring with them all the military traditions of Europe, arm and equip themselves the skirt of war, and they frolic, and dance, and sing:

"Why, soldiers, why
Should we be melancholy boys,
Whose business 'tis to die?"

And where there are gay young foreign officers, and gay young domestic officers, with all the freshness and none of the sorrow of martial prestige, will there not be glittering throngs of girls and women, whom nature made to love quadrilles—not because they are quadrilles, but because they are the symbols of dance and heroism and glory?

These are all thrown up upon the very surface of Washington; they are the flashing bubbles on the stream, until it may easily seem to you to be all foam and flash.

But there are deeper currents which may trouble you. The difference of conviction as to the conduct of the war makes bitter accusation and recrimination. The Irish element may assert itself more strongly about methods, and talk so sharply, that you begin to think they value more than their own way of success. This creates seeming division, until again you understand why so many are disheartened when they come to Washington.

Yet a little reflection before you arrive will have prepared you for all these things. The earnestness of every sort of life brought out latent lines in the face of the people, not in the bureaus of the Government. Whatever goes to the bottom remembering this, and reflecting that the Declaration of Independence is at last tolerable political doctrine at the seat of government, you are to be resolved upon despair if he return disheartened.

THE BRIGHT DEBATE.

THE case of Senator Bright will have an interest long after it is formally decided. The debate was one of the most remarkable that has ever occurred in the Senate. Only two instances are upon record in our early history of the expulsion of Senators—William Blount in 1797, and John Smith in 1808. But the present case had a peculiar interest because of the criticisms of the war in question.

Jesse D. Bright, the Senator from Indiana, is a heavily-built man, with a smooth round face, with little hair upon his head, and an expression which is certainly neither winning nor conciliatory. Throughout the important debate, which was of the nature of a capital trial, for the charge was no less than treasonable sympathy, he sat erect in his chair, now and then talking, now and then his head hanging down behind the chair, and his face, with a slight air of sullen defiance, turned upon the Senator who had the floor. Occasionally Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, or some other extreme partisan friend, sat in the chair behind him, and conversed with him, but generally he remained in an almost painful isolation.

The interest of the galleries was profound. They were crowded on all sides, and during the speech of General Lane, of Indiana, the colleague of Mr. Bright, the involuntary applause which followed one of his passionate rhetorical periods caused one gallery to be cleared. The speech was powerful, and offended no more. The Senate itself is rarely a most trying body to address. The members are necessarily very much talking, reading, writing and reading newspapers, writing letters, clapping for the pages, lounging, and discussing matters, and doing every thing but listening to the speaker. Frequently the Senator who is addressing the Chair, wishing to have the ear of a reply sharply home upon a previous speaker, turns toward him with animated gesture, and, "war on a wooden leg" of his seat, or closely engaged in chatting with other Senators, or intently reading a pamphlet with his back to the orator. One Senator, immediately before whom sat two of his colleagues quietly conversing with their heads touching, excited exclaimed, in a low tone, "Stop that talking!" and the Vice-President's warning hammer thumps his table often at the most exciting moment of a speech to stop the hum of inattention.

When Mr. Bright rose to address the Senate in his own defense there was general silence. He was evidently full of mingled emotions of anger, doubt, and apprehension. His face was red, and with a high, exasperating, and monotonous voice began. It was universally admitted that his speech greatly injured his cause. It was not even grammatical even to insolence; and whoever heard him that heard in the last expiring scream of the domineering style of the Southern aristocracy the latest wheeze of the slave-driving Senatorial manner. There are those in Italy that outlive both their teeth and voices, but not their viciousness. When they can no longer run, they lie upon the ground and make all the movements of battle without the sound. Mr. Bright fiercely shook his finger at Senator Sumner. "I have had no personal explanations whatever with the Senator from Massachusetts: and that Senator would not have dared—he, he would not have dared" (and here the voice of the speaker became thick with hate)—"to say the things he has said of me here to-day, except that he knew that I stood alone and friendless, and he surrounded by his allies." Later he spoke of the "mad abolition horde led by that Senator," which had ruined the country.

Oh, Jesse D. Bright, of Indiana, Senator Sumner spoke of you calmly in debate; but when you and your allies possessed the Capital, the city, the District, the neighboring States, and, as you fondly believed, the whole country, you and your allies ordered that chamber, and struck to the floor with a bludgeon the Senator whom you now accuse of wounding you with words!

The position of Senators Harris, of New York, and Foster, of Connecticut, with Cowan, of Pennsylvania, and Lane, of Indiana, was very trying. They are all most loyal men, and the first two most earnest Republicans. They were all members of the Judiciary Committee, which reported against Mr. Bright's expulsion unanimously, with the exception of Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois. The pressure upon these four gentlemen to change their votes was extreme. But they had an honest conviction that, however incorrect Mr. Bright's sympathies might be, the evidence of the letter was not sufficient to establish it. It was, so far, a judicial question, and to their minds the point was not whether Mr. Bright was an unsafe counsellor for the Senate, but whether the letter proved it. As Senator Harris said, "If this were a political question I should certainly vote with my friends."

To one who heard the debate, and who remembers the circumstances of the time and the antecedents of Mr. Bright, all of which must be taken to interpret the letter, it is clear that when he sent a message of peace-feelers to Mr. Davis, Secretary, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States," and spoke of "your capital," he sent them to a governing authority incompatible with that of this Government, and who could use the letter only as a proof of treasonable correspondence or some other. Circumstances forbid the supposition that they could have been meant for any other. If used at all, they must be used as evidence against the United States. Is the person who does not deny that he did this a fit counselor for the President?

Whatever the vote of the Senate may be, the question remains.

NUTRIMENT IN POISON.

THE disaster to the Burnside expedition will help fix our eyes upon the fact that the race is not always to the swift. Our great danger is in losing sight of the arduous character of the work we have in hand. We are, practically, an invading power. We have to overcome every where by overwhelming force. We can not overcome at Hatteras Inlet or Port Royal, and Ship Island are good as far as they go. But they are none of them blows which recoil through the Southern country and re-echo in a shout of awakening patriotism.

The misfortune to the latest expedition is slight and unimportant. But it illustrates how true a sun all the time. General Napier said, "a General is known by what he does not lose." Every victorious event of a great movement of which Burnside's fleet was the left wing. The left wing flags unfurled, the ships, the vehicles, the men, what can we do the same? It is not enough to collect and equip your army. The weather, the country, the roads, the sun, the winds, every thing in fact, are to be taken into the account, and all these are against us.

Of course it is so, and even more so, for the other side: but we are first of all to see where we are weak ourselves and then deal with the disadvantages of the enemy. We must always suppose that he knows where we are strong and will endeavor to strike us there. For the work we have undertaken we need every resource, every weapon we can command. It is every thing to have victorious generals. The foe must feel that we win them with hopeless superiority.

It will not be unfortunate for us, therefore, if the delay at Hatteras shall enforce upon us the necessity of concentrating every energy in the task of speedily achieving the supremacy of the Government. The gentlemen in Congress and out of it who so laboriously strive to make the impression that Abolition is secession, ought to remember that every moment of delay is a moment lost for any thing which must not give way before the necessity of maintaining the Government, is to insist that the Government shall not be saved. The Constitution of slavery, like the right of life and property of personal liberty and free speech, is strictly and utterly subordinate to the preservation. To talk of carrying on the war "constitutionally," as if it were a game, that the property of slaves is to be untouched, is as silly as to declare that, if a rebel is shot in the field, the war is not conducted "constitutionally." For his right to be a slave is certainly no more protected by the Constitution than his right to his head.

Let every reverse, then, abate the fervor of our differences upon this point, and unite us all in the great resolution that the war shall be by no halves corpus, and of property, and of life shall not interfere with the suppression of the rebellion, neither shall the right of holding slaves. And there is no harm in saying so if you think so.

THE CAPITOL BAKERY.

IF you should happen to go to Washington during the war do not fail to see the bakery at the Capitol. It is a most interesting establishment of the public institutions. It certainly is not the least useful.

Remember that you enter it from the outside. A party of Loungers tried to find some inner door from within the upper floor, but it was impossible. So we went down the main steps, and turned in behind the little pond, which is kept in a marble case, and looked inquiringly at the door of what, in buildings not so grand as the Capitol, we should call the basement. A courteous somebody, in military garb, smiled and said, "Come in!" Then we advanced and found a most military somebody passed us over, with an amused air, to a serious civic and gentlemen who most kindly accompanied us through the bakery.

THE LOUNGER.

THE TONE OF WASHINGTON.

For the last few months it has been a proverb that to go to Washington is to be disheartened. There was a cheap wit current in the spring that the Government had not yet found out that there was a war. And the other evening, when the music and the dancing were in progress, a sad and gloomy man passed beneath the hall and declared that he should like to throw stones at the windows. There is no earnestness here, said a desponding friend to the Lounger, as they watched the officers exercising upon their horses or whirling in the waltz.

But of course in every war there are a thousand interests of the purest selfishness. There are all the contracts, the jobs, the chances of private enrichment. These are to be settled and secured at the capital. And therefore you see many sharks shoveling through society there. Then the gay young foreign officers of the staffs over the river, who take part in our war, not from any particular knowledge or conviction, but from the desire of military experience, from the love of adventure, bring with them all the military traditions of Europe, arm and equip themselves the skirt of war, and they frolic, and dance, and sing:

"Why, soldiers, why
Should we be melancholy boys,
Whose business 'tis to die?"

And where there are gay young foreign officers, and gay young domestic officers, with all the freshness and none of the sorrow of martial prestige, will there not be glittering throngs of girls and women, whom nature made to love quadrilles—not because they are quadrilles, but because they are the symbols of dance and heroism and glory?

These are all thrown up upon the very surface of Washington; they are the flashing bubbles on the stream, until it may easily seem to you to be all foam and flash.

But there are deeper currents which may trouble you. The difference of conviction as to the conduct of the war makes bitter accusation and recrimination. The Irish element may assert itself more strongly about methods, and talk so sharply, that you begin to think they value more than their own way of success. This creates seeming division, until again you understand why so many are disheartened when they come to Washington.

Yet a little reflection before you arrive will have prepared you for all these things. The earnestness of every sort of life brought out latent lines in the face of the people, not in the bureaus of the Government. Whatever goes to the bottom remembering this, and reflecting that the Declaration of Independence is at last tolerable political doctrine at the seat of government, you are to be resolved upon despair if he return disheartened.

It occupies the rooms which were the committee-rooms of Congress in the days when there was republican simplicity in the Capitol, and before we had borrowed, for the decoration of our public halls and passages, the gay arabesques of the Golden House of Nero, and the light dancers of Pompeii. Down the chief staircase which our historic men descended, there were planks laid, and barrels of flour were rolling from the storehouse above. Turning off into a side-passage, full of the delicious odor of newly-baked bread, we entered a small vaulted room. There were two huge ovens in it, each baking two barrel-loads at once. We were introduced, and we looked in upon the murky, hot, fragrant spectacle. Opposite the ovens, against the wall, were the huge troughs for the sponge," or flour ready for baking, looking already good enough to eat. The bakers, in their paper caps, were busily at work, looking up at us as we entered slowly. This was the room in which John Quincy Adams lay in state after his death.

The next was like it. There were the ovens, and the troughs, and the busy bakers, and every where the sweet smell and the high heat of bread. There are fourteen ovens, that bake two hundred loaves apiece. Six or seven times, that makes nearly hundred spices. They use two hundred and fifty barrels of flour daily; nineteen hundred gallons of yeast; and fifty thousand pounds of bread are daily baked. They are turned out usually in sheets of fifteen loaves, and cost a trifle more of bread, weighing, I think, twelve ounces. In one of the delivery rooms we saw three thousand loaves, rations for three regiments. An army was upon me before the window, and the agent was passing out the supply. In another room had a dozen men were making the yeast, washing and mixing in smoking barrels. Here, as every where, there was the utmost cleanliness, and the utmost haste. And the bread, the result of all this labor, is so good and palatable that you can not help wishing that the work and the feeding, in every Department of the Government, might be modeled upon those of the Capitol Bakery.

The ovens that bake the eight hundred loaves at once are upon the outside of the building, under the great steps. To look up from them, and see the rounded tops of the leaves, is like looking at a Rotterdam kraal or village with its mounded huts. And all the scenery connected with the Bakery whom we saw were so willing and intelligent, that again we were reminded afresh how much capital to the wise panorama before it, and all the public buildings: "Why, too, might not all the officers and agents of each department be under the roof of the ward, and the results, be modeled upon those of the Capitol Bakery?"

A WORD FOR JUSTICE

EVEN those who believe General Fremont to be incompetent to command, think he has been fairly treated. A case of asphyxia was intended. He was to be smothered. He had been recalled from Missouri, and came to New York. There he remained until the Committee upon the Conduct of the War summoned him to Washington. He went, and gave his testimony. It was not published, and the Committee were understood to think it inexpedient to report. Meanwhile a Department of the United States Army, recalled under a cloud of injurious rumors, holding his tongue with a reticution that no American citizen has ever before related, remains without cates, the object of obloquy, until at length the impatience of mind upon the public mind that he is so utterly incapable that the authorities, from regard to him and to his previous public services, have not dismissed him, and so suffer him to disappear from our history in dumb disgrace.

When the late Secretary Cameron and Adjutant-General Thomas returned from the West, the letter published in the indictment against General Fremont, while that officer was still in command of his department. The then Secretary of War authorized the responsibility of the publication. The removal of General Fremont followed. He has now made his defense, and the Committee have believed to think it inexpedient to publish it. There are, therefore, but three courses for the General to pursue. He may remain absolutely silent, leaving a blasted name to his country and his children, he may publish his statement; or he may call a Court of Inquiry.

The first course no honorable man could demand of him. The third is attended with many inconveniences and delays at a moment when time is invaluable. The second is the manifest course. It owes to his friends and to himself. It makes the people his jury. He throws himself literally upon his country. If the statements which he has made calmly. It must be made, not as the mendicant of any discomfited faction, but simply as his own justification. There he may leave it. Then, if he receives no orders, he may retire quietly to Mariposa, conscious that he has done all that his country may now see whether or not he served her wisely so long as he served at all; and, resolved that no wrong of his own, by any means he, shall result in injury to his country.

Every fair, frank man will see the justice of this course. If, indeed, a trial could be had at once, it would be better, as seeming to be more impartial, that his defenses should be adjudged by a Court. But the most important witnesses could not leave their duty to appear, and the country can not come to trial until the war were well over. General Thomas, with the consent of Secretary Cameron, recalled General Fremont before the country. Why should he not reply to the country?

POPULAR FAITH.

THE youth of the nation shows itself in nothing more than in its ready faith. And it is a most cheering and hopeful sign; for a cold, critical, skeptical people is always in danger.

The latest illustration of our ready faith is our enthusiastic welcome to the new Secretary of War. Suddenly Secretary Cameron was removed and Mr. Edwin M. Stanton was called to his place. "Mr. Stanton! Mr. Stanton!" exclaims the public, "who on earth is Mr. Stanton? What is he? What is he likely to do?" The reply came that he had been Mr. Buchanan's last Attorney-General, and that he was a good Union man, and that "things would very go ahead" at once. "Very good, but will they?" cried the dear old public: "hurrah for Stanton!" And there is the profoundest popular conviction that we have entered a new phase in the right place.

There is the same unquestioning faith in General M'Clellan. He modestly says that he has yet to win his laurels, but we insist upon piling whole Parnassus upon his head. Commander-in-chief until the war began, there was a sudden series of rushing victories in Western Virginia—victories, indeed, but unmarked by the full results that, overfull, in whom we had the fullest faith, was unfortunate at Bull Run. Who else in the world, then, could fill his place? Then when General Scott who doubtless saved us last March, and in whom we had the fullest confidence, was retired forward Manassas. It was "a sure thing," as the newsboys say. For that reason also the revulsion consequent upon the defeat was so great. General Scott was practically described as a leader; but the popular faith was implicit in the man who could be found, and it poured itself as lavishly upon his successor as it had upon himself.

That faith is the surest sign of hope for the future. If this man does not answer, why, that man is the very man. If he fails, why, this other is the man we have been looking for. It shows an indomitable spirit. It shows that every man will have the fullest and the fairest chance. If General Fremont, who seems the victim of unfair treatment, should ever charge it upon the people of the country. They are ready to do him the justice that they mete to all others. And even if their judgment is erroneous, they will be ready to do him justice again. We do not slay our generals because they are unfortunate.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SAWNEY and Jock were in a feeding down lately, a man from the country applied to a respectable lawyer for advice. After detailing the circumstances of his case, he was asked if he had stated the facts exactly as they occurred. "Why, sir," replied the countryman, "I thought it best to tell you the plain truth; you can pit the lies till after."

A gentleman passing by a country church while undercreak, observed to one of the workmen that he thought it would be an expensive job. "Yes, sir," replied he, "and I think we shall screenest what our worthy minister has been preaching about, that is, making a spire out of repentance."

"My brother," said a waggish darkey to a crowd, "in all affliction, in all on your troubles, for's use place you can always find friends and de Lord." "Yes," replied several of his auditors, "in dadversity" he replied. "Dat's what I mean—dadversity."

A TOAST.—At an agricultural dinner the following toast was given: "The game of fortune—shuffle the cards as you will, nigbors will cut for deal."

"My dear boy," said a country schoolmaster to a promising scholar, whose quarter was up, "does your father intend to make a gentleman of you, or will you follow one of a profession, the stroll and narrow way of the industrious?" "Please, sir," replied the youth, "I'm going to be a "No, Zor," replied the prodigy: "dad says he's going to put me to work in the Custom House."

A squad of Indiana volunteers out scouting came across a party of Secessionists, and commenced firing. The consolations one of them asked her: "Well, did you run?" "No," replied the other, "I stood my ground." "Did you fight?" "No." "What are you, then?" "A Hoosier, and proud of it."

The following is a copy of the list of questions proposed for discussion in a debating club out West: "Suppose a person, having a wooden leg, should set fire to a stiff of thirteen works commendable? Is it necessary that female politicians should wear petticoats? Should the ladies attack parts in politics? Does dress constitute the merit parts of a man?"

Mr. Rock, the comedian, once advised a score-shifter to go into subscription-bill business. Some time after, a day after he desired the man to show him the list of names, which he said he would put down for a hundred. "Here's some surprise, said, "Why, Mr. Rock, won't you give me a hundred?" "No, sir," replied the old Rock; "why, sounds, man, didn't I give you the bill?"

There is a roll-call that would break a world to pieces to make a stool to sit on.

Those only are fit for solitude who like nobody, are like nobody, and are liked by nobody.

A hermit is one who has been informed by his brother that considerable property had fallen to the family, and asked a hasty dispatch to the news, he replies, "You let me out, and I'll take care of it," was the reply.

LITTLE BOY. "What's the use of an eclipse?" ARISTOCRAT. "Oh, it gives the sun time for reflection."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, January 28, in the Senate, a petition in favor of the restoration of the warehousing system was presented by Senator Pomeroy. Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, asking Congress not to abolish Slavery in the District of Columbia, and asking for the expulsion of members who advocate it, was presented by Senator Sumner. The petition also asks that the title of Genera the Western Department, and that his thanks to the Western Department, and that his thanks to the Western Army, be tendered to him. A resolution was offered by Senator Foster, of Connecticut, and adopted, asking the Secretary of War the Navy whether any further legislation is necessary in order that the Government may obtain the bands of South Carolina, now in possession of the Government, and to prevent the further diversion of the negroes to the ranks in these localities. A bill to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the army was introduced by Senator Wilson, and referred. A bill to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States, was introduced by Senator Sumner, and referred. The bill to authorize the President to take possession of certain railroads and telegraph lines, was taken up, and debated at considerable length.—In the House, on Wednesday, the Committee on Military and Legislative Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the bill, but after some discussion it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The bill to amend the Neutrality Laws, and for the punishment of fitting out, arming, and equipping, of vessels in the United States, was discussed, and, after considerable debate, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was reported by Senator Conkling, of New York, and referred to the Special Committee on that subject.

On Wednesday, 29th, in the Senate, Mr. John B. Henderson, Senator from Missouri, in place of Mr. Bates, who retired Trusten Polk, was qualified and took his seat. The resolution relative to the arming of the slaves held within Alabama and Virginia was referred. The joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to prohibit the existence of Slavery in the United States, and to the suppression of the rebellion was passed. The consideration of the resolution requesting the President to inform the Senate whether Ross Winans found, and a lively debate ensued, which continued until the hour for the new executive session arrived. In the House, the bill making the usual appropriation for the support of the Government for the current year, after the Government was passed, with an amendment that nothing in the act shall prevent hereafter a reduction of salaries, and that mileage shall be allowed to Congressmen for each session, and not for each year. The bill authorizing the President to take possession of railroads and telegraph lines in certain cases was passed by a vote of 113 against 18. In Committee of the Whole the Demand Treasury Note bill was taken up, and Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, reported on the subject. At the conclusion of his remarks the Army bill was taken up, and Mr. Conkling, of New York, spoke in favor of the bill. The general movement of the Union armies.

On Thursday, 30th, in the Senate, petitions in favor of the general emancipation of Slaves in the United States were presented and referred. Resolutions were adopted calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information relative to foreign ports to take the oath of allegiance. The bill to authorize the President to call into the management of the army hospitals, and report what legislation is necessary to correct any evils now existing therein. A bill providing for the construction of a military railroad from Washington to the Potomac reported. For consideration of the resolution regarding the expulsion of Senators who sympathize with the rebellion, but as the hour had not spoke on the subject.—In the House, the bill to provide for the payment of the Treasury notes, making a full legal tender, was taken up, and passed by a vote of 93 to 42. On consideration of the Army Bill, Mr. Cox, of Ohio, moved to strike out the Whole, Mr. Cox, of Ohio, replied to the remarks of Mr. Gurley upon the conduct of the war, and upon the policy of the Administration in the late General M'Clellan. The House then passed the Army Appropriation bill, and adjourned over until Monday.

On Friday, 31st, in the Senate, the bill relating the issue of Treasury notes was passed. The bill prohibiting American citizens from engaging in the Coolie trade was passed. The report of the Committee on Commerce on the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was accepted. The Senate then went into Executive session, appropriating thirty-five thousand dollars for the compensation of certain officials at the London World's Fair. It was discussed, and rejected by a vote of 17 yeas against 18 nays. The consideration of the resolution relative to the expulsion of Senator Bright was then resumed, and Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, addressed the Senate in favor of the resolution. The consideration of the Treasury Note bill was postponed. The Indian and Post-office Appropriation bills were passed.—In the House, the bill Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill passed. The Committee on Commerce reported a bill providing for the appointment of prohibiting the importation of ale unless the Coolie emigration system of China be abolished. It is quite into the expediency of placing contracts for army and navy supplies, during the war, under the civil and not the control of military law, or the rules and articles for the government of the army and navy of the United States, and inflicting penalties upon the violation of the same. The Army bill, Mr. Kelly, of Pennsylvania, delivered a speech complaining of the manner in which the war is conducted.

On Saturday, February 1, in the Senate, a petition was presented from citizens of New York and Pennsylvania, praying for the emancipation of Slaves. The secondal Reciprocity Treaty between Canada and the United States; and Senator Chandler offered a resolution, which was laid over under the rules, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to enter the expediency of immediately notifying Great Britain that the Reciprocity Treaty is not reciprocal, and will be terminated at the earliest possible moment. Senator Chandler presented a petition from the Board of Trustees of Michigan reaffirming loyalty to the Government and to the war, and requesting the Government to "specify and put down the incendiaries"; also favoring the confiscation of the property of the rebels. The resolution, as to slavery is the cause of the war, it be swept from the land. Senator Herring presented a petition from the Legislature of New York asking a modification of the law for raising revenue by duties on imports, so that the duty shall be levied on any mode of taxation except duties on imports; that such duties be abolished, and that the tariff be reduced to the rate of 1846. Senator Collamer called the same attention to his own laws and by its own officers. Referred. The Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned over.—In the House, Mr. Lovejoy offered a resolution directing the Committee on the Conduct of the War to be in order to report concerning the statement that five Illinois regiments had been sent to Kansas to vote at the election. The bill in carrying on the war on the platform of the abolitionists. The Army Appropriation bill was then taken up, and the Senate amendments were agreed to. The amendment of volunteer corps formed Home Guards, gave rise to a long discussion, which was not before finished, and when the amendment was rejected by a vote of 56 against 86. Amendments were then offered to the bill, and then recommitted, and Mr. Valandigham, of Ohio, and Mr. Roger, of Kentucky, made speeches on the subject.

THE LATEST FROM HATTERAS.

The steamer Ariel arrived at Fortress Monroe on Wednesday, 29th, from Hatteras Inlet, bringing the following intelligence: The Burnside expedition left Hampton Roads on the 12th inst., and reached Hatteras Inlet on the 13th. The Stars and Stripes were hoisted at Fort Hatteras at 11 A.M. on the 14th inst., and at 1 P.M. the Burnside fleet was all safely anchored in the harbor. The Burnside fleet was making an attack as to poise, the bombs preceding the fleet. The bombardment was progressing up to Core Sound to reach Fort Macon, at Beaufort, by the Burnside fleet. Core Sound is twelve miles in rear of the troops there. If the theory be correct the Burnside fleet will be now in Core Sound.

FORT PULASKI SURROUNDED.

It appears by dispatches received by the Richmond papers from Savannah, that the naval expedition from Port Royal, under Commodore Dupont and General Sherman, has succeeded in getting to the rear of Fort Pulaski, on Cockspur Island, in the Savannah River, and that all connection between the fort and the city of Savannah. In order to prevent the garrison from escaping, the expedient to have got behind Fort Pulaski, while others state that it is not true, but only got to the north end of Tybee Island, which they shelled in passing. Commodore Tattnall's relief fleet was said to be at Thunderbolt when the Union vessels made their appearance, but they immediately pushed on to Savannah.

By later dispatches from Savannah it appears that a fleet of small vessels laden with provisions, and commanded by the rebel Commodore Tattnall, was on its way to supply Fort Pulaski when our fleet opened fire on them, and after an exchange of forty minutes the rebel vessels were beaten and returned toward Savannah.

MOVEMENTS IN MISSOURI.

Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the rebels are steadily and resolutely pushing the war footing in Missouri are making some progress in their efforts to reorganize. General Davis is reported to be marching to join General Curtis, having arrived as far as Versailles, Morgan County, on the Missouri River. At Jefferson City, capital, while General Prentiss is also en route for that place. The rebels in Southwest Price remains still in Springfield, but another terrible battle is expected to take place, unless the rebels retreat before the advancing column of the Union Generals reach there.

AFTER THE "SUBTLE."

The Government is actively engaged in forwarding which has just arrived at the port of Charleston, and which has been ordered to the port for protection to Gibraltar. Four steamers and the gunboat Tuscarora, were sent to the Bermudas in search of the rebel cruiser, but returned to the South, New Hampshire, for the same duty. The career of the rebel steamer grows still, therefore, probably be very soon brought to a close.

PRIVATEERSMEN CONSIDERED PRISONERS OF WAR.

In pursuance of the orders of the State Department respecting privateersmen, the United States Marshal has removed Captain Baker and nineteen of the crew of the Savannah Steamer from the City Prison to Fort Lafayette. Under the same order ten of the crews of the privateer Jefferson Davis, who were sent to the Tombs at Smithfield, all, under the recent instructions of the Government, being treated as prisoners of war.

REBEL SUFFERINGS

The Day Book of the 30th contains a long editorial appeal in behalf of the people of Hampton. It says: We are informed that the Rebel Secession rulers are now preparing for want of many essential articles of comfort and luxury, and that they will be unable to keep the families suffering privations which none of them had ever seen before. The Day Book urges the people of Virginia to come forward in this time of need, and supply them with the articles which they now so exceedingly need.

REBEL WAILINGS.

The quartette of traitors, the Cobb brothers, Toombs, and Stephens, who recently published an address to the people of Georgia, in which they enumerate the progress of the rebellion, and the success which has attended them in the slaughter work. They say: "Our enemy has exhausted his resources, while the harvest of our bringing forth abundantly. Our enemy has failed in his efforts, and relied an army which, in numbers and discipline, is superior to his own. Our foreign relations will be made in early spring to crush us with a gigantic force, and all his efforts combined to crush us with a gigantic force." Why is it whatever alacrity our people may rush to arms, and however energetic may our Government be in its resources, we can not expect to cope with our enemy either in the number of troops, or in discipline, or in the means against those odds we must look to desperate courage, unbending resolution, and universal activity. Let the word be command "rapid aggressive action, and make our enemies feel the weight of battle, the horrors of war brought to them themselves. They view their soldiers by calling upon Providence to help, asking them to do it. They admit, at the same time, that the prospect of foreign recognition of the Southern Confederacy is a remote one.

PERSONAL.

General Halleck has seized the Governor Claiborne F. Jackson's hemp plantation in Saline County, Missouri, for military purposes.

EX-Senator Fish and Bishop Ames, the Commissioners appointed by the Rebel rulers to visit the North and the South, have completed their arrangements and have started on their mission.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REPLY TO SOUTHERN SURRENDER.

LORD RUSSELL has sent a dispatch to Lord Lyons on the subject of the Trent affair.

Her Majesty's Government having carefully taken into their consideration the case of the Trent, and also the delivery of them into your hands, and the explanations to which it has given rise, have arrived, have arrived at the conclusion that they constitute the reparation which her Majesty and her Government have a right to expect.

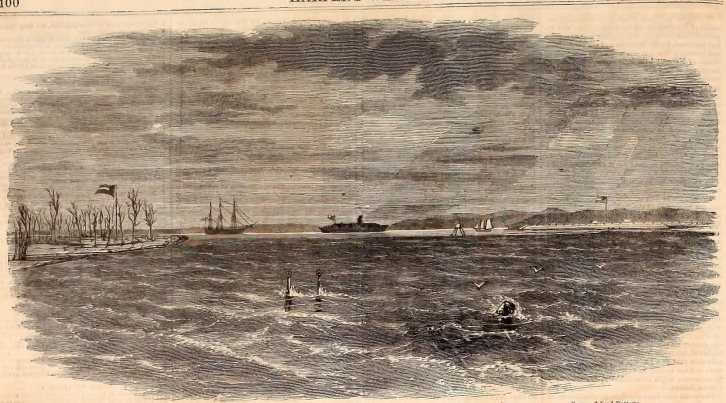
It is given her Majesty's Government great satisfaction to be enabled by the course at a conclusion to the maintenance of the most friendly relations between the two countries. The law officers of the Crown concur in the opinion expressed in this dispatch. We need say to be derived from the explanations which have been given.

In respect of which, Mr. Seward has relied upon, and by the discussions which Mr. Seward has relied upon the law officers of the Crown concur in the opinion expressed in this dispatch of the 30th of November. I there objected, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to the course which Wilkes had done. Mr. Seward, in his answer, points out that Wilkes was not bound to know that the Trent was not violating the law of nations.

It is on this account that I should here discuss in detail the five questions duly argued by the Secretary of State, which, consequently, are not to be found in her Majesty's Government differ from Mr. Seward in some of the conclusions at which he has arrived, but there is not any better understanding between the two nations on several points of international law which have arisen during the present civil war between the United States of America, than I should state to you, for communication to the Government of the United States, instead of which I have to do so in a few days.

In the mean time it will be desirable that the commanders of the United States cruisers should be instructed to act upon the principles for which Her Majesty's Government have to ask for redress, and which the United States Government can not refuse to admit.

A SPEECH BY MR. GLADSTONE.



Mr. Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has made a speech at Manchester, in which he seems very anxious to allay the war fever which had been so industriously fomented by the press and the speeches of many members of Parliament. He expressed himself very jealous of our commercial progress, and alludes in terms of high praise to the industrial development of the State of Wales when in the country. He also hinted very plainly that the commercial prosperity which has increased by England's war movement toward North America.

MORE MILITARY PREPARATI NS.

England is also preparing with her usual activity for an immense naval and military display in North America. Thirty-three thousand troops are ordered to be shipped at Woolwich, on the 11th inst., for Canada, and a number of transports were to be ready in order to convey them. Steamers were also ordered to be in readiness for conveying a million of Minie rifles and ammunition. Orders were also issued recommended Admiral Sir R. Dacres, as the Prize Agent, to be Admiral Milne at Halifax.

RECEPTION OF MASON AND SLIDELL.

Lengthy articles in the press calling on the people not to accord any public reception to Mason and Slidell, the rebel envoys. The Morning Post was extreme in its views, while the London Herald, the organ of the Opposition, advocated a course of action which would prevent the rebels the success, in order to induce them acceptable to the people of the two countries.

THE IRON-CLAD FRIGATE "MERRIMAC," AND SLOOP OF WAR "GERMANTOWN," OFF CRANEY ISLAND.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.]

THE "MERRIMAC" COMING OUT.

OUR special correspondent at Fortress Monroe has lately had an opportunity of visiting Craney Island, and has sent us the sketch which we reproduce above. It represents the Merrimac and Germantown, both vessels stolen from our navy by the rebels, afloat and at anchor off Craney Island, and ready for an excursion toward Fortress Monroe and Newport News. It will be remembered that some weeks since we published a picture of the Merrimac in her new appearance, from a sketch drawn by a mechanic on board. It will be seen that her cut and rig are precisely what we depicted. She is understood to be iron-clad, and to be armed with ten ten-inch rifled guns. The Germantown carries twenty guns. Great preparations are said to be in progress at Fortress Monroe to sink both of them if they venture out.

We likewise publish below a picture of the BATTERY AT NEWPORT NEWS, which these ships would have to encounter if they try to come out. Our engraving is from a sketch by Mr. J. Kruse, Company K, New York First Volunteers. The battery is a powerful one, and reflects credit on the Vermont volunteers who originally commenced its construction.

A letter in the Herald says:

The latest intelligence we have from Sewall's, by way of a flag of truce, is that an iron-clad vessel is lying off Craney Island, evidently awaiting an opportunity to slip her cable, and either put to sea or else engage our vessels in the harbor. Great activity is observed by our fleet in the harbor, and should this rebel craft be so intrepid as to undertake so hazardous an expedition, she will find a warm reception. For the information of the rebels I will state that we have upward of two hundred guns on the shipping in the harbor, and about as many more on the parapets and water-battery of Fortress Monroe, which will play an unimportant role in such an engagement. The batteries on Sewall's Point are also worthy of due consideration, and if the rebel craft should even reach this place she will be compelled to come between the Rip Raps and the fort, and then pass four first-class United States war vessels. General Mansfield received notice a day or two ago to be on the qui vive for an attack. The veteran General, of course, had his division in apple-pie order, and was prepared to give the enemy a cordial welcome of grape and canister.

We read in the Commercial Advertiser:

The naval officers at this station have trustworthy information that the Merrimac is actually ready for service. The sloop-of-war Plymouth is at Craney Island, and the rebels are removing obstructions in the Elizabeth River, so that the Merrimac to come down and go up to Newport News to engage the Cumberland and Congress, now stationed there. When the Merrimac comes out the Yorktown will come down the James River. It will be a tough engagement. The Merrimac mounts ten 100-pounders of the Armstrong pattern. The Plymouth mounts fourteen 9-inch navy guns. She will be assisted by a fleet of small boats, each armed with rifled guns.

We are ready for them. The ships here on our side are the Minnesota, 44; Roanoke, 44; Jamestown, 50; Monticello, 6; a bark, 6; and several tug-boats, each with rifled guns. At Newport News there are the Congress, 50; Cumberland, 24; and Dawn, 5.

THE GREEN LIGHT.

"I CAN not say much in favor of the place, but such as it is it is heartily at your service. We never had visitors in America, we air that plentic and spare can tackle to most; and this cauld haa drove bigguns, kept books aboard a Ohio steamer, preached to a congregation in Wisconsin, and sold notions to Canada. But what you won't catch a New Englander doing is one while, is hair keeper of the Cape Hatteras light-house.

"Why so?" I asked, good-humoredly. "The situation is, no doubt, a little dull, and the salary is not high—"

"Six hundred and twenty-five dollars, fifty cents, and a liberal allowance for wood and oil; not so bad, mother, for light mystery," parenthetically remarked the clerk.

"But still," I went on, "there are advantages in the situation. It is not an unhealthy spot. It is cheap and quiet, and as for temptation to expense—"

"Ax for them, mister, Robinson Crusoe was a Broadway lounger compared with what you'll be. Reckon that's a bottom to a tub-gun to a tin-pot world when you come to reckon him with the keeper of that light-house."

I had come to America with high hopes, and those hopes had been lamentably baffled. The fortune I was to have made with brush and pallet, and the fame to overcor than brush and pallet before me like a mocking will-o'-the-wisp. I was actually poorer than when I landed on the shore before, at New York. And this was why, after setting up as a portrait painter in Philadelphia, or a historical painter in Boston, as a gardener of allegory in Cincinnati, I was finally reduced to solicit the place of keeper on a wretched sandy islet off the coast of North Carolina.

I had one special reason for asking and accepting the unpromising berth—a reason which I did not trouble the clerk, and which I had not even imparted to the mariner. My art, or my genius, my inclination, it was toward painting of sea-views and ships; but as yet I had been dissatisfied with the result of my efforts. The calm sea was always in my eyes, at least—and the treatment so conventional. I did not long forget for a favorable opportunity of striking down before the storm, studying every wrinkle and line in Neptune's stormy face, and taking the portrait of the sea in every mood from calm to frenzy. Here was a capital chance. The keeper of a light-house would be alone with Nature; no billiards, no gossip, nothing to call off his attention; and perhaps after a summer's study I might contrive to produce something that would sell well in London. Longer than half a year no sea I never dreamed of retaining the employment.

One fortnight afterward I hired a boat and two duly waited across to my new residence. It had been established, I was to receive stores at quarterly intervals. Two barrels of pickled-pork, with a cask of flour, some bags of biscuit and corn, a keg of whisky, and some groceries, were in my mood from calm to frenzy. Here was a capital chance. Longer than half a year no sea I never dreamed of retaining the employment.

One fortnight afterward I hired a boat and two duly waited across to my new residence. It had been established, I was to receive stores at quarterly intervals. Two barrels of pickled-pork, with a cask of flour, some bags of biscuit and corn, a keg of whisky, and some groceries, were in my boat. With me went also a sturdy black lad, whose gaggle eyes rolled in wonder at the unaccustomed scene behind; and a long, lean negress, the grandmother of the boy, a woman with an excellent character for cooking and scouring. These colored persons were slaves.

There was a light breeze, and, as the boat sails filled pleasantly, we flew along, at a swift pace through the little sparkling waves. The whole bay, from its more angry gales and tempests, lies sers by the natural break-water of the sandy islands, reminded me of the lagoons of Venice, and the blazing blue sky overhead was distinctly Italian.

Recently we got to the little quay, whose slimy and weather-beaten piles were deeply imbedded in the sand, and above which rose the gaunt white tower of the light-house. Here, moreover, having taken a glance at the lantern and filled the lamps with oil, I walked out at the half-open door, and mounted to the beach. The prospect was a wide one, but monotonous. Sea and sand, sea and sand, as far as the eye could range from north to south, from east to west—nothing but sea and sand.

"Hallos, thay! Air yee the new light-house keeper?" I hailed a deep voice among the sand-hills.

I wheeled round. Behind me, on the summit of a mound, stood a very tall, muscular man, young, in a checked frock of Osnaburg cloth, sea-boots, and a battered straw-hat. He had a gun in his hand, and a sea-pouch by his side, and his eyes so nearly full of recently shot birds of the sand-piper class. A red handkerchief was tied rather loosely around the fellow's sunburned neck, and he was altogether dressed in a careless, picturesque fashion that gave him the wild aspect of a buccaneer.

"Rollos. Can't yew answer?" thundered the deep voice.

I replied that I was the light-house keeper; but but just arrived from the main land, and was very much at his service.

"Then I guess we're neighbors?" said the sportsman, as he advanced and extended me his hand of friendship. A strong big hand-shake it was, too, and the squeeze that I received brought tears into my eyes. After this salutation the stranger took me on the stock of his piece and scanned me from head to foot, and back again, very slowly and deliberately. "I heerd there was to be a new man," he observed the giant, "and my father, old Daddy Brown, of Fruit Creek—by-name Jabez—but a real stranger, at your call—Daddy Brown said, if I tumbled across you, and liked the looks of you, why, I were to be a'most welcome to a share at your bidding any day you stroll Fruit Creek way."

After growling out this hospitable message, Asphet Brown stared again, as if to make quite sure that he really did like "the looks of me." For myself, I felt an inward conviction that I did not much admire the looks of my new acquaintance. I did not, somehow, trust his face. It was not that he was rough and uncouth, that his shaggy black hair hung like layers of table fringe under the torn rim of his sou'wester, or that his boots were daubed with tar and fish scales. I had seen sterling good fellows in still rufter guise, and had knocked about the world too long to despite the tattered hand-grasp of an honest man. But Japhet's face expressed at the best but a ferocious good-humor; the features were heavy and lowering, the black eyes were restless and cunning, and the half-carless smile on the mouth had a leering, sinister mingling with its effrontery. I did not like the man, but I took good care to show no collision of sentiments. So I took Japhet Brown into my dwelling, opened my little store of cordials, and regaled him with a glass of genuine old rum—the liquor luxuries which he appreciated the more because of their contrast to drams of raw spirit and sweet tincture. I was Japhet's caterer, for the time at least, and it was with unfeigned heartiness that he clapped me on the shoulder at parting, and gave me a hearty invitation.

"Come when yew please, chap. There's always a bed of sand and a bottle of rum-and-water for yew lappen in at dinner-time on Sabbath yew'll be welcome." My mother she can fix a right clever mess of sand-crabs, and a bit of fish to Raleigh city. The gals—them's my sisters—be right pretty very ones, and a man with them would do yew good, stranger, when you get the lonesomes upon you." So saying, Japhet turned on his heel, and left me to my solitude once again.

Nothing worth mention occurred during the remainder of the afternoon. When dusk came creeping over the low shores, and a deepening shadow upon the inland waters, I went up to the top of the lossy purple of a starling's breast, then to violet. I went up the ladder to light my beacon for the first time. It was not without a certain amount of nervous tremor that I trimmed the wicks, adjusted the reflectors, and lighted the lamps. I had read over my printed instructions once again before I executed my task. I held my breath, and felt tinctured with superstition. Here I was, at the time the great importance of my duties flashed upon me. I was about to perform a solemn act, that had relations the eyes of the storm-tossed mariner, in the direct extremity of his battle with the elements, a merry turn for the sailor's social comfort. What mischief might not be caused by negligence, however arising, and what a post of trust was mine, as the link in a sentinel chain! I was a watchman, watchful for human lives!

Flash! the lamps and the whole forth far to the north. I saw the distant glimmer overwhelling mounds of and and the darkling surges. A white sail! That was not a false alarm. Other lights were posting the sentries, then—the entries against wreck and calamity. I was fairly at work.

The signal. So I lighted up my two lamps. A red light and a green. They had not twinkled for more than five minutes when I fancied I perceived like a blood-red star over the waves to the southward. A red light. The Fruit Creek light-vessel. I remained for some time in the glazed apartment which forms the upper story of all light-houses, gazing and musing, while fold of a command upon the moon of the wind. I did not feel so lonely, somehow, while looking toward those distant gleams, and with each minute I felt a stronger sympathy and good-will toward our race.

My own official work was light. I can well imagine that to an uneducated man the lack of continued occupation would have been maddening. After all, to furnish a brace of lamps regularly, to trim, fill, and kindle two lamps made but scanty demands upon my time. The rest was companionless, sobriety, and punctuality, but no very great industry.

For some time I saw but little of my neighbors, the islanders. Curiosity brought me several visits from Japhet Brown, and from some sojourn, but although I made a point of receiving their calls as urbanely as possible, no particular sympathy could exist between them and myself. They felt that they were rude of speech and boisterous of manners; nor was it hard to found myself the only educated person within miles. Besides, the other aborigines had in their demeanor, for the most part, something of the sullenness of race unencouraged confidence. They seemed sly, with all their uncouthness, and they would now and then exchange a few words in a tongue that I took to be Creek.

I shall never forget the first visit I paid to the Brown family. Fruit Creek was a long and deep though narrow inlet, which terminated in a shelving beach of sand, and was shut out from the sea by whale boats and skiffs rested, like fish out of water. The village was named in consequence of the creek of a West Indian vessel, laden with pines and shaddocks, near the spot where Daddy Brown had established his long island home, and built his earliest hut. There were several huts within sight, but Mr. Brown's was by far the best and largest of the number, its window-panes unbroken, its roof new, and it possessed a tolerable garden, fenced from the sandy waste by a hedge of the prickly Spanish palm. The inside of the house was even more comfortable than the exterior promised. The floor was covered with matting, and a few fine mats that I should not leave them before supper, I had an opportunity of seeing how they fared in general.

Daddy Brown himself was a hale old fellow, tall, with locks as white as the sea-foam, which his thick sooty eyes were as keen as a hawk's, and evinced a spirit and energy that were very extraordinary. He used to like the old man, he talked so well and glibly. He alone of the family group had been a traveller, he had been to Cuba, he had been a mate of a vessel, and had coasted repeatedly along the Atlantic sea-board, from Vera Cruz to Halifax. There were three sons, of whom Japhet was the eldest, and three daughters, all tall and well made, with dark eyes and raven hair. Japhet, like Daddy Brown, on the other hand, was a soft little woman, with rather a timid look in her round blue eyes, and a look of subjection to her husband and children. She was a notable housekeeper, and had the Northern love for the tea-kettle and cleanliness. The floor was exquisitely clean, and the copper and tin upon the kitchen-shelves shone brilliantly. The family received me hospitably enough. The young men eyed my thews and sinews with undisguised scorn, and half-jestingly challenged me to "wrastle a fall" with Seth or Symmachus, observing that Japhet was too big to make the match fair as one.

"Too dark! too dark!" cried old Daddy Brown. "Come to supper, boys and gals. The old woman's past lit up."

The lamps which Mrs. Brown had just "lit up" were those very ugly constructions of tin and metal, the work of some Yankee pewterer, which hold a great deal of oil, and gave a blaze of yellow light. The cloth was laid on the whalebowed table, and on it smoked a profusion of hot viands, flanked by all sorts of bottles and stone jars. The plates were of common delf, but the drinking vessels were most various. Thus, Daddy Brown had a silver tankard; Japhet a tall glass; the girls had cups; and the rest of the party china mugs. I was still more surprised to see that some of the forks were of massive silver, while others were two-pronged steel implements of the cheapest fabric. The bald scarcely sat down before a remarkable incident happened. I chanced, less through inquisitiveness than absence of mind, to be turning round the heavy chair which had been set for me when I descried some half-effaced armorial bearings on the handle. Before I could decipher them, however, Seth Brown, the youngest son, who sat near me, and who had watched me, suddenly thrust out his hand from the table, seized my chair-back, and tossed it across the table, growling out something about "a spy." I was really too much astonished to resent this rudeness, but Daddy Brown most coolly exclaimed in a harsh tone, "For shame, Seth, for shame, boy! Ask the stranger's pardon, or—" Daddy Brown did not finish the sentence, but his brows corrugated into an ugly frown, and he shook his head in a menacing manner. Seth cast back the fork with a very bad grace, muttering, "I meant no harm, I'm sure." The meal was odd, and another trivial circumstance happened soon after. One of the girls who sat near me, in a merry, tuneful voice, began a love-song, with a loud laugh and a nut-brown cheek, were a very pretty brooch, mounted in gold, and delicately executed in enamel. In Louis Philippe's time it happened to praise the beauty of this costly ornament, in the simple expectation that the owner until I hazarded the remark that "the workmanship was probably French. I never saw such a look in an honest face as that girl's.

"That's tellin's!" answered the girl, in a sharp voice.

"Phobe!" exclaimed her mother, in a deprecatory fashion. Her father gave out of his oily laugh. "Don't blame Phœbe," said he, "she's only chaned your town ways, Britisher. The grownup young things at Newbern are mighty close by, you may take your oath of it. And don't you be flustered by a parcel of gunpowder, whether French or Yankee."

I parted from the Browns cordially enough, but the more I thought of them the queerer they seemed. Were they smugglers? I speculated, knowing that of all the nets and money-hooked lines ostentatiously displayed around the premises, not one had a sharp whale-boats no other use than to carry Japhet and Seth to the banks where cod-fish and cat-fish, and salt and fresh water fish abound. The brooch, things to be seen in that house of Mr. Brown's which contrasted curiously with his own homely and clumsy furniture. Silk curtains to the windows, sewed, one or two arm chairs of frayed green, a beautiful Turkey carpet, and a sofa! I said with ivory, and, above all, a small but handsome mirror, whose richly carved and gilded frame I even with the coarsest prints that were hung up in the same wall. Very odd, all this. To be sure, I was no companion of the Browns, and that the Brown's sea-faring days, treasures picked up in the course of his wanderings. And yet—I doubted.

I stood a very little while in my confusion and doubts. An officer arrived suddenly, a lieutenant in the United States navy, who had been charged with the duty of inspecting all the light-houses on the Atlantic coast. He found nothing to blame at Fruit Creek.

"Your lamps and lantern are in perfect order, Mr. Halford," said the officer, "and you keep them splendidly," and your reflectors do you credit. I wish I had always the power to say as much, but there are a few Uncle Sam's light-houses hereabouts along the coast. No accident here in your time, sir?"

"Accident?" said I, rather perplexed.

"Ah, yes, it's best to call them by that name," said the lieutenant, with a look of deep commiseration for their frequency he breakers, especially in rough or foggy weather. Ships often mistake the lights for stars, and run on shore. Last-mail we wrecked people will fasten lanterns to horses, and keep moving about along the beach, to make poor wretches at sea. I see, Mr. Halford, by your face, that you are surprised. Briefly, then, there are wreckers on the coast, and a few years ago a vessel was driven on a few wrecks, on remote parts of the chain of sandy islets, has since been almost occurred in my own neighborhood. Day after day I have seen the boats of the wreckers engaged in salvage, and fighting their way bravely through the angry sea. Night after night my beacon lights answered the friendly blaze to north and south, and along the wave-lashed coast-line the signs of danger were absent, most to see. By this time I was in a comparatively sick of my employment. I had saved a little money. I had made many sketches, and had made myself over to the conviction that I had a fair of study and practice. And as I found my isolation tedious to the verge of madness, I applied to the authorities to inform them of my intention to resign, as soon as my successor should be ready to assume my duties.

On a blustering and dark autumnal day, when the clouds were driving fast across the threatening sky, and the waves rolled in with a hoarse murmur, I suddenly came, in the course of a lonely ramble along the inland shore, upon Japhet. There were standing in a little hollow between two hillocks of loose sand, gazing out earnestly to seaward, the eyes instinctively followed the direction of theirs, and I saw a large ship under double-reefed topsails, with her mizzen-mast gone, foundering along the coast line, with her bows turned southward. The wind was unfavorable to her, and she had much ado to make very slow progress indeed, by dint of incessant tacks. No time was to be lost, unless not striking, as my forebears did anciently, on the rocks, and conveyed in loud, unguarded tones. "There she goes on the larboard tack again. At that rate she'll never weather Cape Hatteras, and never make ten cables' length of way," said the younger and taller of the two.

"She could fetch Ocracoke inlet, with the wind where it is, and like to freshen," observed the other, in an oily, insinuating voice which I recognized as that of Daddy Brown; "I guess her skipper don't know this coast. The fool's sure to hung somewhere, soon or late."

"A good job if she came ashore within our bounds!" continued the younger who was no other than Asphet Brown; "deep laden as she is, there'd be pickings worth a wet jacket. We should had a clutch at them, and no mistake for the—"

"Hush!" silently observed old Brown, who had just turned his head, and caught a glimpse of me: "hush! there's ears about."

Asphet colored, and looked very sullkly as I descended the sand-hill and wished him and his father "good-day." But Mr. Brown was very bland. "Glad to find you here, sir," he said blandly. "Here's been you these two months agone. Dirty weather!"

Our conversation was not a long one, and we soon parted. But, to my great surprise, when I got near home I heard some one panting after me, and up came Asphet at a run, "Mr. Halford," he gasped out, "says yew would do him proud if yew'd look in at Fruit Creek to-night. The gals have got a new dance from the Havannah and string 'em—and there's lots of neighbors comin'. Much more odd to yew than the dances and games, and a supper fit for the President. Will you come?"

Now if I had consulted my own inclinations I should have declined, but I was anxious to give no offense, and I knew that I could not afford gratuitously be attributed to the pride of superior station and acquirements, so I accepted.

"That's right," said Asphet, and Japhet, drawing a long breath: "I hate a fellow to be nasty proud, I do. Ah, yew and we might work well together, and yew'd make a better thing of it than the State salary, if yew only knew which side your treat was buttered."

"What do you mean?"

But Japhet turned on his heel with a horse-laugh, saying, in a loud voice,

"Never yew mind, reckoned yew've promised to come, and that's better at six. Don't be later nor the half past, chap!"

Off he went. I went home, and, as I turned my head in the act of mounting the sand-hill I saw the same ship still within a mile of the shore. The dusk was deepening fast into the obscurity of night, but I could see that she was making but slow progress, while there was every indication of a storm. I went up the hill, lighted and arranged my lamps with my accustomed care, and then sat down to read for a while. At half past five I made such slight alterations in my dress as were necessary, threw my Mackintosh cloak over my shoulders, and after a glance at the ship, which appeared to set out. I had never before left the lamps to burn in my absence.

I had a long and disagreeable walk to Fruit Creek; the wind had begun to moan and shriek, and every time the gusts dragged at my shoulders as if to hold me back, and my feet sank deep and among the sand-hills. It was very dark, and rain and sleet came driving before the wind. Here my weary tramp along the desolate shore, I thought that Daddy Brown's house, with a ruddy radiance streaming from its windows, and its round-cheeked, smart crowded with men, matrons, girls, and strippings, promised a cheerful scene. There was an abundance of fun, laughter, and hearty mirth at this "frolic." An endless country dance was followed by a set of couples, with an adagio accompaniment of stamping and clapping of hands; then came a reel, which was led off by the slipper and blindman-s-buff, were played. At another time I should have watched the scene with keen interest; but my spirits were jaded, and my spirits were low, and my heart was heavy within me. Something like a foreboding weighed me down, in spite of all my efforts to shake off the load of sluggishness. I could not, however, be rude at Daddy Brown received very glad to see me, and as Seth and Symmachus, the younger sons, "Ah, ha! you're late."

"The boys are all right," said Daddy Brown, in answer to my inquiry; "they're out late; been over to the inlet after flocks. We'll have them after supper-time, Britisher."

I declined dancing, and for some time contented myself with the part of a spectator. But the fiddling, laughter, and loud talking jarred on my ears: I became more and more oppressed by the gloom that had clouded my mind, why, I knew not, and at last I could bear it no longer. Watching my opportunity, I slipped out unobserved, and set out on my lonely homeward walk.

About half-way between the light-house two men with their heads depressed, as they pushed their way against the wind and rain, came hurrying rapidly past, and crossed me without seeing me.

They were of much the height and build of Seth Brown and his brother; but what errand could possibly have taken them to the Cape, when their father had accounted so plausibly for their absence?

A vague, formless misgiving came to chill my heart with dread. What errand could have led those two young men to my desolate dwelling on a night of revelry? I set my teeth and strode on faster. Was that lightning, that red flash through the darkness to seaward? No. After a pause came the sullen boom of a cannon. Some ship in distress, no doubt, from some ship in peril. I pressed on. At last I could see the light-house, sending, as usual, its friendly and cheerful radiance far over the roaring sea. As usual? No, for my practiced eye soon detected a change. The new light burned alone; the green lamp was gone!

"Great Heaven!" I cried, aloud, "this is some dreadful accident, or else villains have been tampering with the lights,—those ruffians—the ship—the invitation—I see it!" With a groan I set off to run at my utmost speed, hoping to arrive in time to light the extinguished lamp before the doomed ship, whose signal I had heard, should be lured to her fate. For at a glance I had divined the heartless scheme of the wreckers. The red light burning alone would be taken for that on Cape Lookout, and the captain, utterly deceived, would seek an imaginary channel where the fatal sand-bars lay.

Before I got home, however, flash upon flash, boom after boom, told of the urgent danger, which the mariners had perceived when it was too late. Each report was nearer and nearer, and the vessel was driving fast toward the beach. Panting, I hurried to the house. Juba was asleep and snoring in a corner of the kitchen, and his mistress was rocking herself before the fire, crooning out some plantation ditty. Evidently the blacks knew nothing of what had been done. I ran to the glazed chamber, where the lamps stood. Hastily I relighted that which had been extinguished, and then approached the glass and looked out. For a while I saw nothing but the flashes of the minute-guns: but presently a broad and lurid glare arose, and I could see by the light of an enormous fire of tar-barrels and wood, which had been hastily piled upon the beach, that the vessel had already grounded. She had struck bows foremost, her upper spars and rigging had gone overboard, covering her deck with a tangled mass of ruin, the waves breaking furiously over her. Hard by I could see a number of men, their swart figures clearly defined in the blood-red light, bustling up and down the sands. They had lighted the fire—the wreckers. Without pausing to consider the possible consequences to myself, I hurried down the ladder, calling on Juba to follow me; and, rushing toward the beach, hoped that I might be in time to reach a helping hand to some of the poor perishing creatures. When I drew near I heard a great shout. The vessel had parted amidships. The whole sea, crimson with fire-light, was covered all over with floating beams, bales, boxes, fragments of wreck, and struggling human forms. The latter were but few, and their cries for help were disregarded by the greedy wretches on shore, who rushed, with loud shouts, waist-deep into the sea, to secure plunder. Chests, casks, and other prizes were hurriedly grasped, and rolled or dragged above the reach of the waves, while the wreckers encouraged each other in their unhallowed task. It was a hideous scene, but I was little of it, for my eye was suddenly lighted on something like a bundle of clothes, lashed to a bench of light cane-work, which was floating in an eddy hard by. The white bundle stirred as it was swept past, and the long golden hair of a child, and the pale pretty face of a child, were clearly visible in the crimson light. In an instant I was standing in the foaming water, which reached above my waist, and I had a firm grasp on the object that had attracted my notice. The undertow nearly bore me off my feet, and I staggered, but I held the child fast, cut the cord that fastened her to the bench, and bore her in my arms to the beach. A sweet face, innocent and beautiful, the face of a seraph! She was wet and cold, but fear had not benumbed her faculties, for she clung to my shoulder with one tiny hand, while with the other she pointed to the sea, and murmured in a weak voice, "Mamma! Please help! Oh pray, pray save mamma!"

Poor child! I looked on her with pity; no doubt was in my mind that her mother had perished in the disaster. The little girl—she could not have been above seven years old—pointed eagerly to a mass of wreck that turned and twirled in the eddy as it drifted past, and begged and prayed me passionately—"to help dear mamma."

The child was right: there was a human figure lashed to those spars, and the long brown hair and the streaming garments showed that the apparently lifeless form was a woman's. I laid the child lightly on the sand-bank, telling her not to be afraid, and throwing off my coat, plunged into the sea, and with great difficulty dragged the floating mass to shore. The little raft, hastily composed of a couple of studding-sail-booms and a hencoop, lashed together, had drifted far out before I reached it, and the strong current nearly sucked me out to sea as I swam back, panting and dripping wet; but I managed to drag the poor lady from the waves. She was quite insensible, her eyes were closed, and but for the very faintest action of the heart I should have thought life was extinct. A pale, delicately-moulded face, with some resemblance to that of the beautiful child, though the complexion and color of the hair were very dissimilar. The little girl put her arms round her mother's neck, and kissed her a hundred times.

I now began very seriously to consider how I should get the sufferer conveyed to safe shelter. To the wreckers I dared not appeal. Fortunately they had been too busy to notice what was going on at a distance of fifty paces, and if they had seen me at all they probably took me for one of the gang. But I dared not call to them for help. They wanted no living witnesses of their misdeeds, no living claimants of the property which they were lawlessly appropriating.

As I swam back with my second prize my face had been toward the wreck, and I had distinctly seen two human heads rise above the broken water, and two eager, gasping human faces, and the outstretched hands of two half-drowned men. Both were barebacked and drenched with salt-water, but by the momentary glimpse I caught of them I should have said that the one was a seaman, the other, who wore a dark mustache, a gentleman. They held out their hands, and cried for aid, but none came. Only a tall man, whose face I did not see, but whose figure was like that of Japhet Brown, rapidised them with a boat-hook he carried, and pushed them back into the deep water, amidst the jeers and yells of the wretches on shore. And so they sank, murdered for the sake of gain. I felt that my own life hung on a thread. If any wrecker espied me, the villains would not hesitate at another crime. But how could I go? I could carry the child with ease, but her poor mother!

Thank God!

Juba, in person! I had quite forgotten that I had ordered the young negro to follow me; I had far outstripped him, but I looked up and saw his black face. He was dreadfully alarmed at the fierce shouts and excited gestures of the wreckers, and was on the point of making off when I caught him by the collar. Between us we contrived to carry the young woman over the dreary sand-hills between us and the light-house, the child being sufficiently recovered to walk. We laid our patient on my bed, and when Aunt Polly had exhausted her first transports of astonishment, she proved an excellent nurse. Thanks to the care and zeal of the kind negress Mrs. Fairfax gradually revived. It was from her own lips that I learned her name and position in life. She was the young wife of a gentleman of good fortune in North Carolina, and nephew to the Governor of that State. But—poor thing!—I could not disguise from her that she was a widow, though I spared her the additional pang of knowing that her husband had been one of those who had been inhumanly thrust back into the sea to perish, although I had little doubt that one of the murdered men had been Captain Fairfax, whose description tallied with that of the poor victim I had beheld.

Leaving the widow weeping over her recent loss, while she clasped her rescued child as if she feared to lose her too, I went to make preparations for leaving the island. Most fortunately I had employed my leisure in repairing a dismasted boat. True, it had no mast, but it was now water-tight, and a pair of the old oars were fit for use. Before I slept I brought the boat from the creek, and moored it to the quay ready for a start. My great fear was that, before we could escape, some of the wreckers might discover that I had been an eye-witness of their crimes, and had saved some of the passengers on board the foundered ship, which I now learned was the Astarte, of Boston. On this account, shortly after daybreak I caused mattresses and pillows to be placed in the boat; and Aunt Polly, Juba, and I, carried down Mrs. Fairfax, who was too much exhausted to walk. The child followed, and Aunt Polly arranged the blankets and cloaks around the invalid, while Juba was to take one oar, and I the other. The black lad was not wholly unused to a boat, having rowed on the river near Wilmington. In case of pursuit, which, however, seemed improbable, I had placed the loaded gun in the boat, but hidden one of the cutlasses under my pea-coat, and concealed the other in the sand. We were just ready to push off when I remembered that my sketches and drawings, which I was loth to leave, were still within the light-house. I ran back, put the portfolio under my arm, and was on the threshold of my late dwelling, when the figure of a tall man appeared in the door-way.—Japhet Brown!

His face was swollen and coarse with drink, and his fiery eyes drooped as they met mine.

"Whither away, chap? Yow soon in a plaguy hurry!" he growled, and extended his hand.

"I am going out. I have no time for conversation."

The young villain burst out into oaths and curses.

"Conceited British hound, who be yew, to refuse to shake an honest man's hand?"

"A murderer's hand, you mean!" I cried, indignantly, though I repented the words before they were well out.

Japhet turned livid with passion. "You know too much, my gentleman. I'll stop your jaw pretty smart."

So saying, he threw himself upon me, but I was luckily armed, and I drove him out of the light-house, pursuing him, cutlass in hand, for a short distance. Then I went back to the boat. Juba and I were not first-rate rowers, the boat was heavy, and our progress was slow. Before we were half-way across the sound I descried a swift whale-boat clearing the waters on our track. No doubt the wretch Japhet had given the alarm to his comrades, and had we been overtaken the secret would have been preserved by the sacrifice of all our lives. But a sloop passing within hail picked us up and carried us to the main land. Before nightfall we were able to place Mrs. Fairfax and her little daughter under the safe care of her husband's relations.

I have little more to tell. The gratitude of the Fairfax family pressed upon me a large pecuniary reward. This I declined, but I gladly accepted patronage which enabled me to leave for Europe two years later with—for an artist—a pure reasonably heavy. A states marshal, backed by an armed force, was dispatched to Cape Hatteras with a warrant for the apprehension of the guilty. But some delay had occurred, and the Browns fled to Texas, in which remote region, years afterward, I read of the execution, by lynch law, of Japhet and his father for robbery and murder.

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER LXXV.

I found Mrs. Ashleigh waiting for me in our usual sitting-room. She was in tears. She had begun to despond of Lilian's recovery, and she infected me with her own alarm. However, I disguised my participation in her fears, soothed and sustained her as I best could, and persuaded her to retire to rest. I saw Faber for a few minutes before I sought my own chamber. He assured me that there was no perceptible change for the worse in Lilian's physical state since he had last seen me, and that her mind, even within the last few hours, had become decidedly more clear. He thought that within the next twenty-four hours the reason would make a strong and successful effort for complete recovery; but he declined to hazard more than a hope that the effort would not exhaust the enfeebled powers of the frame. He himself was so in need of a few hours of rest that I ceased to harass him with questions which he could not answer, and fears which he could not appease. Before leaving him for the night, I told him briefly that there was a traveler in my hut smitten by a disease that seemed to me so grave that I would ask his opinion of the case, if he could accompany me to the hut the next morning.

My own thoughts that night were not such as would suffer me to sleep.

Before Margrave's melancholy state much of my former fear and abhorrence faded away. This being, so exceptional that fancy might well invest him with preternatural attributes, was now reduced by human suffering to human sympathy and comprehension. Yet his utter want of conscience was still as apparent as in his day of joyous animal spirits. With what hideous candor he had related his perfidy and ingratitude to the man to whom, in his belief, he owed an inestimable obligation, and with what insensibility to the signal retribution which in most natures would have awakened remorse!

And by what dark hints and confessions did he seem to confirm the incredible memoir of Sir Philip Derval! He owned that he had borne from the corpse of Haroun the medicament to which he ascribed his recovery from a state yet more hopeless than that under which he now labored! He had alluded rapidly, obscurely, to some knowledge at his command "surer than man's!" And now, even now, the mere wreck of his former existence, by what strange charm did he still control and confuse my reason! And how was it that I felt myself murmuring, again and again, "But what, after all, if his hope be no chimera, and if Nature do hide a secret by which I could save the life of my beloved Lilian?"

And again and again, as that thought would force itself on me, I rose and crept to Lilian's threshold, listening to catch the faintest sound of her breathing. All still, all dark! and Faber doubts whether all his art can turn aside from her couch the stealthy tread of death, while in yon log-hut one whose malady recognized science could not doubt to be mortal has composed himself to sleep confident of life! Recognized science! recognized ignorance! The science of to-day is the ignorance of to-morrow! Every year some bold guess lights up a truth to which but the year before the schoolmen of science were as blinded as moles.

"What then," my lips kept repeating—"what if Nature do hide a secret by which the life of my life can be saved? What do we know of the secrets of Nature? What said Newton himself of his knowledge? 'I am like a child picking up pebbles and shells on the sand, while the great ocean of Truth lies all undiscovered around me!' And did Newton himself, in the ripest growth of his matchless intellect, hold the creed of the alchemists in scorn? Had he not given to the object of their research his days and his nights? Is there proof that he had ever convinced himself that the research was the dream which we, who are not Newtons, call it?* And that other great sage, inferior only to Newton—the calculating doubt-weigher, Descartes—had he not believed in some occult nostrum or process by which human life could attain to the age of the Patriarchs?"†

In thoughts like these the night wore away, the moonbeams that streamed through my window lighting up the spacious solitudes beyond—mead and creek, forest land, mountain top—and the silence without broken by the wild cry of the night-hawk and the sibilant melancholy dirge of the shining chrysococyx;‡ bird that never sings but at night, and obstinately haunts the roofs of the sick and dying, ominous of woe and death.

But up sprang the sun, and, chasing these gloomy sounds, out burst the wonderful chorus of Australian groves, the great kingfisher opening the jocund melodious babble with the glee of his social laugh.

And now I heard Faber's step in Lilian's room—heard, through the door, her soft voice, though I could not distinguish the words. It was not long before I saw the kind physician standing at the threshold of my chamber. He pressed his finger to his lip, and made me a sign to follow him. I obeyed, with noiseless tread and stifled breathing. He waited me in the garden under the flowering acacias, passed his arm in mine, and drew me into the open pasture land.

"Compose yourself," he then said; "I bring you tidings both of gladness and of fear. Your Lilian's mind is restored: even the memories which had been swept away by the fever that followed her return to her home in L—— are returning, though as yet indistinct. She yearns to see you, to bless you for all your noble devotion, your generous, great-hearted love; but I forbid such interview now. If in a few hours she become either decidedly stronger or decidedly more enfeebled, you shall be summoned to her side. Even if you are condemned to a loss for which the sole consolation must be placed in the life hereafter, you shall have at least the last mortal commune of soul with soul. Courage—courage! You are man! Bear as man what you have so often bid other men submit to endure."

I had flung myself on the ground—writhing worm that had no home but on earth! Man, indeed! Man! All at that moment I took from manhood was its acute sensibility to love and to anguish!

But after all such paroxysms of mortal pain there comes a strange lull. Thought itself halts, like the still hush of water between two descending torrents. I rose in a calm, which Faber might well mistake for fortitude.

"Well," I said, quietly, "fulfill your promise. If Lilian is to pass away from me, I shall see her, at least, again; no wall, you tell me, between our minds: mind to mind once more—once more!"

"Allen," said Faber, mournfully and softly, "why do you shun to repeat my words—soul to soul?"

"Ay, ay—I understand. Those words mean that you have resigned all hope that Lilian's life will linger here when her mind comes back in full consciousness. I know well that last lightning flash and the darkness which swallows it up!"

"You exaggerate my fears. I have not resigned the hope that Lilian will survive the struggle through which she is passing; but it would be cruel to deceive you—my hope is weaker than it was."

"Ay, ay—again I understand! Your science is in fault—it desponds. Its last trust is in the wonderful resources of Nature—the vitality stored in the young?"

"You have said: Those resources of Nature are wondrous. The vitality of youth is a fountain springing up from the deeps out of sight, when, a moment before, we had measured the drops oozing out from the sands, and thought that the well was exhausted."

"Come with me—come. I told you of another sufferer yonder. I want your opinion of his case. But can you be spared a few minutes from Lilian's side?"

"Yes; I left her asleep. What is the case that perplexes your eye of physician, which is usually keener than mine, despite all the length of my practice?"

"The sufferer is young—his organization rare in its vigor. He has gone through and survived assaults upon life that are commonly fatal. His system has been poisoned by the fangs of a venomous asp, and shattered by the blast of the plague. These alone, I believe, would not suffice to destroy him. But he is one who has a strong dread of death. And while the heart was thus languid and feeble, it has been gnawed by emotions of hope or of fear. I suspect that he is dying, not from the bite of the reptile, not from the taint of the pestilence, but from the hope and the fear that have overtasked the heart's functions. Judge for yourself."

We were now at the door of the hut. I unlocked it: we entered. Margrave had quitted his bed, and was pacing the room slowly. His step was less feeble, his countenance less haggard than on the previous evening.

He submitted himself to Faber's questioning with a quiet indifference, and evidently cared nothing for any opinion which the great physician might found on his replies.

When Faber had learned all he could, he said, with a grave smile, "I see that my advice will have little weight with you; such as it is, at least reflect on it. The conclusions to which your host arrived in his view of your case, and which he confided to me, are, in my humble judgment, correct. I have no doubt that the great organ of the heart is involved in the cause of your sufferings; but the heart is a noble and much-enduring organ. I have known men in whom it has been more severely and unequivocally affected with disease than it is in you, live on for many years, and ultimately die of some other disorder. But then life was held, as yours must be held, upon one condition—repose. I enjoin you to abstain from all violent action; to shun all excitements that cause moral disturbance. You are young: would you live on, you must live as the old. More than this—it is my duty to warn you that your tenure on earth is very precarious; you may attain to many years; you may be suddenly called hence to-morrow. The best mode to regard this uncertainty, with the calm in which is your only chance of long life, is so to arrange all your worldly affairs, and so to discipline all your human anxieties, as to feel always prepared for the summons that may come without warning. For the rest, quit this climate as soon as you can—it is the climate in which the blood courses too quickly for one who should shun all excitement. Seek the most equable atmosphere—choose the most tranquil pursuits—and Fenwick himself, in his magnificent pride of stature and strength, may be nearer the grave than you are."

"Your opinion coincides with that I have just heard?" asked Margrave, turning to me.

"In much—yes."

"It is more favorable than I should have supposed. I am far from disdaining the advice so kindly offered. Permit me, in turn, two or three questions, Dr. Faber. Do you prescribe to me no drugs from your pharmacopœia?"

"Drugs may palliate many sufferings incidental to organic disease, but drugs can not reach organic disease itself."

"Do you believe that, even where disease is plainly organic, Nature herself has no alterative and reparative powers by which the organ assailed may recover itself?"

"A few exceptional instances of such forces in nature are upon record; but we must go by general laws, and not by exceptions."

"Have you never known instances, do you not at this moment know one, in which a patient whose malady baffles the doctor's skill imagines or dreams of a remedy? Call it a whim, if you please, learned Sir; do you not listen to the whim, and, in despair of your own prescriptions, comply with that of the patient?"

Faber changed countenance, and even started. Margrave watched him, and laughed.

"You grant that there are such cases, in which the patient gives the law to the physician. Now apply your experience to my case. Suppose some strange fancy had seized upon my imagination—that is the doctor's cant word for all phenomena that we call exceptional—some strange fancy, that I had thought of a cure for this disease for which you have no drugs; and suppose this fancy of mine to be so strong, so vivid, that to deny me its gratification would produce the very emotion from which you warn me as fatal—storm the heart that you would soothe to repose by the passions of rage and despair—would you, as my trusted physician, concede or deny me my whim?"

"Can you ask? I should grant it at once, if I had no reason to know that the thing which you fancied was harmful."

"Good man and wise doctor. I have no other question to ask. I thank you."

Faber looked hard on the young wan face, over which played a smile of triumph and irony; then turned away with an expression of doubt and trouble on his own noble countenance. I followed him silently into the open air.

"Who and what is this visitor of yours?" he asked, abruptly.

"Who and what! I can not tell you."

Faber remained some moments musing, and muttering slowly to himself, "Tut; but a chance coincidence—a hap-hazard allusion to a fact which he could not have known!"

"Faber," said I, abruptly, "can it be that Lilian is the patient in whose self-suggested remedies you confide more than in the various learning at command of your practiced skill?"

"I can not deny it," replied Faber, reluctantly. "In the intervals of that suspense from waking sense, which in her is not sleep, nor yet altogether catalepsy, she has, for the last few days, stated accurately the precise moment in which the trance—if I may so call it—would pass away, and prescribed for herself the remedies that should be then administered. In every instance the remedies so self-prescribed, though certainly not those which would have occurred to my mind, have proved efficacious. Her rapid progress to reason I ascribe to the treatment she herself ordained in her trance, without remembrance of her own suggestions when she awoke. I had meant to defer communicating these phenomena in the idiosyncrasy of her case until our minds could more calmly inquire into the process by which ideas—not apparently derived as your metaphysical school would derive all ideas, from preconceived experiences—will thus sometimes act like an instinct on the human sufferer, for self-preservation, as the bird is directed to the herb or the berry which heals or assuages its ailments. We know how the mesmerists would account for this phenomenon of hygienic introvision and clairvoyance. But here there is no mesmerizer, unless the patient can be supposed to mesmerize herself. Long, however, before mesmerism was heard of, medical history attests examples in which patients who baffled the skill of the ablest physicians have fixed their fancies on some remedy that physicians would call inoperative for good or for harm, and have recovered by the remedies thus singularly self-suggested. And Hippocrates himself, if I construe his meaning rightly, recognizes the powers for self-cure which the condition of trance will sometimes bestow on the sufferer, 'where' (says the father of our art), 'the sight being closed to the external, the soul more truthfully perceives the affections of the body.' In short—I own it—in this instance, the skill of the physician has been a compliant obedience to the instinct called forth in the patient. And the hopes I have hitherto permitted myself to give you were founded on my experience that her own hopes, conceived in trance, had never been fallacious or exaggerated. The simples that I gathered for her yesterday she had described; they are not in our herbal. But as they are sometimes used by the natives, I had had the curiosity to analyze their chemical properties shortly after I came to the colony, and they seemed to me as innocent as lime-blossoms. They are rare in this part of Australia, but she told me where I should find them—a remote spot which she has certainly never visited. Last night, when you saw me disturbed, dejected, it was because for the first time the docility with which she had hitherto, in her waking state, obeyed her own injunctions in the state of trance forsook me. She could not be induced to taste the decoction I had made from the herbs; and if you found me this morning with weaker hopes than before, this is the real cause—viz., that when I visited her at sunrise, she was not in sleep but in trance, and in that trance she told me that she had nothing more to suggest or reveal; that on the complete restoration of her senses, which was at hand, the abnormal faculties vouchsafed to trance would be withdrawn. 'As for my life,' she said, quietly, as if unconscious of our temporary joy or woe in the term of its tenure here—'as for my life, your aid is now idle; my own vision obscure; on my life a dark and cold shadow is resting. I can not foresee if it will pass away. When I strive to look around, I see but my Allen—'"

"And so," said I, mastering my emotions, "in bidding me hope, you did not rely on your own resources of science, but on the whisper of Nature in the brain of your patient?"

"It is so."

We both remained silent some moments, and then, as he disappeared within my house, I murmured:

"And when she strives to look beyond the shadow she sees only me! Is there some prophet-hint of Nature there also, directing me not to scorn the secret which a wanderer, so suddenly dropped on my solitude, assures me that Nature will sometimes reveal to her seeker? And oh, that dark wanderer; has Nature a marvel more weird than himself!"

CHAPTER LXXVI.

I strayed through the forest till noon, in debate with myself, and strove to shape my wild doubts into purpose before I could nerve and compose myself again to face Margrave alone.

I re-entered the hut. To my surprise Margrave was not in the room in which I had left him, nor in that which adjoined it. I ascended the stairs to the kind of loft in which I had been accustomed to pursue my studies, but in which I had not set foot since my alarm for Lilian had suspended my labors. There I saw Margrave quietly seated before the manuscript of my Ambitious Work, which lay open on the rude table just as I had left it in the midst of its concluding summary.

"I have taken the license of former days, you see," said Margrave, smiling, "and have hit by chance on a passage I can understand without effort. But why such a waste of argument to prove a fact so simple? In man, as in brute, life once lost is lost forever; and that is why life is so precious to man."

I took the book from his hand and flung it aside in wrath. His approval revolted me more with my own theories than all the argumentative rebukes of Faber.

"And now," I said, sternly, "the time has come for the explanation you promised. Before I can aid you in any experiment that may serve to prolong your life, I must know how far that life has been a baleful and destroying influence?"

"I have some faint recollection of having saved your life from an imminent danger, and if gratitude were the attribute of man, as it is of the dog, I should claim your aid to save mine as a right. Ask me what you will. You must have seen enough of me to know that I do not affect either the virtues or vices of others. I regard both with so supreme an indifference that I believe I am vicious or virtuous unawares. I know not if I can explain what seems to have perplexed you, but if I can not explain I have no intention to lie. Speak; I listen? We have time enough now before us."

So saying, he reclined back in the chair, stretching out his limbs wearily. All round this spoiled darling of Material Nature the aids and appliances of Intellectual Science! Books, and telescopes, and crucibles, with the light of day coming through a small circular aperture in the boarded casement as I had constructed the opening for my experimental observation of the prismal rays.

While I write his image is as visible before my remembrance as if before the actual eye—beautiful even in its decay, awful even in its weakness, mysterious as is Nature herself amidst all the mechanism by which our fancied knowledge attempts to measure her laws and analyze her light.

But at that moment no such subtle reflections delayed my inquisitive, eager mind from its immediate purpose—who and what was this creature boasting of a secret through which I might rescue from death the life of her who was my all upon the earth?

I gathered rapidly and succinctly together all that I knew and all that I guessed of Margrave's existence and arts. I commenced from my Vision in that mimic Golgotha of creatures inferior to man, close by the scene of man's most trivial and meaningless pastime. I went on: Derval's murder; the missing contents of the casket; the apparition seen by the maniac assassin guiding him to the horrid deed; the luminous haunting Shadow; the positive charge in the murdered man's memoir connecting Mar-

* Besides the three great subjects of Newton's labors—the fluxional calculus, physical astronomy, and optics—a very large portion of his time, while resident in his college, was devoted to researches of which scarcely a trace remains. Alchemy, which had fascinated so many eager and ambitious minds, seems to have tempted Newton with an overwhelming force. What theories he formed, what experiments he tried, in that laboratory where, it is said, the fire was scarcely extinguished for weeks together, will never be known. It is certain that no success attended his labors; and Newton was not a man—like Kepler—to detail to the world all the hopes and disappointments, all the crude and mystical fancies, which mixed themselves up with his career of philosophy. . . . . Many years later we find Newton in correspondence with Locke, with reference to a mysterious red earth by which Boyle, who was then recently dead, had asserted that he could effect the grand desideratum of multiplying gold. By this time, however, Newton's faith had become somewhat shaken by the unsatisfactory communications which he had himself received from Boyle on the subject of the golden recipe, though he did not abandon the idea of giving the experiment a further trial as soon as the weather should become suitable for furnace experiments."—Quarterly Review, No. 220, p. 125–6.

‡ Chrysococyx lucidus—viz., the bird popularly called the shining or bronzed cuckoo. "Its note is an exceedingly melancholy whistle, heard at night, when it is very annoying to any sick or nervous person who may be inclined to sleep. I have known many instances where the bird has been perched on a tree in the vicinity of the room of an invalid uttering its mournful notes, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that it could be dislodged from its position."—Dr. Bennett's Gatherings of a Naturalist in Australasia.

grave with Louis Grayle, and accusing him of the murder of Haroun; the night in the moonlit pavilion at Derval Court; the baneful influence of Lilian; the struggle between me and himself in the house by the sea-shore—The strange, All that is told in this Strange Story.

But warming as I spoke, and in a kind of fierce joy to be enabled thus to free my own heart of the doubts that had tortured and weighed on it, now that I was fairly face to face with the being by whom my reason had been so nearly shaken, my life so tortured, I was restrained by none of the fears that my own fancy deceived me, with which in his absence I had striven to reduce to natural causes the portents of terror and wonder. I stared plainly, literally, in the light of day, upon that which I had never dared even to myself to own without seeking to explain away—and coming at last to a close.

I said: "Such are the evidences that seem to me to justify abhorrence of the life that you and me to call it belonging. Your own tale of last night but confirm them. And why to me—to lengthen the life that has blighted my own? How did you even learn the home in which I sought unwalling refuge? How—as your hint to Faber clearly revealed—were you aware that, in you house, where the sorrow is veiled, where the groan is suppressed, where the foot-tread falls gliding lest there struggles now between life and death my heart's twin, my world's sunshine? Ah! through my terror for her, is a demon that tells you how to bribe my abhorrence into submission, and supple my reason into use in your evil?"

Margrave had listened to me throughout with a fixed attention, at times with a bewildered stare, at times with exclamations of surprise, but not of denial. And when I had done he remained for some moments silent, seemingly stupefied, passing his hand repeatedly over his brow, in the gesture so familiar to him in former days.

At length he said, quietly, without evincing any sign either of resentment or humiliation:

"In much that you tell me I recognize myself; in much I am so lost in amazement as you in wild dread and horror. The truth, Allen, that you say Philip Derval produced on me I have no recollection. Of myself I know only that I said he was my foe, that he came to England intent on schemes to shorten my life or destroy its enjoyments. And my faculties tended to concentration; there they converge as rays in a focus; in that focus they illume and—consume. They tend to destroy my intended destroyer. Did my will enforce itself on the agent to which it was guided? Likely enough. But it is so. Would I accuse me for slaying the tiger or serpent—not by the naked hand, but by weapons that arm it? But what could tiger and serpent do against power me than the man who would rob me of life? He had his arms for assault, I mine for self-defense. If he was to me as the tiger that creeps through the jungle, or the serpent uncoiling his folds for the spring. Death to him who lifts it is destruction to mine, be they serpent, or tiger, or man! Derval perished. But the will by which the assassin had turned the casket over revealed to me—no matter how; the contents of the casket were in my hands. And the moment of possession became I believed that Derval had learned from Haroun of Aleppo the secret by which the elixir of life is prepared. I had supposed that some stores of the essence would be found in his casket. I was deceived; not a drop! Well, there found I knew not how to use or apply, nor did I care to learn. What I sought was not there. You see a handwriting of mine of myself; it haunts, it accosts, it compels you. Of this I know nothing. Of the mental organization of myself that really producing this spectre of myself? or was it the thing of your own imagination—an imagination that had been impressed and subjugated? I know not. At the hours when my shadow, real or supposed, was with you, my senses would have declared me fast in sleep. It is true, however, that I intensely desired to learn from your lips your sister's name, but concealed from his everyday vision, the secret that I believed Philip Derval had carried with him to the tomb; and from your sister or another I can not now of myself alone, as I could years ago, subject those races to my supremacy. I must in that set through or with the mind of another. It is true that I sought to impress upon your sister's thoughts the image of the circle, the powers of the wand, which, in your trance or sleep-walking, made you the involuntary agent of my will. I know by a thousand, by dreams, more or less vivid, are the results of my waking will sometimes overthrown by the will—dead the spell had been broken, the discovery I sought not effected. All my hopes were then transferred from yourself, from the agent of science, to the girl whom I charmed to my thralldom through her love for you, and through reasoner: if reason has ever advanced one step into knowledge except through that imaginative faculty which is strongest in the residents of ignorance, and weakest in the ignorance of the wise. Ponder this, and those events that seem to you will cease to be marvelous. I pass on to the riddle that puzzles you most. By Philip Derval's account I am, in truth, Louis Grayle returned to youth by the elixir, and while yet infirm, decrepit, murdered Haroun—a man of a frame as athletic as yours! By accepting this notion you seem to yourself alone to unravel the mysteries you ascribe to my life and my powers. Oh, wise philosopher! oh, profound logician! you accept that notion, yet hold for belief in the Devil-Vish's tale a chimera: I am Grayle made young by the elixir, and yet the elixir itself is a fable?"

He leaned and laughed, but this time no longer even an echo of its former merriment or playfulness—a sinister and terrible laugh, mocking, threatening, malignant.

He rose as he swept his hand over his brows and resumed:

"Is it not easier to so accomplished a sage as you believe that the idlers of Paris have guessed the true solution of that problem—my place on this earth? My will in the low ear of Louis Grayle? And when Haroun refused the elixir to him, or he found that his frame was too far exhausted by the ravages of time and organic lesions of structure in the worn frame of old age, may he not have indulged the common fate of fathers, and soothed his death pangs with the thought that he should live again in his son? Then found dead—by a new guessed—rumor said strangled. What proof of the truth of that rumor? Might he not have passed away in a fit? What is there in your malady if I have recollections? They are vague—they often perplex myself; but so far from a desire to deceive you, my desire is to relate them so truthfully that you may aid me to reduce them into more definite form."

His face now became very troubled, the tone of his voice very irresolute—the face and the voice of a man who has been startled out of sleep by a dream, and is not yet quite awake, but is still encircling the garden of roses. I see myself with him in the hush of the golden noon, reclining on the grass, and he, with head leaning on his hand, and eyes gazing upon the sky, as if he could read on secret hieroglyphics there. With him, with him in moonlit nights, stealing into the sepulchres of mythical kings, and in a reflected light, explain and gloss the inscriptions, surrounded by awful shapes, which have no likeness among the creatures of the earth. Louis Grayle! Louis Grayle! all my earlier memories go back to Louis Grayle! All my arts and sciences, all that I have learned, all that I have spoken in Europe, of the sciences taught in her schools, I owe to Louis Grayle. But am I Louis Grayle? No. I am but a reflection of his genius, a reflection of his power. Louis Grayle! He stands apart from me, as a rock from the tree that grows out from its side. Louis Grayle! Haroun of Aleppo! Philip his son."

He leaned his face on both hands, rocking himself to and fro. At length, with a sigh, he resumed:

"I remember, too, a long and oppressive illness, attended with racking pains; a dismal journey in a wearisome litter, the light hurting my eyes, and the motion of the mule and so stately, smoothing my pillow or fanning my brows. I remember the sun-burnt face of the driver, and the folds of the litter aside, and the sky—the Aleppo! and the star of thy birth shining over its towers."

"I remember a face inexpressibly solemn and majestic. I remember a voice deep and full, and of its ominous eye sent through my veins—the face of Haroun, the Sage of Aleppo. I remember as he stood by my side, that I felt his breath, and the blessed relief from my pains that a drop from the essence which he distilled from a crystal bottle gave. And then—and then—I remember no more till the night on which Ayesha came to my room in the khan."

"And I rose, leaning on her, supported by her. We went through dim, narrow streets, chiefly lit by the moon, and startled by the cries of the dogs, that slunk from the look of that woman. We passed to a solitary house, small and low, and my nurse said, 'Wait.'

"She opened the door and went in; I seated myself on the step, and my head rested on her knee. I came out from the house, and led me, still leaning on her, into a chamber."

"A man lay there in sleep, on the carpet, and beside him stood another man, whom I recognized as the physician who had attended me. 'Haroun is dead!' said Ayesha. 'Search for that which will give thee new life. Thou hast gain, and will have gain.'"

"And I put my hand on the head of the Haroun after the dead man he—and drew from it the vessel of crystal."

"Having done so, the crown on the marble brow spoiled and fell. I staggered back, and swooned away."

"I came to my senses, recovered and rising, miles afar from the city, the dawn on its distant walls. Ayesha had tended me; she had also had tended Haroun."

"My first thought, when full consciousness came back to me, was of the elixir. I felt as if Haroun for himself as for me; and this woman loved and had tended him as she had tended me. I recollect that I even told me that he was dead, and forbade me henceforth to breathe his name."

"We traveled on—she and I, and the Indian, her servant—my strength still renewed by the wondrous elixir. No longer supported by her, what gazelle ever roved through its pasture with a bound more elastic than mine?"

"We came to a town, and my nurse placed before me a mirror. I did not recognize myself. In that town I remained many days. At the latter there reached me by which I learned that I was the offspring of a child wedded by the sons of a father recently dead. I learned that Louis Grayle was this father?"

"If so, was the woman, Ayesha, your mother?"

"The letter said that 'my mother had died in my infancy.' Nevertheless, the care with which Ayesha had tended me induced a suspicion that made me ask her the very question you put. She wept when I asked her, and said, 'No, only my nurse. And now I needed a nurse no more.' On the day she received the letter which announced an inheritance that allowed me to live free from the cares of life, she took woman bid me, and went back to her tribe."

"Have you never seen her since?"

Margrave was a moment, and then answered, though with seeming reluctance, 'Yes, at Jamestown. Not many days after I was borne to that city by the strangers, who found me half dead on their road, I woke one morning to find her by my side. And she said, 'I joy and in health you did not need me. I am needed now!'"

"Did you then deprive yourself of one so devoted? You have not made this long voyage—"

"To Ayesha no attachment; you, to whom health gave no excuse for privation?"

"The woman was with me, and some chosen attendants. I confided to ourselves the vessel we sailed in."

"Where have you left your companions?"

"By this hour," answered Margrave, "they lie in reach of my summons; and when you and I have settled our business—in the retreat in which we shall share—I will exact no more from you or call. I trust also that for my cure to my nurse and her swarthy attendants. You will me now, as a matter of course; the physician whom you have so needed to guide your own skill enjoins you to obey my wishes—if when you will call it, you will deny it, for on that question rests your own sole hope of happiness—you, who can love—I love nothing but life. Has my frank narrative satisfied you doubts that contradict you and me, in the great meeting-ground of an interest in common?"

"Solved all the doubts! Your wild story but makes some the darker, leaving others unfathomed. The terrible powers of which you boast, and some of which I have witnessed—your very insights into my own household sorrows, into my interest I have for yourself, in the hands of a fault so repugnant to reason—"

"Pardon me," interrupted Margrave, with that slight curve of the lip which is half smile and half sneer, "if, in my account of myself, I assumed what is to your conclusion and not to your conscience: let me first ask how many of the consciousness and powers of which you speak are involuntary and wholly inexplicable? When, for instance, you open your lips and utter a sentence, you have no more idea what the following word will follow another; when you move a muscle can you tell me the thought that prompts to the movement? Is a wholly mutable will on account for your own simple sympathies between impulse and action? Is there not in the instinct of a man upon earth who can read all the riddles in the heart and brain of another? Is it not law that rules the flying of water, one portion of matter, ever really touches another? Between which and matter is there not a gulf of space infinitesimally small. How, then, could the world go on if every man asked another to explain his whereby and why and being at full daylight before he would buy and sell with him? All interchange and alliance rest but in mutual interest in common—you and I have established that interest. All the rest, all you ask me now to explain, I could I answer—no doubt you would raise, still another, and whether should please or revolt you, your reason would be the same to the starting-point. Viz., In one definite proposal have we two an interest in common?"

And again Margrave laughed, not in mirth but in mockery. The laugh and the words that preceded it were like the laugh and the words of the young.

Could it be possible that Louis Grayle had indeed passed into the body and person of Margrave, such might have been his laugh and such his words. The whole mind of Margrave seemed to have undergone change since I last saw him; more rich in idea, more crafty even in candor, more powerful in intellect, I feared. As in our ordinary experience that come infirmity, threatening dissolution, changed into energy, by the concentration of early years, when impressions were vigorously stamped, so I might have thought that, as Margrave neared the end, the memories he had retained from his former existence in a being more highly organized, had certainly developed, propelled back to the brain, and the mind that had lived in Louis Grayle moved the lips of the dying Margrave.

"For the powers and the arts that it equally disclaims your own, and the elixir of life," I resumed my terrible guest, "I will say briefly but this: they come from faculties stored within myself, and developed in me by the most prolonged—faculties more or less, perhaps, given to all men, though dormant in most—vivid and powerful in me, because in me self-preservation has been and yet is the strong master-passion of existence; and because I have had the will, and to use and direct such faculties by profound teachers; some by Louis Grayle, the one teacher now by my own, the singer of chosen songs. But in much that I will to have done I know no desire than your knowledge to agree with me. Enough for me to will what I wished, and sink calmly in slumber, sure that the will would work somehow its way. But when I have willed to know what, when known, should shape my own courses, I could see, neither from your pallid face nor sloping scopes, all objects however afar. What wonder in that? Have you no learned, puzzle-brain metaphysicians who will not trust to sense but an idea, all this palpable universe an idea in the mind, and no more? Why am I an enigma as dark as the Sibyl's, and your metaphysicians as plain as a horn-book?" Again the sardonic laugh. "Enough: let what I have said obscure or enlighten your guesses, we come back to the same point of union, which binds man to man, binds states arise from the same cause, and men embrace as brothers. I need you, and you need me; without your aid my life is doomed; without my secret the breath will have gone from the lips of your Lilian before the sun of to-morrow is red on your hill-top."

"Fiend or juggler!" I cried, in rage, "you shall not so enslave or enthral me by this mystic bargain and jugon! Make your fantastic experiment on yourself, if you will; trust to your own science, but not to my sister's life shall not hang on your fiat. I trust it—love!"

"To what—to man's skill? Hear what the sage of the Aleppo shall tell you. Science! I ask you again for your aid. Do you trust to God's mercy?"

"Ah, of course you believe in your own God? We except a philosopher can reason a Maker away? But that the Maker will alter His course to hear you that whether or not you trust in Him or in your doctor, it will change by a hair-breadth the thing that must be? Science! believe Him, Allen, I trust."

And there sat this reader of hearts! a boy in his aspect, mocking me and the gray-beards of schools.

I could make no more—I turned to the door and fled down the stone stairs, and found in a low chant; feeble and faint, it was still the old barbaric chant by which the serpent is drawn from its hole by the charmer.

THE "NASHVILLE" AND "TUSCARORA" AT SOUTHAMPTON.

We devote page 97 to an illustration of the position of the pirate Nashville, and the United States steamer Tuscarora, in the harbor of Southampton, England. The correspondent of the London Times says:

The new screw sloop of war Tuscarora, whose arrival was reported yesterday, is moored at the entrance of the Queen creek, in the Southampton Water. Southampton water, about a mile from the dock mouth. She has her guns housed on deck, her rifle 70 pounder in her after pivot, ready to slip anchor and start at a moment's notice. The Nashville, which, it is reported, is expected every hour to take specially under her watchful care and protection, still remains quietly moored in dock, and the crew of gaffing up steam have betrayed themselves, although it was openly stated last night that she would be ready to start at noon yesterday, as to this morning, it would be very difficult to say, as the fires were not lighted, and the pipe with no flame. Probable conjecture is, both vessels will be under steaming at each other till the war is over. The Tuscarora is armed with two guns, the Nashville with four. The latter is said to have only two guns of somewhat inferior calibre. The former is a beautiful ship, just from Portsmouth dock.

As soon as the Tuscarora arrived here yesterday, Captain Craven communicated the intelligence to the flag-ship Donnellon, which left off NOTE, expressing the regret he felt at hearing of the death of the late Prince Consort Prince Albert, and asking if there would be any objection to his firing a minute gun. Permission was given to receive Orlock to-day, in respect to his memory. Captain Heath replied that in accordance of the flag-ship having requested that no guns should be fired in the vicinity of Odessa, the compliments, therefore, could not be returned. A number of inquisitive people visited the Nashville to-day.

Yesterday evening Captain Britton, the American Consul at this port, came off to pay his respects to Captain Craven, on board the Tuscarora, and, it may be presumed, made such arrangements as are usual in a matter of impossibility for the Nashville to make her escape.

The same writer says on the 10th:

About ten o'clock this morning, a cause of mustering out from the Nashville's funnel clearly betokened that her fires were lighted and steam getting up. At that hour, or shortly after, as stated yesterday, is moored in the stream, immediately and full steam on, which is the signal for the crew to be called up to quarters. A loud bell the latter vessel sheats but a few yards, and the crew of the Nashville are at the post of command. Orders are then whisted out and sent to the engine-room, as to the time of departure. Whatever may be the reason of the delay in the departure of the Nashville, certain it is that on the morning advanced the smoke gradually disappeared, the attempt was thought to move her from her berth, and at this time six o'clock this morning remain as they were, as regards the steamers. At 10 o'clock this morning Captain Craven still remains on board his ship, and has not yet gone ashore.

The correspondence of the Post says:

Captain Craven, the commander of the Tuscarora, has been officially informed that he will be allowed to leave with any hostile movement that the hostility of the Nashville will be entirely withdrawn. The latter vessel is expected to take her departure this week. She has been undergoing repairs for some time, and is now nearly ready for sea. The Tuscarora, Captain Craven, is said, although a screw frigate, the Admiralty agent here, his intentions to abide by those orders of the Government of the port of Southampton have been communicated to Captain Pegram with regard to the Nashville, who has the same accommodation. To prevent any attempt on the part of the Tuscarora to evade the demands made by the Nashville, the Admiralty tug, which lies off Netley Abbey, about three miles lower down the river, has been ordered to remain until supplied. She has orders to keep steam up, and is brought to by a spring cable, ready to cast off at a moment's notice. The agent of the Federal vessels, Mr. Fraser, has received official intimation that the Tuscarora has signed the Warrior, which vessel is the property of the Queen, and that the Nashville has also been ordered here from Portsmouth. It is not known whether she will be taken from her moorings to the docks by the crew of the Tuscarora, or of a combination of the Tuscarora with her steam launch now during the last few days.

The Times says that the Tuscarora is very badly built; that her guns are too large and heavy for a vessel of her size and class, that she is very crank, and is very properly. She is very leaky, and the men are obliged to be kept at the pumps until the fires in the engine-room are lighted; her, compelled to form an opinion, that she will not be able to stand the heavy gales of the Channel as well as the Nashville.

The Sumter is hourly expected from Cadiz and Gibraltar to call at Queenstown, the Federal cruisers are likewise on the way to the British Channel. The correspondent of the New York Times says:

But if the two Confederate steamers should happen to be taken at sea on the voyage, I need not tell you that all England would celebrate the victory. Of course, under these neutrality regulations, the Tuscarora can never take the Nashville, unless by a chance meeting at sea. There can be no pursuit after twenty-four hours. This rule gave some chance with sailing vessels, but there is none whatever with steamers. Besides, the Nashville is too tricky with his friends in Southampton to be caught napping. Such is the Confederate.

Mr. Wood says that the people of Southampton, who have grown rich by trade with the United States, are now almost subject to a mean against us.

BLOODY FIGHT AT OCCOQUAN, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY MR A. R. WAUD.]

FIGHT AT OCCOQUAN, VA.

ABOVE we illustrate the recent FIGHT AT OCCOQUAN, from a sketch by our own correspondent. The Times dispatch said:

Rev. Mr. Weston, of Trinity Church, has brought in the particulars of a fracas upon a gang of rebels on the Occoquan. He says they were holding a carousal in the house of one Porter, an old man, when they were surrounded by the detail of fifty men, and refusing to surrender, the firing commenced, and was continued until every rebel except two was killed. These two were Porter, who fought desperately to the last, and a young man who had been detained with the party. This latter was a citizen of Washington, and is claimed to be a Union man, but was doubtless a spy, who had taken information from Washington to the rebels. The number killed was ten—nine Texan Rangers and one citizen who was present.

AN INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE AMONG SLAVEHOLDERS.

ON this page we publish an illustration of an INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE used among the slaveholders of Missouri. The correspondent who sends us the sketch writes:

MONTGOMERY CITY, MISSOURI, January 24, 1862.

I send you the sketch of an instrument used by the re-creant slave-masters of Missouri to punish their negroes. Not long since one of these wretched victims came within our lines with an instrument of this description round his neck. It was securely riveted there, and required an hour's filing before it could be removed. This proved to be a very painful operation to the poor "contraband." For his neck was so snugly incased by the iron band, and the operation of filing was in a peculiar shape, as to render the operation difficult of accomplishment. The negro stated that he had worn it two months, and that it had never been unriveted by rebels! Using men of the same county. The form of the instrument prevented him from lying down and taking his rest at night; and its weight and close fit rendered it very burdensome during the day. It consisted of a heavy iron ring, fitting closely round the neck, from which extended three prongs, each two feet in length, with a ring on the end. I suppose the design of the instrument was that a chain should be attached to it, and thus secure the victim beyond all possible hope of escape; but this negro had been running loose, with the thing round his neck, for two months; and finally, ascertaining that Federal soldiers were near, speedily repaired to them for deliverance from his tormentor. Of course he found the deliverance which he sought, and the instrument of torment is preserved by us as a mournful example of the deep degradation to which the soul, tainted by coercion, may descend. It is needless to say that we did not send the negro back to his master, but so far as we were concerned, left him perfectly free to do his own will.

The person who has thus powerfully described in all humility is Dudley Weeks, of Montgomery County, Missouri, who is now serving his country, according to his capacity, and exciting the punishment due his crime; and if he does not receive it as an earthly tribunal he certainly will at the tribunal of an outraged conscience.

"BRITISH CIVILIZATION"—HOW THE ENGLISH TREAT PRISONERS OF WAR—BLOWING SEPOYS FROM GUNS IN INDIA, 1857.

THE BRITISH METHODS IN WAR.

We republish on this page, from the London Illustrated Times, an illustration which appeared in that journal in the year 1857, representing THE BLOWING OF SEPOY PRISONERS OF WAR FROM THE MOUTH OF CANNON. The circumstances of the case bear some analogy to those which are recurring at the present time in our Southern States. The natives of British India, whose grounds of discontent with their Government, unlike those of the Southern rebels, were substantial and grievous, rose in arms to strike for their freedom. The British Government, at first unsuccessful in its struggles with the rebellion, at length gathered up its energies and put them down. How it dealt with the prisoners of war taken in fight our illustration shows. The following extracts from British journals contain the narrative of a couple of executions:

A late mail from India brought accounts of two such executions. On 19th June, at Peshawur, forty men were tried, convicted, and ordained to be blown from the guns. The execution was a dreadful sight. Three sides of a square were formed by British troops, and in the centre ten guns were planted, pointing outward. In dead silence the decree of the court was read, and the ceremony conducted. A prisoner was bound to each gun—his back placed against the muzzle, and his arms fastened firmly to the wheels. The signal is now given, and the salvo fired. The discharge, of course, cuts the body in two; and human trunks, heads, legs, and arms may be seen for an instant flying about in all directions. As there were only ten guns used on this occasion, the mutilated remains had to be removed four times. All of these forty criminals met their fate with firmness, with the exception of two, who fell down time, they were dropped to the ground, and their brains blown out by musketry.

Another execution of a similar nature took place on the 13th of June, at Forcoporo. All the available troops and public establishments were convoked to witness the scene. Some of the nutineers were to be hung, and around the gallows, erected during the night previous, the soldiers were drawn up. The nutineers were then brought into the centre, and the proceedings of the general Court-Martial was read. Upon being informed that if they would become General's evidence they would be spared, twelve of the criminals accepted the offer and were marched to the rear. Six more were taken to the gallows. They ascended the ladder with firm steps, and to the last moment believed in a reprieve.

The remaining ten were then led over to the military band, and the order to "fire" came were being struck off! were ordered, "Do not sacrifice the innocent for the guilty." They refused, "Hold your quivering file men and not cowards—you defended your religion, why not now? Do you crave your lives? Sublish! they are not Sublish, they are dogs!" Others then began to upbraid their commanding officer. The wretched beings were quickly fastened to the mandate of not eye, chained with their companions. The commanding officer directed port-fires to be lit. "Ready!" "Fire!" and the drums was played out. An eye-witness says: "The same and silent were overpowering. I felt myself terribly concerned, and could observe that the most nervous native spectators were awe-stricken—that they not only trembled like respon-trees, but shook in every sense of natural bodily weakness. Not a shriek, a groan, or a convulsive movement was the murder of the guns; the consequence was that they were speechless, bereft of blood, and one man in particular received a stunning blow from a shivered sing!"

Another witness, W. H. Russell, LL.D., then an now correspondent of the London Times, wrote as follows:

A French General, in a letter to Sir Colin, expressed his regret that certain violences attributed to some of our officers in cold Blood—I presume alluding to Nana Sahib and the Princes of Delhi, and things of that sort—and that the Sepoys had been put to death without the sanction of a rebel. But Nana Sahib received from Abdulmejid his executions were so numerous and indiscriminate, that one of the officers standed to his colours, and in return wrote with him, on the ground that if he depopulated the country he could get no supplies for the men.—Diary, vol. i. p. 225.

And again, the same witness said:

The effects on treasonal (Sasnah) was exulcive of Nile, and thought he could show equal vigor. In two days forty-two men were hanged on the roadside; and a battle of twelve men were executed because their faces were "turned the wrong way!" There were not wanting those who said the severities could not have been justified by the Cawnpore massacre, because they took place before that dreadful act. An officer remonstrated with Renaud, on the ground that if he persisted in this course he would bring the village and render it impossible to supply the army with provisions.

In another instance Mr. Russell stated that a helpless boy, leading a blind man, sought the protection of an officer of Fusiliers, when the latter drew his revolver, snapped it at the wretched supplicant's head—but it missed fire—cocked and snapped it again and again, until the fourth time, when it went off, and "the boy's life-blood flowed at his feet!"

MARCHES.

MARCH, march, march!
Through road, and alley, and street;
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
With weary and aching feet.
Over the thirsty plain,
Over the dreary hill,
Over the dangerous ford,
Over the prairie chill,
Over the tottering bridge,
Over the desolate marsh,
Through the mountainous pass,
Flinty, and wild, and harsh!
On, on, on!
With weary and aching feet,
From sunset to midnight and dawn,
From dawn to the noontide heat.
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
All through the weary night;
Clamp, clamp, clamp!
Under the storm's light.
Peering for unbathed foes,
Startled with strange alarms,
Exhausted and failing out,
Tottering under their arms;
Hungry, and cold, and damp,
Weary, and sick, and sore,
Pursued, we must tramp or die,
Till the weary march is o'er.
Oh, the sad solemn marches!
Oh, the long and dreadful marches!
Oh, the forced and midnight marches
Of the troops!

March, march, march!
With banners and pennons gay,
With faces happy and bright,
In the light of the early day:
With the burnished muskets gleaming,
And the blazoned banners beaming,
And every brave heart dreaming
A dream of victory.
On, on, on!
No footing over mores slow;
Still fleeter and fleeter move,
We are marching on the foe!
Hurry, and hurry, and run,
More fleetly, we care not how;
We are marching toward the foe,
And the toil is nothing now.
No matter how fast we move,
Our hearts are ahead of our feet;
Our faces are toward the foe—
Hurrah! let our steps be fleet!
With our hearts all on the fight—
For never a thought must roam,
As we march toward the foe,
To the loved ones left at home.
No time for tenderness now,

No time for the dreams of love;
To-day the whole world looks on,
To-day we must heroes prove.
Then march, march, march!
With hearts and footsteps light;
No hardship in the march,
When we march toward the fight.
Oh, the glory of the marches!
Oh, the thrill of forward marches!
Oh, the quick and fast speed the marches
Toward the foe!

March, march, march!
The day is fought and won;
We are following their retreat.
Let us run, run, run!
Fleeter than frightened hares,
Pursue them as they flee,
And deal out slaughter and sing
Wild songs of jubilee;
While every heart keeps time
To the music of victory.
Dash, dash, dash!
Onward and ever on;
Crash, crash, crash!
The foes before us run;
Crash, crash, crash!
They are flying as they run.
Tramp, tramp, tramp!
We can think of our sweet-heart now,
And how proud we shall view
Battle laurels on our brow.
We can think of them all at home,
Reading the victory,
And talking of all the brave,
And giving us all our dues.
And so we march, march, march!
In our hearts but a single pain—
The thought of the brave, brave boys
Who will never march again!
The thought of the ones who fell
Mid the battle's rush and roar,
And who now are marching
With their camp-mates any more.
'Tis this alone that saddens
The grand marching music here!
The glorious forward marches
Of the troops!

HAYDN TYRO.

MRS. D—— AND CAPTAIN L——.

IN the city of Baltimore lives a lady named—No, we will keep back the real name from publication, and give only an assumed initial, calling her Mrs. D——.

Mrs. D—— is the wife of a gentleman engaged in mercantile pursuits, who is by no means rich nor especially ambitious; though, by carefulness and attention to business, he has accumulated some property, and lives in good style for a man of his means.

Mrs. D—— is very much unlike her husband in some respects. Social ambition is one of her weaknesses. In marrying Mr. D——, whose father had been a mechanic, she felt that she was letting herself down; but, as the good nature of an old aristocratic family that was decaying for lack of both moral and material force, she was willing to accept the chance of being ingrafted on a more vigorous stock, even though, in her estimation, the quality were inferior. Of this, however, a fair difference of opinion may exist.

Mrs. D—— had education Mrs. D—— considered herself a "lady." That is, a person of superior quality—made of finer stuff—than the great body of the people; and, for this advantage, entitled to deference and service from those who were held to be graded below her. Toward all persons who ranken in the same grade with her husband, Mr. D——, assumed an air of dignified superiority that offended some and imposed upon others. Assumption always carries: weight with a class. Her poverty before marriage—for the family had about exhausted itself by extravagance, indulgence, and want of thrift—had separated her from many early friends; and when, through the love of a mechanic, though a strong, true, and rising man, had caused others to drop an acquaintance which had not for some time been upon a footing of equality.

For several years after her marriage Mrs. D—— whose husband was still at their humble living, found it hard work to maintain her standing with any portion of the proud exclusives with whom it was her ambition to associate. Still she never gave at the gate, gliding in upon all accessible occasions, and holding a place by intrusion if not under acknowledged right. By flattery she got in favor with some, and through them drew to the side of others, whose opulent circumstances made them less sensitive and truly independent mind far in the distance.

Such was Mrs. D——. As her husband's means increased she pressed him closely for a more liberal disposition of them. Some of this he yielded, even beyond his own judgment; but never to an extent that touched his safety. She deemed extravagance; but he saw that her gifts did not exceed a certain sum that could be afforded. Gradually, through elegance of attire and assumed importance, Mrs. D—— widened her sphere among the exclusives, and, in corresponding degree, drew off from certain excellent people, who had been and who had rather tolerated than enjoyed her society.

Thus it stood with Mrs. D—— at this present writing. To sum her up in a sentence, she is vesak, badly educated, proud, vain, unrefined; the representative of a class of women who imagine themselves vastly superior to other people, but who have scarcely a claim to true womanhood—who call themselves ladies par excellence, yet have scarcely a lady-like quality. Mr. D——, on the contrary, is a man in the best sense, a gentleman, brave enough to be independent and outspoken in the face even of public opinion, and with sufficient force of character to maintain himself in any right action at home or abroad. His wife has learned not only to respect him, but to stand aside when he asserts his will.

To certain women in Baltimore, belonging to the equivocal class, a new excitement offered itself in the presence of United States soldiers, who did the good work of saving that city from self-destruction, if we save a madman by chains. Treason foiled was splenetic in its impotence. Prudence sealed the lips and regulated the public conduct of those members of men whose hearts beat pulse for pulse with the open enemies of their country, and who, if they could, would have given aid and comfort; but women could venture upon a larger liberty, and to their discredit must it be recorded, that, when fully dressed in "rebs and gay attire," were gold and diamonds, rule in splendid carriages, and in the ballet of the opera or the theatre, stooped to acts of coarseness and vulgarity that would shame a market-woman. Unprovoked insults were offered to soldiers and officers in the street by these women, who even spat upon them in many instances, thus showing the depraved quality of their minds. Foremost in the practice of these indignities was Mrs. D——, who was encouraged by the class among whom she visited.

One day, fired by the almost insane malice of half a dozen free-talking women, with whom she had been in conference, Mrs. D——, in company with a friend, started forth to enjoy the pain of soldiers and officers subjected to wanton insults, which, because offered by women, they could not resent. Passing a soldier, Mrs. D—— purposely dropped her handkerchief. The young officer, under an impulse of politeness—at home in such things—stooped, and, contrasting with a more cultivated society than the lady—stepped forward, and lifting the handkerchief from the pavement, offered it to Mrs. D——. There was an instantaneous flash of contempt on her face, and a strong upward curl of her lip. She drew back for a moment, like one in surprise at a rudeness, then taking the handkerchief between the tips of her thumb and finger, she held it at arm's length, contaminating infected, and, moving to the curb-stone, dropped it in the muddy gutter. Not designing to glance back as the lesbian she swept away with an air of dignified hauteur that, to her mind, was worthy of a princess. A scornful laugh from some quarter behind, lowa added to the soldier's momentary feeling of discomfiture.

Proud of her shame, Mrs. D—— swept down the street. In the next block she encountered an officer. Throwing upon him a look of supreme contempt, Mrs. D—— swerved from the right line of her course, and avoided him by taking a quick circle that brought her crowding up against a merchant's show-window.

"One of your wife women, in gala dress," remarked the officer to a loyal citizen with whom he was walking.

"No; she is the wife of a Baltimore merchant," was replied—"a Mrs. D——."

"Formerly a servant-maid, or woman of the low caste, judging from her manners."

"No; Mrs. D—— is from one of our best families."

"Heaven save the mark!" ejaculated the officer. "If she represents the best, of what style and quality must you be, sir, to be called so?" He thought her a woman of the town, and it was on my lip to address her as Miss Jones's substitute to the lady of rank who ventured a wanton insult:

"In silk and scarlet walks many a harlot—
Good-morning, Madam!"

"I wish you had done so," was replied. "It might have checked the bad reputation she was making for herself in the eyes of all decent people. But is there no remedy for such conduct?"

"I have made up my mind to check them in all instances where they exceed a certain limit."

"Ah! what is the limit?"

"My judgment of the insult, when it occurs, must determine."

"What will you do?"

"Hold the husband, father, or brother, as the case may be, responsible respectively."

"Will the rules of the service permit this?"

"I shall not ask them."

"Suppose the husband, brother, or father will not respond?"

"Then I shall govern myself by the law of circumstances. But of one thing you may rest assured—should I make a beginning in this matter I will not be end at halvards. I do not belong to a quick-blooded race, but the blood once heated cools slowly. Then we put our hands to the plow we never look back."

The officer and the citizen walked, conversing, for half an hour longer, when, being at the upper part of the city, they took a car and rode up Baltimore Street. In passing the store in which the officer bought an extra from a news-boy, and was standing at it when the lady who had swept so haughtily around him not long before entered the same store for dry-goods. Seeing the officer, Mrs. D—— gave a short, contemptuous "Ugh!" and sat down just opposite. From her sneering face the officer dropped his eyes quickly to the paper he had just opened, and began reading. Mrs. D—— at once commenting loudly aloud to her friend, and using the most offensive remarks touching the soldiers and the people of the States from which they had come. When she continued, the apparent unconsciousness of the officer increasing her irritation, and causing her to almost exhaust the vocabulary of low invective. As if she were not present, the officer read on. At last the car was in the neighborhood to which Mrs. D—— was going, and she nodded to the conductor. The check-string was pulled and the bell stopped. Mrs. D—— arose, and, to her shame be it said, so far lost all sense of decency and self-respect as to spit in the officer's face.

Looking up with flashing eyes, and red spots burning on his cheeks, the officer said, as he drew his handkerchief and wiped the venom from his face—speaking with suppressed anger—

"You are no lady! If you were a man you would not leave this car alive!"

An hour later, at Mr. L——'s, sat in his countingroom, a gentleman, with whom he was partially acquainted, came in. There was in the face of the latter an expression that sent a trembling wave across the feelings of Mr. D——. It was threatening and mysterious. He arose, bowing with some distance and formality.

"I come, Mr. D——," said the gentleman, "on very unpleasant business." An officer of the United States Service has received a public insult at the hands of your wife, for which he has determined to call her husband to account."

A sudden paleness overspread the face of Mr. D——. "I am willing to defend my wife," he exclaimed, in a tone of surprise. "How? when? where?"

"She spit in his face."

"Impossible!"

"I saw it."

"You must have grossly insulted her."

"On the contrary, he neither spoke to nor looked at her."

"Where was it?"

"In one of the city cars. He sat reading, and she, in company with a female friend, sat opposite. In conversing aloud they applied to soldiers the most offensive language, but he took no notice of them. Finally, they arose to leave the car, when Mrs. D—— bent forward and spit in his face. He rose, and then was he to be mistaken. The officer is Captain L——, of Massachusetts, a gentleman of wealth, education, and high social position, and he holds you responsible for the conduct of your wife."

Mr. D—— reclaimed the merchant, throwing his arms above his head. "Has the woman lost all sense and decency! What does Captain L—— want?"

"Nothing unreasonable, Sir. But these outrages upon brave soldiers, who are periling and pining the call of their Government and doing duty as it directs, must be made to cease. If the perpetrators are ladies, they must suffer for the conduct of their sex, their next of male-kin must answer in consequences. You must bear the burden of your wife's debt."

"My wife shall apologize," said Mr. D——. His mind was beginning to grow clear.

"Captain L—— can not call upon her to receive an apology."

"But she shall call upon him at his quarters."

"Very well."

"You want a challenge?"

"No; I come to demand satisfaction. If that is not given, then—"

"I must fight."

"Yes, Sir."

"I will not. Here is pen, ink, and paper. Sit down and write a challenge in the name of Captain L——. Make it strong. Confusion take these women! Will they never cease playing the fool?"

The friend of Captain L—— sat down and wrote a very peremptory demand for satisfaction, closing with the sentence, "I am empowered by him, full and complete, or you will be held to the last resort."

In less than thirty minutes from that time Mr. D—— stood, pale, angry, and agitated before his wife.

"At last," he said, passionately, "you have completed your evil work. Warning and remonstrance have been of no avail. Now, and you no more, no self-respect left? What fiend possessed you?"

The color went out of Mrs. D——'s face. Fear and alarm overshadowed it. Never in her life had she seen her husband so moved. Never had she felt in such awe of him. Usually so calm, his violence now almost appalled her, and she felt weak and ungodly guilty before him.

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"You spat in a gentleman's face to-day."

Her manner of shame confessed the counternance.

"Disgracing yourself and your husband in the very public eye; and now my life's blood must be the penalty. The officer whom you outraged—a man of wealth and high position—holds me alone me responsible for the insult. There is his challenge!" And he drew the paper from his pocket and held it forth.

Mrs. D—— shuddered and dropped nerveless into a chair. She was a coward at heart, in the way of consequences, than had ever entered her foolish brain.

"What will you?" she sobbed, "what have I done?"

"Disgraced yourself and put your husband's life in jeopardy," was the stern answer. "And now, you must choose one of two things: the humiliation of an apology, or the loss of your husband; and I shall not be the victim of affection demanded, even though I never fred a pistol, and the officer knows his weapon. Of course, I shall kill him."

"Kill!" she burst shivered on the air. "Oh, what have I done! What have I done!" followed in distinctions.

"An act for which atonement is demanded; and there is no escape. It is my life, or your humiliation."

"Where is the officer?" asked Mrs. D——, faintly.

"At the camp on Federal Hill."

"I will apologize," she spoke in constraint.

"I shall not go with you," Mr. D——, coldly. "I leave you free."

She was hurt by his manner

"Can you think such evil of me?"

"It must be your own act," he repeated.

"You will go with me?"

"No; I shall take no part in this humiliation. If Captain L—— demands my life, let him take it. I am a man, and never did a mean or ungentlemanly thing that I should humble myself before another man. If you were brave enough to offer an insult, you must be brave enough to make an apology. The issue lies in your hands."

Mr. D—— was wholly in earnest, and neither the tears nor entreaties of his wife moved him.

Captain L—— was sitting in his tent, in company with two other officers, when a sergeant came to the entrance and said that a lady had called to see him. The two officers moved to retire, but he desired them to remain.

"Conduct her to my tent," said Captain L——, in answer to the sergeant.

In a few moments a handsomely dressed lady, with her veil down, entered. Captain L—— advance recognized her, and stood up with a grave, but not angry countenance.

"Do you remember her?" she asked, partly drawing aside her veil, and showing a very altered face from the one she had seen in happier days.

"Mrs. D——," the Captain answered, bowing. There was a quality of tone and air about the officer that inspired her with a feeling of respect. He merely pronounced her name, and then stood awaiting her further purpose.

"I am here to offer an apology for conduct that has no excuse. Will you accept the apology?"

"On one condition," replied the officer.

"Name it, Sir."

"That you promise, on the word of a lady, never again to insult a soldier or an officer."

"I promise," was the low answer.

"Then the apology is paid, Madam. And now permit me to conduct you from the camp."

And with bearing of a gentleman as he was Captain L—— escorted Mrs. D—— to the carriage in which she had come, and closing the door for her after she had entered, with a low bow, said,

"The lesson is a severe one, Madam; but the fault was grave, and constructed a harsh reaction. We are here as friends, not enemies; as gentlemen, not ruffians. At the call of our country, not to invade and wrong. We come to save, not to destroy. When will you learn to read events aright?"

And turning from her the officer went back to his tent, and the lady rode to the city, an humbler, if not a wiser, woman.

The story, as such stories always will, got out, and was repeated from lip to lip. From that time women of Mr. D——'s style of thinking and feeling conducted themselves with a little more publicity decorum. It is quite certain that Captain L—— was never insulted again.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION AT HATTERAS.

We devote pages 101, 103, 104, and 106 to illustrations of the BURNSIDE EXPEDITION in the gulf of Hatteras, drawn from sketches by our special correspondent with the expedition. The general news paper dispatch said:

The expedition sailed from Hampton Roads on the 11th and 12th of January, and consisted of over one hundred and twenty-five vessels of all descriptions. They arrived at Hatteras between the 13th and 17th instant, having been greatly retarded by the heavy gales and rough sea which prevailed during that time.

After their arrival at Hatteras they experienced a series of storms of such severity that for two days in succession no more than one steamer could be reported as in communication between any two vessels of the fleet.

After the first storm it was discovered that the steamship Governor, with eight companies of the Twenty-first regiment on board, had gone ashore on the beach at Hatteras Inlet. The General Burnside had her steam-tug, the Lancaster, at hand, and sent her to her assistance. The Governor was lying on her beam ends, with her decks nearly awash. No vessel either could pass outside the bar during the thickest fort of water, unless very skillfully piloted, consequently the steamer New York, on the inside, was struck on the starboard side of the bar. The New York was loaded with a cargo valued at two hundred thousand dollars, consisting of powder, rifles, and bombs, and proved a total loss. The captain and crew, after bravely remaining by the ship for forty hours, were saved. The gun-boat Zouave dragged her anchors, had a hole stove in her bottom, and is now like a total loss. Her crew and guns were saved. The steamer Pembroke went ashore on the 17th instant, with the light-house, and became a total wreck. Ninety valuable horses belonging to the Rhode Island Battery were on board of her, and were nearly all drowned. Twenty-four, out of a total of five hundred and fifty, were saved. The Grapeshot, in tow of the New Brunswick, was also driven ashore during the storm, and became saved. An unknown schooner went ashore on the 15th, and another schooner, on the 16th, and six of her crew, were also lost on the beach. The steamer Louisiana struck on the bar during the height of the gale. The report of her having been burned is entirely incorrect. She may get off. The Delaware and the Valley-ere are also ashore. The latter will probably get off.

The water vessels attached to the expedition had not reached their destination when the Monticello left, and it is not been for the condensers on board some of the vessels and a vessel ashore, the most terrible privations must have occurred among the troops. As it was the water tanks were composed of wood, and consequently became oil casks.

The steamer was running at the rate of five miles an hour, and the chap soon found General Burnside and Commodore Goldsborough at dinner or communicating with their various vessels. All came running to the side of the Valley-ere and were soon on board. During the storm it increased, knocking up an ugly chopping sea, and obliging all the vessels to lie off both entrances and pay out all their chain. Strenuous efforts were made to get the Advertiser over, but the attempt proved useless, and about the eight-like another incidental trial was made. It was a fruitless contest with the elements, and the steamer set sounding on the "smash." To-day, affairs in the harbor look as a diplomatic visit. The steamer Valley-ere is moored at all communications. Since the storm of the 13th, she has been the only source of water; her coal is exhausted, and no coal means no water. She has about 300 troops (Massachusetts Twenty-fourth) on board, without so many rations as they have had no chance of getting, since down. She is probably in the same condition with ourselves—in want of water. Boats come alongside from the Cossack, covered with the feathery spray. She comes alongside of the Advertiser, and immediately General Burnside a message. It is a cry for water. Six hundred troops of the Fifty-first Pennsylvania Regiment on board, and six reporters, and no water—no whisky. The General reads the letter with moistened eyes, and frankly informs the messenger that their only resource is right to the Swatchel for it. If the gale continues there will soon be water. Water nowhere, and not a drop to be had. The Valley-ere steams away, and soon returns with a hole in her starboard quarter pounding on the hard sand of the midway channel.

Twelve o'clock, and no sign of the gale abating. On the contrary, otherwise. As far as the eye can discern through the driving mist and sleet is one broad sheet of white foam resembling a plain of newly-fallen snow. Dark clouds sweep down from the north, and, with their murky edges, seem almost to touch the vessel's masts as they go careering by, casting their gloomy shadows over the fleet, which sways and staggers under the mighty storm. A single person here and there appears on some vessel's deck, holding on by the rail or rigging, and a few scattering groups are seen peering the bows of the vessels, as shelter from the fury of the blast. The tents of the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts, which were yesterday pitched upon the beach, have all been swept away, and the poor soldiers must have spent a fearful night, exposed to the pellings of the pitiless storm; and yet no murmur might have been there. Beyond, where their struggling forms are seen standing on the beach, the billows of old ocean break upon the shore, tossing the spray from their snowy crests high into the air. It is a spectacle truly grand. Between the Hatteras and Winfield, as well as the Rhode Island Battery, whose unsheltered horses and men were only yesterday landed on the beach, must have suffered fearfully.

General Burnside, who for the last few mississippi his accustomed cheerfulness and resolution under all this load of responsibility, watches the incoming waves from the deck of the Arrowrod, and seems weighed down with their accumulated anxieties. Moreover, on the 20th of this month, the Monticello is bound to return to Hampton Roads. "This is terrible!" "When will the storm cease?" "The poor men, what will they do?" No one will realize that such a man is beloved by his men. But he is not the daughter, he is to the city." "Oh, Sir," "Oh, Sir," with power to smile the rock, and bid the waters be gath ered to merge their wants. They must wait on Sir, whose, whose ways are past finding out, and who "doeth all things well." The General may be seen in the companion that some wise purpose will be accomplished by these strange adversities. Such is the spirit of the man in charge of send in the hands of the Almighty. The condition of affairs, however, is grave. Moreover, on the 20th instant, the armor at the siege of Louisburg, soon only fitting perfidis to be his standard. Our soldiers are encamped on the sandy on which he sat out from Annapolis. With such a blame to be encountered, it is hoped that the storm will only overcome—the sun has not gone out.

The accompanying illustrations on page 101 represents Fort Hatteras, with Fort Clarke in the distance. We illustrated the spot very fully at the time General Butler first occupied it, and the view now given is taken from the inlet. At high-water the fort is an island, and the water is deep. One of the gun shown in the fore-ground of our picture on a plank-bridge resting on barrels. The stakes on the left of the picture mark the ground of soldiers. In the building on the right is devoted to the confectionery of water by the old and patent-condenser process. It is Ian Merry, of the First Artillery, is in command of the post.

One of the designs at the top of the page shows us the steamer George L. Peabody unshipping the horses of the Rhode Island Artillery at the Hatteras inlet. Another presents a view of the steamer Zouave sinking in Hatteras Inlet on 13th January; and also of the steamer Pembroke on the bar, with her foremast and smoke-stack gone, and the hulk going to pieces. The third depicts the Head Arrington, a building specially erected by the rebels for the reception of contrabands. There are upward of forty men here. The Gen—— Burnside says is "boss" of the establishment, and obligingly sat to be sketched by our correspondent.

Another picture shows the entrance of General Burnside's expedition to Pamlico Sound will be understood by reference to the map of the Coast Survey Department, drawn by A. Schoepf, now General in the rebel army. Hatteras Inlet, which has been represented on our chart by tints, one showing depths of less than six feet, the other presenting water from six to twelve feet deep. The first tint covers the edge of the tint and the dotted line the water is from twelve to eighteen feet. The steamers keep to the shore into the ocean for more than a mile on each side of the narrow channel through the middle of the inlet, and then turn to the course indicated by the line. After passing the second inner buoy, a steamer turns to the left and passes through the ocean from northwest by west to northeast. After about a mile on this northeast course another buoy is passed, and then the beginning of the shoals of Swash Channel. The course from this point is north a little over a mile, when steamers turn to starts the pilot to a northwest course; and after a mile in this direction is passed two fathoms of water, and another mile and a half is entered through a treacherous Sound is before him. So many shallow points lie about that only by the most accurate knowledge of the channel can vessels enter the Sound through this inlet.

On the west of Fishing Shoal is a limited anchorage for vessels drawing over twelve feet water. This is sometimes called Oliver's Channel, and it is the channel through which the vessels that were the six-score vessels of our fleet toured, careened, and dragged up from Fort Monroe. Swash Channel has not seven feet of water, except immediately after high winds from the northeast, north, and northwest, which drive water from the Sound. The gales which delayed the energetic General Burnside at the inlet brought a greater depth of water into the Swash Channel, which allowed the passage of his iden vessels through the intricate channel and over the shoals. Below will be found a chart indicate the depth of water where they are placed.

Throughout Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds are shallow banks which restrict the navigation of these inlets to vessels drawing seven light-draught vessels to particular channels.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT HENRY.

We illustrate very fully in this number the capture of FORT HENRY, Tennessee, which took place on 6th inst. On this page we give a portrait of COMMODORE FOOTE, and a picture, from a sketch by our correspondent, Mr. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT, of the GUN-DECK OF ONE OF THE MISSISSIPPI GUN-BOATS; on page 120 we give a view of the GUN-BOATS STEAMING UP TO THE ATTACK; and on page 119 a MAP showing the position of Fort Henry, and its geographical relations to Columbus, Bowling Green, and other strategical points.

We take from the Cincinnati Gazette the following account of the action:

THE BATTLE.

Yesterday (6th), at half past 10 A.M., the gun-boats Cincinnati, St. Louis, Carondelet, and Essex, the Tyler, Conestoga, and Lexington arriving up the river, advanced boldly against the rebel works, going to the right of Panther Creek Island, immediately above, where, on the east shore of the river, stands the fortification, and keeping out of range till at the head of the island, and within a mile of the enemy, passing the island in full view of the rebel guns. We steadily advanced, every man at quarters, every ear strained to catch the flag-officer's signal-gun for the commencement of the action. Our line of battle was on the left of the St. Louis, next the Carondelet, next the Cincinnati (for the time being the flag-ship, having on board Flag-officer Foote), and the next the Essex.

We advanced in line, the Cincinnati a boat's length ahead, when, at half past 11, the Cincinnati opened the ball, and immediately the three accompanying boats followed suit.

The enemy was not backward, and gave an admirable response, and the fight raged furiously for half an hour. We steadily advanced, receiving the concentrated storm of shot and shell, when, getting within three hundred yards of the enemy's works, we came to a stand and poured into him fight and left. In the mean time the Essex had been disabled, and drifted away from the scene of action, leaving the Cincinnati, Carondelet, and St. Louis alone engaged.

At precisely forty minutes past one o'clock the enemy struck his colors, and such cheering, such wild excitement as seized the throats, arms, or legs of the four or five hundred sailors of the gun-boats, can be imagined.

After the surrender, which was made to Flag-officer Foote by General Lloyd Tilghman, who defended his fort in a most determined manner, we found that the rebel infantry, encamped outside the fort, numbering four or five thousand, had cut and run, leaving the rebel artillery company in command of the fort.

The fort mounted seventeen guns, most of them thirty-two and thirty-four pounders, the being a magnificent ten-inch Columbiad. Our shots dismounted two of their guns, driving the enemy into the embrasures. Our shells burst in the embrasures, and must have done fearful execution among some of their gunners. The rebel channel is here but eleven effective guns, worked by fifty-four men—the number, all told, of our prisoners. They lost five killed, and ten badly wounded.

The infantry left every thing in their flight. A vast deal of plunder has fallen into our hands, including a large and valuable quantity of ordnance stores.

General Tilghman is disheartened. He thinks is one of the most demoging blows of the war. In surrendering to Flag-officer Foote, the rebel General remarked, "I am glad to surrender to so gallant an officer." Flag-officer Foote replied, "You do a gallant city right, Sir, in surrendering: but you should have blown my boats out of the water before I would have surrendered to you."

In the engagement the Cincinnati was in the lead, and, flying the Flag-officer's pennant, was the chief mark. Flag-officer Foote and Captain Stembel crowded her defiantly into the teeth of the enemy's guns. She got thirty-one shots, some of them going completely through her. The Essex was badly crippled when about half through the fight, and crowding steadily against the enemy. A ball went into her side forward port, through her heavy bulkheads, and squarely through one of her boilers, scalding and killing and killing several of the crew. Captain Porter, Lieutenant Buchanan, pilots, and Paymaster Lewis were standing in a direct line of the shot, and narrowly escaped the entire stream of the group. A shot struck Mr. Hutton on the top of his head, scattering his brains in every direction. The coupling steam went into the pilot-house, instantly killing Messrs. Foord and Bridge, pilots. Many of the soldiers at the rack of steam jumped overboard and were drowned.

The Cincinnati had one killed and six wounded. The Essex had six seamen and two officers killed, seventeen men wounded, and five missing. There were no casualties on the St. Louis or Carondelet, though the shot and shell fell upon them like rain. The St. Louis was commanded by Leonard Paulding, who stood upon the gun-boat and worked the guns to the last.

Not a man flinched, and with cheer upon cheer sent the shot and shell amongst the enemy.

FORT HENRY.

The Herald says:

This fort, the only fortification on the Tennessee River of much importance, is situated near the line of Kentucky and Tennessee, on the east bank of the stream. It stands in the bottom, about the high-water mark, just below the bend in the river, and at the head of a straight stretch of about two miles. It therefore commands the river for that distance down stream, and very little else. The land around it is a little higher than the fort, and a portion of it is covered with timber. The armament of the fort consists of eight 32-pounders, four 12-pounders, and two 6-pounders. Of the 32 and 12-pounders are heavy guns, and six 6-pounders light pieces. On the opposite side of the river are three hills, which completely command the fort. Formerly some new fortifications were commenced on these hills, where it was intended to mount some very large guns and three mortars.

The rebel garrison was commanded by Brigadier-General Lloyd Tilghman. The force consisted of the Fourth Mississippi Regiment, Seventh Mississippi Regiment, regiment Louisiana volunteers, First Kentucky volunteers, one regiment rebel cavalry.

THE GUN-BOATS.

The following description of the gun-boats engaged will be found interesting:

The gun-boats St. Louis, Essex, and Cincinnati are about one hundred and seventy-five feet in length, fifty-one feet and a half in breadth, and draw five feet when loaded. The bows and bulwarks consist of about three feet of oak timber, bolted together, and clenched with the best quality of wrought iron plates two and a half inches thick. The sides have the same finishing, with less solid timber. The St. Louis and Cincinnati are pierced for thirteen guns each, the Essex for nine guns. GUN-DECK OF ONE OF THE MISSISSIPPI GUN-BOATS ENGAGED IN THE ATTACK ON FORT HENRY.—[SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1862.

SLOW AND SURE.

WE publish on page 121 an illustration which is a most forcible answer to those critics, domestic and foreign, who complain that we are making no headway in the work of suppressing the rebellion. Both in Virginia and in Kentucky the roads are lakes of liquid mud, into which pedestrians sink nearly to the knees, and through which it would be impossible to move artillery or commissariat wagons. At the house we write, General M'Clellan on the Potomac, General Lane in Kansas, General Sibley, and General Buell on Green River are stuck fast in the mud, and if the lives of every man of their commands depended upon it they could not move. This will not last long, of course. Ten days of dry weather would enable forward movements to be made along the whole line. And in any event, the roads will become practicable in March. But at present no person possessed of ordinary reasoning faculties can blame our generals for not doing that which is physically impossible.

Even as it is the work goes steadily on, and we are witnessing the fruits of M'Clellan's ripe strategy and far-sighted calculations. General Thomas is steadily though slowly making his way into East Tennessee. The battle of Mill Spring is no evidence of the soundness of the plan by which it was brought on from the rebel accounts that, though Generals Crittenden and Zollicoffer were aware of the approach of our army many days before it reached them, they could not muster much more than half as many men as were led by General Thomas; and although they had chosen a strong position, and fortified it, his approach was so well planned that they were forced to come out of their intrenchments to attack him, with half only by reason of success. So in West Tennessee. The rebels had ample notice of our intended attack, and General Beauregard, with 20,000 men, was detached from Manassas to strengthen General Polk. A day or two before the attack on Fort Henry an order of the rebel Government at Richmond announced that "the Confederate" were in full force on the Tennessee River, and that nothing could possibly be added to their superiority. Yet a bombardment of an hour and a half by three or four gun-boats carried the water-side, and the "Confederates," who were in such force, were not to be found when Commodore Foote landed. Similar fortune will doubtless attend General Burnside. He will encounter at Roanoke Island, at Newbern, at Fort Macon, and wherever else he may go on the Sounds, a force vastly inferior to his own both in men and metal, and his success will be merely a question of hours.

The great question and the key to General M'Clellan's plan. It is "slow and sure." It is not swift enough to satisfy the idle gossips who indulge in tea-table criticisms of the very sure, and it takes no step backward. We have no idea that the future will differ from that which is typical by the movements of the campaign. Events will doubtless seem to succeed each other with painful slowness. But every week will witness some decisive blow struck, and no day will be marked by defeat or retreat. Whatever is done will be thoroughly done. Every rebel who can be met, he will fight, but by a superior force to theirs, armed with superior weapons. Wherever a battle takes place the odds will be enormously in favor of the Mill Spring. As soon as the roads enable our armies to move, they will be set in motion; but they will not move blindly, and without nothing will be left to chance. Careful and thorough reconnoissances will precede every operation, and every soldier will be prepared at the hand of duty disposed by our commanders.

Why should it be otherwise? It is possible to render the triumph of the Federal arms domestically certain: why risk anything? Why go and knock our heads against Columbus, if a few strategic movements can compel the garrison to capitulate without firing a shot? Why thrash the rebels at Manassas, if Burnside and Thomas can catch them napping, with a vast force them to scatter or sue for terms of surrender? If we were fighting for glory; if our generals, like some chief recently deposed, had no higher aim than their own personal fame as soldiers, then we might offer to meet the rebels in some fair field, with an equal force to equal force, and fight it out. But glory is the last thing that can be won in this war; and as to General M'Clellan, he is too good a citizen to wish to see bloody and doubtful battlefields when his purposes can be accomplished without them.

That there will be some hard fighting yet in this war there is no reason to doubt. Too many rebels are fighting with halters round their necks to justify hopes of a general bloodless submission. But it must be evident to every careful student of the history of the day, and especially of the rebel accounts of events, that the rebel cause is becoming desperate. That fiery enthusiasm with which the South commenced the struggle, and which induced so many travelers to give the North credit for less spirit than its enemy, is evidently subsiding; disaffiance which has been rife, is said unsuccessfully, in Tennessee—is to become general on 1st March. The men of the twelve-months' rebel regiments decline to re-enlist, and the whole army seems to be falling to pieces. New Orleans declares that if Columbus falls—and how can it help falling?—the whole Confederacy will follow. Savannah editors try to cheer up their readers by assuring them that there is no danger of attack in the city—no one is intended to go there at all after securing Fort Pulaski. The official papers at Richmond solemnly announce that the people are going to work. The cotton loan is an acknowledged failure, and even at Richmond people refuse the shinplasters of the "financial geniuses," whom the rebel lord by the rebel papers that the severing of their lines at Greenville and on the Tennessee River will cut off the supply of their saltpetre, and yet they do not affect to believe that it can be prevented. Howell Cobb and his colleagues warn their countrymen that we are going to sweep down upon the South in the spring with an irresistible army of 600,000 men, "disciplined to the shedding of blood," whom the sea-board and improved weapons, and morally certain of success. They recommend, as the only remedy, self-sacrificing patriotism. Why should we not do? What if the planters do burn down their houses? That is their concern, not ours. We don't want them. All that we want of them is to seize, occupy, and possess our Forts and Cyclopædia. When we have done this our office will have been fulfilled. We can proceed to march six inches into the rebel country, after the rebel armies have been once beaten. As to submitting, the rebels can take no credit for this. It concerns them exclusively. If they would like to be one year, or two, or three without receiving goods from abroad, to have their courts, postal service, intercourse with the world, manufactured goods, and markets for their produce, we shall not object. The law of Congress obliges constituencies to elect members, or citizens to trade with the rest of the country. If the rebels would like to dispense with law, order, and commerce, it will not be in our mouth to complain.

The apprehensions of foreign intervention, to which we referred last week, were revived a day or two since, first by an alarming letter from Mr. Charlow Wood, and possibly by dispatches from the reporter of the Associated Press, asserting that Napoleon was about to interfere not in case the blockade, will be without the assistance of England. Those false reports are having pity set at rest by Napoleon's speech to the Chambers on 22d inst., which he stated positively that, so long as the rights of neutrals were respected, France would confine itself to the earnest wish that the differences in the United States would be speedily brought to a close. Is it too much to hope that our gullible fellow-citizens will be set down their garrulous tongues as monstrous lies of the British newspapers? These foreign writers, and among them we must, we fear, class the Washington correspondent of the New York Associated Press, have deliberately and systematically misrepresented European, and especially French sentiment ever since the war broke out: seeming to labor, if not in reality laboring, in the interest and for the comfort of the Southern rebels. They have been convicted of falsehood as often as Dr. Russell has been convicted of blundering. Yet every fresh canard which they fabricate is as much a stultification of the nerves of our people. When shall we begin to understand them?

THE LOUNGER.

GORDON.

THE United States are about giving solemn proof that they are in earnest. When our fathers formed the government which we have all so much reason to, as because men who were founding a government upon equal human rights, the iniquity of the slave-trade. For reasons sufficient to them they tolerated it for twenty years. At the end of that time the trade was prohibited, and it was presently pronounced a capital crime by the national law. The law has been outraged, and the penalty evaded, for it have been open to the charge of inconsistency with our powers to sustain the rights of our flag, prostituted to the meanest of all purposes. Administered in the in direct injustice to human humanity, our Government has consisted at the outrage of its own laws by a late proceeding in office of the Government declared in the national court of the largest penalty. It is not to be supposed that any man would be convicted of that crime, and we assumed that he ought not to be. So utter was the demoralization of the Government.

That demoralization has naturally resulted in the efforts to destroy the Government, when it passed from the control of those who forgot that it was established "to secure justice," and who meant that it should perpetuate injustice. Those into whose hands it had passed by the will of the people were in every way, by the most solemn profound conviction, and the most solemn pledge, held to a vindication of the fundamental principle of that Government by every lawful means. It chanced that the law so long and so ruthlessly violated in a series of crimes of blood and suffering such as the mind hates to contemplate, at length was to be tested by the conviction of a slave trader. He was a young man, but old in this way. It was his fourth voyage. He knew the other law. He knew the penalty. He knew also that its intent had controlled the Government, and that money, influence, and all persuasions would be lavished for him if by chance he were caught and convicted. But he was caught. And in bartering twenty-five of sent, many established his crime beyond question. Nobody, he, nor his counsel, nor his friends seriously denied the fact. "The verdict was speedily rendered. sentence followed.

It was the most strenuous play of every influence to secure a pardon or a commutation. The law was law. It was one of the most important and solemn of all laws. The sea was the most beyond cavil. But it was pleaded that the law had been virtually obsolete, that it had never had ever suffered. In the courts the law may have been obsolete. In the Government its letter was violated and its spirit trampled on. It was a mockery obsolete in the hearts of the American people, and its spirit had been amply vindicated by the national election. The enemies of that law, holding that slavery was true philanthropy, and that all the shocking horrors of the middle passage and the mid-passage were Christian processes, are engaged in a war upon the Government. They have announced to all the world that slavery is their cornerstone. They have declared that the anti-slavery sentiment of the North is a social heresy and a political cry for power. All other nations are at this moment in South America there is really any more love of liberty and human rights in the North than at the South. And if the majesty of the law, which for the moment has not been omnipotence which it never had before, should be brought into contempt—if the first administration of the Government, conformably with the letter and the attitude of resistance to the overwhelming tyranny of slavery, should be that of a pardon for one of the vilest law in regard to its own character and sincerity, the world might justly despise a Government that had no respect for its own solemnities.

If there were the least shadow of doubt of the wisdom of the President—if there were—if there were—if there were any solitary mitigating circumstance—if it were any thing else than a terrible, resolute, and solemn human measure to arrest and defenseless people, and the hopeless enslavement of those who are simply escaped murder—it might be urged that this criminal should be instantly executed. But all the recent murderers executed in the most solemn and unanimous company with this offender. It is and enough to seem to cry for the blood of a fellow-man. It is not that it is only the demand of the law of outraged and Humanity—in the name of the nation quivering with the blows which this criminal has dealt—although in the name of our brothers who stood with their lives a ready sacrifice, that the very foundations of law, of society, and of the nation itself should not be shaken by interfering with the course of Justice, by any power under the political course may be.

If it be right to respite the offender, it is wrong for this Congress to allow the law to remain a day longer upon the statute book. If the law be profoundly just and essential, shall the fact that it has been broken hitherto than the crime it denounces shield an offender in this extreme moment from the penalty which he has consciously and constantly defied? If the law, under all circumstances of the time, should escape, the Administration would have proclaimed the immunity of capital crime, and have destroyed the Government as a terror. Repeal the law, if you will; but until you have repealed it, let it be true that we swear to hang the man who steals and murders and sells other men and women and children, is an enemy of the human race.

CHOOSING YOUR COMPANY.

It appears that the Chamberlain of the French Emperor has had a kind of Dr. Busby "black list" of the persons whom our Minister proposed to invite to dinner at the Tuileries. The style in which all persons eligible for presentation to the Presidency. No response was received; or the response came at so late an hour that only a few of the persons were presented.

This fact, trivial, to many persons, a peculiar incivility at this time upon the part of the French Court. But the explanation is very simple. A great many foreigner would be received and into the presentations, and the Emperor was determined to exclude them. It may be difficult to exclude such persons from a levee at the White House—but the Tuileries is a different place. A royal reception is a favor. It is a social honor, and the receiver may confer it upon whom he will, and upon such conditions he chooses. Mr. Marcy said in his famous dispatch that it was advisable the American representatives should not wear lace and other ornaments, but the simple dress of travelers. We could be very democratic in our clothes and manners in the good old times, a few years ago, when we were extremely jealous of every aristocracy in our feelings and actions. To Mr. Marcy's dispatch Count Walewski, then our Secretary at Paris, now our minister at Brussels, who practised its precepts, the Court said: "You are not wanted at a black coat."

It was perfectly clear that if a man wished to go to royal parties he must conform to royal etiquette. If his principles forbade, he could stay at home.

It happens to be imperial etiquette now not to receive what are called "questionable characters" and "improper persons." Yankee Doodle may insist that the Princess Mathilde is a personage of a very distinct notoriety, and that the lady on his arm may be more frank, but is no more "improper" than a great many ladies who lean upon the imperial arm. But the chamberlain will doubtless inform him that the question is one of ceremony, and that such are the orders. Certainly, my dear Yankee Doodle, he might add, granting that a great many naughty people are inside, it is something to stop somewhere and to keep some out, and your style of impropriety is not so agreeable as some other styles.

We can hardly make a casus belli of the Emperor's choosing his company, nor can we criticise it as unkind, or impolite, or strange. Every respectable citizen of the United States he will willingly receive. And what right has a man to try to present in society abroad a person whom he would not introduce into his mother's drawing-room?

QUARRELS IN OUR OWN CAMP.

THE most unpleasant and discouraging sign in Washington is the asperity of feeling and expression among those who should be friends. A quiet spectator of events and persons in the capital finds himself asking whether gentlemen are not much more bent upon their own way of success than upon success itself. A member rises to speak, and he addresses himself to the horizon beyond which dwell his constituents, and where the public opinion is to be affected, which is most essential to himself; but he entirely overlooks the men around him with whom he is to act.

Take the splitting-point of the Congressional debates as an illustration, the treatment of the system of slavery. Upon the abstract question of its character, and upon its precise relation to the origin of the rebellion, Mr. Lovejoy, Mr. Diven, and Mr. Mallory, for instance, will hardly agree. Upon the constitutional question of emancipation they will certainly differ. But assuming them to be in good faith devoted to the permanence of the Government, they can as certainly agree that nothing shall stand between it and absolute victory.

If Mr. Lovejoy frankly and fairly concedes that the liberty of the press may be restricted and the writ of habeas corpus arbitrarily suspended in the hot whirl of civil war, to the end that the liberty of the nation, which is the permanent guarantee of all constitutional rights, may be preserved—certainly Mr. Mallory can not insist that a rebel shall enjoy the service of his slaves, which is a direct practical aid to rebellion, nor can Mr. Diven claim that nothing shall be done to destroy that assistance until after the rebellion, of which it is a vital prop, is suppressed.

The whole question now is, in a sense, military not moral. Mr. Lovejoy may rejoice that by means of lawful military measures slaves shall be freed. Mr. Mallory may regret that the maintenance of the Government requires the rupture of what he considers a desirable relation between slaves and masters. Mr. Diven may be sorry that the question could not be left to be solved under the normal operation of the Government. But they must all, of necessity, defer their private and special views of the question and its solution to the paramount, pressing, imperial exigency of the country.

In like manner Mr. Garrett Davis, who loves his country and desires its salvation as sincerely as a man can, might have spared men who deeply sympathize with him the pain of hearing him call other men who love their country quite as much as he, but who also hate slavery, inhuman monsters. He would think himself hardly used if Mr. Sumner should call him by the same name. And yet Mr. Davis forces upon every intelligent mind a bitter question—if a man is a monster because he hates slavery, what is a man who does not? He may think it a difficult, a complicated question, when it is inwrought in a system of society, in long habit, and profound sophistication. But to defend it abstractly, what shall be said of a Senator who does that when the flag of a bloody rebellion to extend it is almost visible from the Senate chamber?

It would surely be very ungracious and untimely to press such questions now. While a formidable armed insurrection threatens us, have we the time and the force to be struggling among ourselves? cherishing prejudices and fostering misunderstandings. No sane man supposes that slavery can survive the war. Mr. Diven himself declares that it must not stand in the way of our conquest, and that he does not care if nothing of it is left. The practical question, therefore, is not whether slavery is right or wrong, but what shall be done with the negroes freed by the advance of our armies? And that is a question which the Government can not long postpone.

THINGS SETTLING THEMSELVES.

IT is a favorite philosophy of some people that things will take care of themselves; that events are wiser than men; and that Providence is sure to have its way. All this kind of remark is merely the way in which selfishness states the Mohammedan creed of pure fatalism. "I will never consent," said Mr. Webster in 1850, "to re-enact the law of God." "I trust," said Mr. Seward, "that no laws will ever be passed in this chamber that do not re-enact the law of God." And there was all the difference between an old and a new era in the two statements.

What we call "things," when we say that they take care of themselves, is merely the course of human action. The "logic of events" is simply the rational sequence of intelligent action. Did our independence take care of itself? Did Magna Charta take care of itself? Did the Reformation of Luther take care of itself? If Luther had said: "Oh! don't trouble yourself to support me or my doctrines—this thing will take care of itself," he would have uttered both a truism and an absurdity. For clearly, in the world which God governs, nothing happens which He does not will, for Satan can never circumvent him. But, on the other hand, it is a part of the method of His government that men should struggle to establish what they believe. Trust in God and keep your powder dry, are essential parts of the same wise advice. A man who truly trusts in God understands that God works by means, and that powder is sometimes one of them.

Thus it is that nothing is settled except by settling it. A ship comes to no port if she be not steered. Ships do not steer themselves, and winds are not wiser than men. Winds are but means which human wisdom may control, or which, uncontrolled, will be stronger than human folly. No question of this war or of any other will settle itself, any more than the guns will load and fire themselves. Every point has to be seriously met and considered. Would the money question settle itself? Would the question of health and discipline settle itself? Would the Quarter-master's department settle itself? If no food were provided the soldiers would certainly beg, borrow, or steal something to eat. But that is not the settlement intended.

So we have to regard the condition and future of the slaves who fall within our control. The problem is not to be solved by the whim of this General, and the prejudice of that. There can not be thousands, and presently millions of people who have no recognized status, hanging around and within the lines of the army. That is not a question which will settle itself, except most disastrously for all concerned. If the slaves of rebels are to be actually released, it is of the utmost importance that every body know it, and that the Government deal directly and intelligibly with the facts. If they are to be retained as property and restored, equally there is a paramount necessity of knowing that, and of establishing the proper methods. There is plenty of mud in the field, and it would be terrible to have all our ideas, intentions, and methods stuck in the mud. Granting, for instance (which it is ludicrous to suppose, in view of the Declaration of Independence), that proclamations are only waste paper, and that you can do nothing in this matter until our lines advance, now that our lines have advanced, and we have thousands of cases to treat, what is to be the treatment?

"THEY SAY."

THE English papers, under the guidance of Mr. Russell, the Times correspondent, are very fond of saying that the United States Government is a Government of newspapers. This is not true as he states it, and as he would have it believed—namely, as a terrorism, or threat of imminent popular violence. But it is true as meaning that in this country, more than in any other, a public man may gather from the papers the temper of public opinion upon any question; and as ours is a Government of public opinion, he will be very apt to give to the voice of the newspapers a grave importance.

Thus, last summer, the cry of "On to Richmond!" was not merely the motto of a paper, it was the cry of a very general popular impatience. And it will hardly be denied that it had influence in the resolution to advance. But obviously a newspaper may insist upon an individual conviction or policy until by mere force of iteration it may seem to be the feeling or desire of others—and so far appear to be public opinion.

And just here lies the great responsibility of a newspaper. For he only is an honorable editor who takes care that all that is said in his columns about persons or things shall be as true or as probable as circumstances allow him to determine. Whims, and whiffs of rumors, which are always defiling the air, he will carefully exclude. For instance, because Mrs. Lincoln is a Kentucky woman, he will not assume that any mere report affecting her loyalty, which might be whispered in Washington or elsewhere, is worthy of repetition. Nor because somebody told somebody who gave somebody the wink that the President daily goes down cellar and lashes fugitive slaves with his own hands, will a fair editor call it "news," and print it. Nor will he afterward, when he is called upon to explain, say that the story came in the same way that other news came, and how can he discriminate? If he can not discriminate, he is not fit to be an editor.

The only way of peace and justice is resolutely to disbelieve injurious reports until they have some better foundation than print.

THE NUTT.

WE have had the Prestidigitateur and the Zampillaeronaut, and now we have simply and concisely the Nutt. At last General Tom Thumb is outgeneraled. He is beaten by a smaller man. The glory rests with the Navy, at Barnum's Museum. And Barnum himself has vindicated his fame as still the greatest showman of the age. It is not a Nutt hard to crack, but it is one well worth seeing. In fact, the Museum is full of interest. There can be no more gratifying gift to any intelligent child than a ticket to the Nutt and the Hippopotamus; and every such child must of course be accompanied by an intelligent elder, who can seize the opportunity to see the wonders of the land and sea, which are collected by Barnum. His Museum is not a humbug.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LEARNING FRENCH.—A young lady studying French, and finding that "belle" meant "fine," told somebody in a letter that we had a great deal of belle-weather lately.

What is the connecting link between Secessionism and ruin?—DAVIS' STRAITS.

"Oh, pray let me have my own way this time," said a young officer in one of our Irish volunteer regiments about going South, as he attempted to force a kiss from his dear Biddy. "Well, Willie, I suppose I must this once; but you know that after your return and we are married, I shall have a Will of my own."

"Did your fall hurt you?" said one Patlander to another, who had fallen from the top of a two-story house. "Not in the least, honey; 'twas stoppin' so quick that hurt me."

"I am afraid, Sir, you are in a settled melancholy." "No, Madame, my melancholy won't settle; it has too much grounds."

Dear old Mrs. Crakker says that if woman had not caused man to commit his first sin in eating, no doubt he would very soon have sinned of his own accord in drinking.

A VERY PARTICULAR YOUNG MAN.—Old Mrs. Harris was never regarded as a paragon of neatness; and if "cleanliness is next to godliness," it is to be feared that the old lady never attained to the latter state. Not only was she any thing but neat herself, but showed a contempt for it in others. Speaking of neat people, one day, she remarked that her son Josiah was one of the most particular men in the world. "Why," said she, "he threw away a whole cup of coffee, the other morning, because it had a black-beetle in it."

The preacher who spends his nights in writing dull sermons stays awake to put his hearers to sleep.

He who is false to present duty breaks a thread in the loom, and will find the flaw when he may have forgotten its cause.

A LEGAL FABLE.—Two weasels found an egg. "Let us not fight about it," said the elder weasel, "but enter into partnership." "Very good," said weasel the younger. So taking the egg between them, each sucked the either end. "My children," said Redtapes, the attorney, "though you have but one client between you, make the best of him."

A hen-fancier lately procured a picture of a favorite fowl, which was so natural that it laid on his table for several weeks.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, February 4, in the Senate, Senator Sumner, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill authorizing the appointment of diplomatic representatives to the republics of Liberia and Hayti. The resolution relative to the command of the Department of Kansas, and calling on the Secretary of War for the orders and directions in regard to supplies for that command, and whether it is to be commanded by General Lane, and whether the orders have been changed since General Lane left, and whether the order of General Hunter is according to the orders of the War Department, was taken up. Senator Pomeroy said the resolution was offered in accordance with a suggestion from the Secretary of War, whereupon it was adopted. The bill providing for the construction of twenty iron-clad steamers for the coast-defense was discussed, and recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The debate on the resolution relative to the expulsion of Senator Bright was then resumed, Senators Browning, Dixon, Doolittle, Willey, Davis, Sumner, and others participating in the discussion.——In the House, the debate on the Treasury Note bill was continued by Messrs. Morrill, of Vermont, and Roscoe L. Conkling, of New York, in opposition to the clause making the Government paper a legal tender.

On Wednesday, February 5, in the Senate, the West Point Academy Appropriation bill was passed without amendment. A resolution calling on the President for the recent correspondence regarding the presentation of American citizens at the Court of France was adopted. The bill defining the pay and emoluments of officers of the army was taken up, and the amendments of the Military Committee adopted. After some debate by Senator Sherman the bill was laid aside, and the consideration of the resolution relative to the expulsion of Senator Bright was resumed. After debate, and a speech by Senator Bright in his defense, the resolution of expulsion was adopted by a vote of thirty-two to fourteen.——The House was occupied in discussing the Treasury Note bill.

On Thursday, February 6, in the Senate, Senator Harris presented a petition for the abrogation of the Reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States. A bill allowing the Corporation of Washington to issue small notes was introduced and referred. The bill defining the pay and emoluments of army officers was taken up. Senator Sherman offered an amendment reducing all salaries, mileage fees, and contingent expenses, which, after considerable discussion on the questions of taxation, expenditures, and retrenchment, was adopted. Senator Doolittle offered an amendment reducing the mileage of members of Congress fifty per cent., which was agreed to—yeas 29, nays 10. Senator Howe moved to strike out the ninth section, which reduces the pay of the soldiers and sailors. This was defeated, only two Senators voting in the affirmative. Senator Howe then moved to recommit the bill, and pending the question the Senate went into executive session.——In the House, the debate on the Treasury Note bill was resumed and concluded, and the bill, with the legal tender clause retained, was passed by a vote of ninety-three to fifty-four.

On Friday, February 7, in the Senate, the bill appropriating ten millions of dollars for the construction of twenty iron-clad gun-boats was passed. The Treasury Note bill was received from the House, and referred to the Finance Committee. The bill authorizing an additional issue of ten million dollars of demand notes was passed. The Civil Appropriation bill was passed. A report of the Naval Committee, with reference to Mr. Morgan's purchase of vessels for the navy, and censuring the Secretary of the Navy for his action in the matter, was discussed. Senator Wilson moved, as a substitute for the report, the declaration "that the employment of an agent to make purchases for the Government, whose compensation depends upon commissions on purchases, is unwise, inexpedient, and never to be resorted to except in cases of imperious necessity." Pending this motion the subject was laid over. A joint resolution, giving the thanks of Congress to Captain Dupont and his officers and seamen for the victory at Port Royal, was adopted. The Judiciary Committee reported that Senator Starke, the Senator from Oregon, whose loyalty has been questioned, was entitled to take the constitutional oath. A minority report was, however, presented, and the papers were ordered to be printed.——In the House, the Treasury Note bill was, by consent, amended so as to allow the Treasury Department, at its option, to pay the interest on Government bonds in coin or paper. The report of the Committee on Government Contracts was taken up and discussed. At the conclusion of the debate Mr. Holman, of Indiana, offered a resolution censuring Mr. Cameron, the late Secretary of War, and Mr. Welles, the present Secretary of the Navy, for their action in employing Alexander Cummings and George D. Morgan; but without coming to a vote the subject was postponed. The report of the Conference Committee on the bill providing for the completion of the defenses of Washington, and the employment of Home Guards in Missouri and Maryland, was agreed to. Several private bills were passed. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, February 10, in the Senate, the resolutions of the Legislature of New York in favor of allowing each State to assess and collect its portion of the national tax were presented. The bill to incorporate the Georgetown and Washington Railroad Company was taken up. The bill was amended so as to give three per cent. of the receipts of the road for the support of public schools, and then passed. The report of the Conference Committee authorizing Home Guards in Missouri and Maryland was agreed to, and the bill passed. The resolution directing the Finance Committee to inquire into the expediency of establishing a national savings institution and Government fiscal agency was taken up. Senator Simmons proceeded to explain the objects of the scheme, but gave way for an executive session, during which a number of military and civil appointments were taken up and confirmed.——In the House, the Senate bill authorizing the issue of ten millions of dollars of demand Treasury notes was passed unanimously. Mr. Crittenden, by unanimous consent, presented a petition from Philadelphia, signed by the first men of that city, proposing that on the 22d of February Washington's Farewell Address be read in one of the Houses of Congress, by the President of the Senate or Speaker of the House. An amendment, that the Declaration of Independence, and Secretary Stanton's order to the army after the victory at Mill Springs, be read at the same time, was agreed to, and the resolution adopted. The Senate resolution authorizing the detail of three naval officers to inspect transports in the service of the War Department was adopted.

COMPLETE SUCCESS OF THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

By a flag of truce from Norfolk on 11th we learn the complete success of the Burnside expedition at Roanoke Island.

The island was taken possession of, and Commodore Lynch's fleet completely destroyed.

The first news of the defeat arrived at Norfolk on Sunday afternoon, and caused great excitement. The previous news was very satisfactory, stating that the Yankees had been allowed to advance for the purpose of driving them into a trap.

The rebel force on the island is supposed to have been a little over three thousand efficient fighting men.

General Wise was ill at Nag's Head, and was not present during the engagement. When the situation became dangerous he was removed to Norfolk.

All the gun-boats but one were taken, and that escaped up a creek, and was probably also destroyed.

Elizabeth City was attacked on the 9th. The citizens, finding resistance vain, evacuated the place, but before doing so set fire to the town, and when our informant left it was still in flames.

One report says that only seventy, and another that only twenty-five of the Confederates escaped from the island.

General Huger telegraphed to Richmond that only fifty on the island escaped.

There appears to be no bright side of the story for the rebels.

The following dispatch is taken from a Richmond paper of 11th:

NORFOLK, February 10, 1862.

The latest news states that Captain O. Jennings Wise, son of Governor Wise, was shot through the hip and disabled, though his wound was not mortal. Major Lawson and Lieutenant Miller were mortally wounded. About three hundred Confederates were killed. Our wounded numbers over one thousand. The number of Yankees wounded is about the same. Midshipman Cann has had an arm shot off. The other casualties are as yet unreported.

ARREST OF GENERAL STONE.

Brigadier-General Stone was arrested in Washington on Sunday morning, 9th, at 2 o'clock by a posse of the Provost Marshal's force, and sent to Fort Lafayette, where he arrived on 10th. The charges against General Stone appear to be of a very serious character. They are embodied in the following summary: First, for misbehavior at the battle of Ball's Bluff; second, for holding correspondence with the enemy before and since the battle of Ball's Bluff, and receiving visits from rebel officers in his camp; third, for treacherously suffering the enemy to build a fort or strong work since the battle of Ball's Bluff, under his guns without molestation; fourth, for a treacherous design to expose his force to capture and destruction by the enemy, under pretense of orders for a movement from the Commanding General which had not been given.

THE VICTORY AT FORT HENRY.

General Halleck announced the victory at Fort Henry in a brief and graphic dispatch, in these words:

Fort Henry is ours! The flag of the Union is re-established on the soil of Tennessee. It will never be removed.

By command of Major-General HALLECK.

THE MEMPHIS AND OHIO RAILROAD CUT.

The capture of the bridge on the Ohio and Memphis Railroad by our troops, after the surrender of Fort Henry, is announced by a dispatch received at head-quarters from General Halleck, stating that our troops had immediately proceeded up the river in the direction of the bridge, sixteen miles distant from Fort Henry, and demolished all the batteries of the rebels in their route.

INVASION OF EAST TENNESSEE.

It appears that General Thomas is about to invade East Tennessee at three different points simultaneously. General Carter is to go through Cumberland Gap, General Schoepff is to advance by the central route, and General Thomas, with M'Cooke's and Manson's brigades, will cross at Mill Springs, the scene of the late victory. They will immediately march on Knoxville, and, if successful, will take possession of the railroad, thus cutting off communication between the rebel army in the West and the seat of the rebel Government at Richmond.

THE BUTLER EXPEDITION.

Great activity prevailed last week at Boston in getting off the Butler expedition. The vessels, loaded with troops and stores, consist of the ships Undaunted, North American, Idaho, Ocean Pearl, Wilder Farley, and Western Empire; also some steamers. The Maine Fourteenth regiment, First Maine battery, Second Vermont battery, and Fourth Massachusetts battery, of the New England division, were embarked and sailed last week. The entire division will consist of about ten thousand men.

AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

Our news from Missouri is most favorable. The rebel General Price, now near Springfield, is said to have harangued his troops, stating that they were surrounded, and should decide either to surrender or fight. They resolved to fight. Our Generals are pressing forward with great rapidity. Siegel and Asboth's divisions have reached Lebanon, while Major Wright's cavalry have advanced thirteen miles west of that point. The brigade of General Davis was reported to be crossing the Osage River on Wednesday, and the advanced-guard was expected to join Generals Siegel and Asboth at Lebanon on the following day. Price may thus feel that his position is a critical one.

OUR ARMY AT CAIRO.

There are now not less than thirty-five thousand troops at Cairo, and preparations are actively going on for the great Mississippi expedition. Some delay has been occasioned by the want of men for the gun-boats; but they have recently been filling up very fast with sailors from Chicago.

REBELS BACKING OUT.

The Virginia correspondent of the Charleston Courier says "that out of the Fifth South Carolina Regiment, numbering eight hundred men, whose term of service is about expiring, but one hundred and seventy have signified their willingness to enlist 'for the war.'"

FOREIGN NEWS.

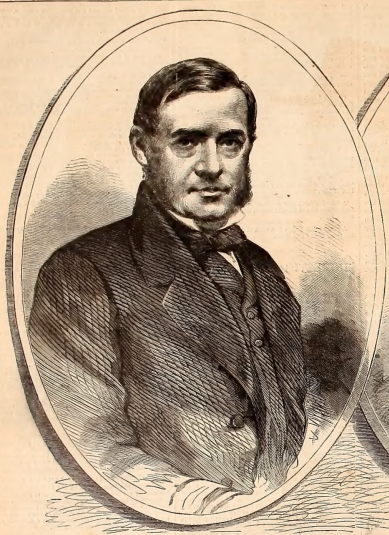
ENGLAND.

THE "NASHVILLE" AND "TUSCARORA."

AT latest dates the Nashville was still at Southampton, but it was rumored that she was ordered to quit that port. Commander Craven, of the Tuscarora, had been accused of anchoring his vessel off Osborne in "discourtesy" to the Queen. The gallant officer had denied the charge in a public letter.

MASON AND SLIDELL IN ENGLAND.

The Jura brings intelligence of the arrival of Mason and Slidell at Southampton. No enthusiasm was manifested on their arrival. Slidell left immediately for Paris.



SHORT TIME AT MANCHESTER.

Advices from Manchester state that the shortening of the hours of labor in the factories is gradually extending, and in course of the next week or two the movement promises to become more extensive.

FRANCE.

FRANCE NOT TO INTERFERE.

Louis Napoleon, in his address to the French Corps Legislatif on the 27th, stated that although the civil war in America compromised the commercial interests of France, yet as long as the rights of neutrals were respected, they should confine themselves to the earnest wish that the dissensions in this country would soon be brought to an end.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

"To those of my readers who may seek with Julius Faber to explore, through intelligible causes, solutions for the marvels I narrate, Margrave's confession may serve to explain how much that my own superstitious beliefs had obscured. To them Margrave is evidently the son of Louis Gravile. The elixir of life is reduced to some simple restorative, owing much of its effect to the faith of a credulous patient; youth is so soon restored to its joy in the sun, with or without an elixir. His arts and his powers are, in small degree, some unusual constitutional gifts on which the disciples of Mesmer rest their creed; in large part, they are the figments of my own heated fancy. He is a crafty impostor, a wonderful reader of men's dominant foibles or passions; all the knowledge that sets mere practical human nature at a glance, and which, in his wealth made not difficult, and observations which his keenness of intellect made subtle and deep. I have this interpretation unassisted. It may have been illusion in me to suppose that of the two conjectures—viz., that which is the least improbable, and that which is the most incredible—the latter was possible. He former not. And putting aside all other reasons for hesitating to believe that Margrave was the son of Louis Gravile—reasons which even my narrative might suggest—was it not strange that Sir Philip Derval, who had instituted inquiries minutest, and reported them in his memoir with such faithful zeal, should not have discovered that a youth, attended by the same woman who had attended Gravile, had disappeared from the town on the precise night as Gravile himself disappeared? But Derval had relented truthfully, according to Margrave's account, on the flight of Allen, and had taken servant, yet not even silhouette to the flight, not even to the existence, of the boy, who must have been at no near distance apart in the suite of Louis Gravile, if he were, indeed, the son whom Gravile had made his constant companion, and confidential his principal heir.

Not many minutes did I give myself up to the cloud of reflections through which these rumours of light forced its way. One thought overmastered all: Margrave had threatened death to my Allen, and warned me of what I should learn, from the lips of Faber, "the sage of the college."

I stood, shuddering, at the door of my home; I did not dare to enter.

"Allen," said a voice, in which my ear detected an unusual emotion suppressed, "he is fine—he calm. I keep my promise. The hour is come in which you may again see the Lilian of old—mind to mind, soul to soul.

Faber's hand took mine, and led me into the house.

"You do, then, fear that this interview will be too much for her strength?" said I, whisperingly.

"I can not say; but she demands the interview, and I dare not refuse it."

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

I KEPT Faber on the stairs, and paused at the door of Lilian's room. The door opened suddenly, noiselessly, and her mother came out with one hand before her face and the other locked in Amy's, who was leading her as a child leads the blind. Mrs. Ashleigh looked up, as I touched her, and, in a warm, almost gay tone, (she was not weeping, as was her womanly wont in every petitier grief, but Amy's) said, "God will have exchanged between us. I rejoice," and closed the door; my eyes turned mechanically to the corner in which was placed the small virgin bed, with its curtains white as a shroud. Lilian was not there. I looked round, and saw her half reclined on a couch near the window. She was dressed, and with care. Was not that her bridal robe?

"Allen—Allen," she murmured. "Again again my Allen—again, again your Lilian!" And, striving in vain to rise, she extended and her arms in the yearning of reunited love. And as I knelt beside her, those arms closed round me for the first time, in the fond, chaste, holy tenderness of a wife's embrace.

"Ah!" she said, in her low voice (her voice like Cordelia's, was ever low), "all has come back to me—all that I owe to your protecting, noble, tender guardian love?"

"Hush! hush! the gratitude rests with me—it is my sweet boon to trust, to love, to cherish my own, my beautiful, still my beautiful! Suffering has not dimmed the light of those dear eyes to me! Put your lips to my own." Our lips met in these words: "I love you, and for your sake I wish to live!"

"For your sake I pray—with my whole weak human heart—I pray to live. Listen. Some days had elapsed, if I am spared, and the purple blossoms of yonder waving trees I shall tell you all, as I see it now. All that could have come between me in my long dream, and before the dream closed around me, like a night in which cloud and star chase each other." Sweet, holy heresies! some quiet, sunlit, happy, happy day. But now all I would say is this: Before that dreadful morning—how it comes back to me!—Allen, Allen! you did not believe that slanderous letter? God bless you! God bless you! Grow hearted, high-souled—God bless you, my darling! my husband! And like a child Amy to him humbly as I do, and He will bless you. She stooped and kissed away my tears, then she resumed, feebly, meekly, sorrowfully:

"Before that morning I was not worthy of such a heart, such a love as yours. No, no; hear me. No thought of love for another ever crossed me! Never, when conscious and reasoning, was I untrue to you—even in fancy. But I was a child—reward to the child who pines for what earth can not give, and covets the moon for a toy. Heaven had been so kind to my lot on earth, and my heart in that earth I was secretly discontented. When I felt that you loved me, and my heart told me that I loved again, I said to myself, 'Do I make myself clear? do you forgive me? You were not untrue to you.' I was untrue to my own duties in life. I believed, in my vain conceit, that a mortal's dim vision of heaven raised us from the earth; I did not feel sufficiently that that earth is a part of the same universe as heaven! Now, perhaps in the awful affliction that darkened my reason, my soul has been made more clear. As it to chastise but to teach me, my soul has been permitted to range the vast and presumptuous desire; it has wandered forth from the trammels of mortal duties and fetters; it has been repelled by the dangers of its own rash and presumptuous escape from the tasks which it should have fulfilled as your wife, my Allen, Allen, I am less unworthy of you now! Perhaps in my darkness one rapid glimpse of light was vouchsafed to me, which I intended to me. If so, how unlike to the visions my childhood indulged in! Now, while I know still more deeply that there is a world for the angels, I know also that the mortal must pass through probation in this life. Ah, Allen, Allen, I am with you—grieving in your griefs, rejoicing in your joys!"

Here the voice failed her. Again the dear arms embraced me, and the dear face, eloquent with love, hid itself on my human breast.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

THAT interview is over! Again I am banished from Lilian's room. The overwhelming effect of that meeting has overstrained her enfeebled nerves. Convulsive tremblings of the whole frame, accompanied by sharp cries of pain, succeeded one brief interchange of sweet and silent thoughts. Faber, in reason, had left me alone, imperiously and sternly warned me that the sole chance yet left of preserving her life was in the merciful repose of the most perfect and entire exercise control. He and Amy resumed their place in her chamber. When her violence had given way to sentence of banishment so Mrs. Ashleigh and I sat facing each other in the room below; over us the lonely anger had fallen, and I heard it but a voice from afar or in a dream, Mrs. Ashleigh's commands.

"She will die—she will die! Her eyes have the same heavenly look as my Gilbert's on the day on which she left us. Remember, Allen, my words are his last words—' Forgive me all my faults to you.' She will die—she will die!"

Hours and hours passed. At last Faber entered the room; he spoke first to Mrs. Ashleigh—motioned her silence. Speak! speak! the lips of all who pass from the chamber of the dying to the presence of mourners, and know that the sentence is pass. "Hope!" I cried, "there is, as yet, to say 'endure.'"

But he had not the power to her own room docile as a worried child led to sleep, staid with her some time, and then returned to me, pressing me to his breast, faltered:

"No hope—no hope!" said I, recoiling from his embrace. Faber was silent. Speak! speak! Let me know the worst."

"I have a hope, yet I scarcely dare to bid you share it. For the sake of one so dear to you as man than my experience as physician. I can not believe that the human mind can be reconciled to earth—so fondly, so earnestly cling to this mortal life—if it were about to be summoned away. No! You have not deserved from the sufferers who have dreaded Death the most become calmly resigned to its coming, when Death visibly reveals himself. In the moment in which its shape has been guessed and not seen. As if the mind knew that the mortal patient has lost all will to live on, so there is hope while the patient, yet young and with no perceptible breath in the system, struggles for life, ever violently their forts may be stormed), has still some faith in existence. Remember, Allen (who can say?) from the whispers conveyed from above to the soul.

"I can say, from myself to think that all the uses for which a reason, always so lovely even in its errors, has been restored, are not fulfilled. It seems to me as if your union, as yet so imperfect, has still for its end that holy life on earth which is needful to mortal beings—needful in order for a sphere of existence to which this is the preparation. Therefore, I say to yourself I have hope yet for her. Gifted with powers which are high in the manifold orders of man—thoughtful, tender, and brave—she has in her the rare and intellect vibrate to every fine touch of humanity —in error itself conscientious, in delusions still eager for truth—in anger, forgiving—in wrong, seeking how to repair—and best of all, strong in a love so deep that it has power to pardon and to defend from the fangs of the slanderer—a love, raising passion itself out of the reach of the senses, more than the senses to the spirit—in all its devotion—with all these noble proofs in yourself of a being not meant to end here, your life has stopped short in its race, your mind itself has been drifted, a bark without rudder or pilot, over seas without shore, under skies without stars. And wherefore? Because the Mind you so haughtily vaunted has refused its companion and teacher in Soul.

"And therefore, through you, I hope that she will be spared yet to live on. She, in whom Faith and Love, in early infancy, have planted the checks and the definite goals which the mind is ordained to reach to in wandering—she, here; the mind taking thoughts from the actual and visible world, and the soul but vague glimpses and hues from the unseen and the intimate heritage. Each of you two seems to me as yet incomplete, and your destinies yet uncertain. Go through the bonds of the heart, through the trials of time, ye have both to consummate your marriage. I do not—believe me—I do not say this in the fanciful wisdom of allegory and type, save that, whenever closely examined, the very gayest rests through all the most commonplace phases of outward and material life. I hope, then, that we may yet be permitted to hope it, not from my skill as physician, but my inward belief as a Christian. To perfect your own soul—to save that of your son and of the world."

I started—the very words that Lilian had uttered in her reverie!

"But," resumed Faber, "how can I presume to trace the numberless links of effects up to the first cause? Allen, Allen, for the sake of reason and of my reason. I leave that to philosophers, who would laugh my weak hope to scorn.

"Possibly, probably, where I, whose calling has been but to save flesh from the worm, deem that the life of the body is at its close—that to relap and train your own convictions of soul, Heaven has but one means more, and that dread mental instruct you far more than her life. I have said: He prepared for either; wisdom through joy—for blessing through grief. Remember that, looking only through the mechanism by which this moral world is impelled and improved, the latter agency is more frequently employed. Even a man, or man's law, is never wise but when it is merciful. Judge not by human conditions; and that which is mercy to the myriads may seem hard to the one."

And from this discourse—of which I now, at calm distance of time, recall every word—my human, fond, loving heart bore away but one thought, but this sentence. "Each has need of the other?" so that I cried out, "Life, life, life! Is there no hope for her? Is there no way to baffle physician? I am physician too; I will see her. I will judge. I will not be banished from my child!"

"Judge then, as physician, and let the responsibility rest with me. At this moment such excitation, all struggle has ceased; the frame is at rest. Look on her, and perhaps only the physician's eye could detect in the wan and lifeless face, life is not sleep, it is not trance, it is not the changing vacuity of death. Look on her, and you shall I call it by the name received in our schools? Is it the catalepsy in which life is suspended, but consciousness not? Look on her bosom, rigid; it is but with a strain of my own sense that I know that she breath still breathes, and the heart still beats. But I am convinced that though she can neither speak nor stir, nor by sign, that she is fully, sensitively conscious of all that passes around her. She is like those who have seen the very coffin carried into their graves, and are unable to cry out. Do they not bury me alive?' Judge then for yourself, with this intense consciousness of the importance to evince it, what might be the effect of your presence—first an agony of despair, and then the complete extinction of all life?"

I have known but one such case. A mother whose daughter, suffering from a similar malady, she had lain for two days and two nights, still, as if in her shroud. All, save myself, said, 'Life has gone,' and laid the body by. They brought in the infant, to try what effect its presence would produce. Then her lips moved, and the hands crossed upon her bosom trembled."

"And the result?" exclaimed Faber, eagerly.

"If the result of experiment can determine a presence, come; the sight of the babe rekindled life!"

"No; extinguished its last spark! I will not enter Lilian's room. I will go away—away from the house itself. She may even hear me move in it. I know it well! She may even hear me move in the room below, hear me speak at this moment. Go back to her, Faber. But if there be in the state which I have known in another, which may be yet more familiar to your science and larger experience, there is no immediate danger of death. The state will last through to-day, through to-night, perhaps for many days—does it to you?"

"I believe that for at least twelve hours there will be no change in her state. I believe also that if the recover from it calm and refreshed, as from a sleep, the danger of death will have passed away."

"And for twelve hours my presence would be hurtful?"

"Rather say fatal, if my diagnosis be right."

"I wrung my hands in the bitterness of woe.

"Oh, to lose her now!—now that her love and her reason had both returned, each more vivid than before! Now, indeed, have the Master-key's boasted secret; but at least in that secret was hope. In recognized science I saw only despair.

And at that thought all dread of this mysterious visitor vanished—all anxiety to question more of his attributes or his history. His life had become dear to me and precious to me. If it should fall me in the steps of the prowess, whatever that was, by which the life of my Lilian was to be saved.

The shades of evening were now closing in. I remembered that I had left Margrave without even food for many hours. I stole round to the back of the house, filled a basket with aliments, more generous than those of the farmer day's extracted fresh drugs from my stores, and, tiptoed, laden, hurried back to the hut. I found Margrave in the room below, seated on his mysterious coffer, leaning his face on his hand. When I entered, he looked up and said:

"You have neglected me. My strength is waning. Give me more of the cordial, for we have work before us to-night, and I need support."

He took for granted my assent to his will exercisent; and he was right.

I administered the cordial. I placed food before him, and this time he did not eat with repugnance. I poured out wine, and he drank it sparingly, but with ready complaisance, saying, "In proper hands the wine of life is a boon, so, now it is like a foretaste of the glorious future."

After he had thus recruited himself he seemed to acquire an energy that startlingly contrasted his languor the day before. The effort of breathing was scarcely perceptible; the color came back to his cheeks; his bended frame rose elastic and erect.

"If I understood you rightly," said I, "the experiment you ask me to aid can be scientific shed in a single night?"

"In a single night—this night!"

"Command me. Try not begin at once? What apparatus or chemical agencies do you need?"

"Ah," said Margrave; "formerly, how I was misled! Formerly, how my conjectures blundered! I thought that I asked you to give a mouth to the experiment I wished to make, that I should require the whole skill of the chemist—that the principle of life was a gas, and that the secret was but in the mode by which the gas might be kept from evaporation. But now all that I need is contained in this coffer, save one very simple material—fuel sufficient for a steady fire for a few hours, or even that is at hand, piled up in your outhouse. And now for the substance itself—to that you must guide me."

"Explain."

"Near this very spot is there not gold—in grains yet undiscovered—in the bed of the parent metal?"

"There is. What then? Do you, with the alchemists, blend in one discovery gold and life?"

"No. But it is only where the chemistry of earth or of man can not reach, that the substance from which the great pabulum of life, extracted by ferment, is found. Possibly, in the elements of which gold is formed, which I think your own great chemist—Sir Humphrey Davy—discovered might be found. I shall be to not worth the cost of the process—possibly, in those attempts, some scanty grains of this substance were found. But the experiment in the crucible, with grains of the metal as niggardly divided by Nature, would be vain. Where there is gold there is gold, and from such grains enough of the essence might, perhaps, have been drawn to add to the life of the patient necessary to some feeble graybeard—granting, what rests on no proof, that some of the alchemists reached so far rarely from the truth. But it is in the miserly crucible, it is in the matrix of Nature herself that we must seek for the pabulum abundant Nature's grand principle—life. As the loadstone is rife with the magnetic virtue, as amber contains its virtue, so in the substances, to which we vest want a name, is found the bright life-giving fluid. The solid mines of Asia and Europe the substance exists, but can rarely be met with. The soil for its nutriment may have be well-nigh exhausted. It is here, where Nature herself is all vital with youth, that the sustenance of such a mouth be sought. Near this spot is gold—guide me to it."

"You can not come with me. The place which I know is dangerous even to me, from its distant; they may ragged. You can not walk to it. It is true I have horses, but—"

"Do you think I have come this distance, and not foreseen and forestalled all that I want for my object? Trouble me not with such conjectures how I can arrive at the place. I have provided the means to arrive at, and leave it by litter and horse are in your stable, and my call. Give me your arm to the rising ground fify yards from your door."

I obeyed mechanically, stifling all surprise. I had made my resolve, and admitted no thought that could shake it.

When we reached the summit of the grassy hillock, which sloped from the back part of the sea-port, Margrave, after pausing to recover breath, lifted up his voice in a key not loud, but built and clear, and commenced the same wild chant, like the night-hawk's. Through that sir so limpid and still, bringing near for objects the sounds, which, heard scarcely its very artificial panning, till wave after wave of the atmosphere bore into remoteness and die.

In a few minutes the call seemed re-echoed, so exactly, so cheerily, that for the moment I thought that he was the very voice of the shy mocking Lyre-Bird, that mimics so merrily all that it hears in the woods. Then, in the whirr of the locust to the howl of the wild dog.

"What king," said the mystic charmer, and as he spoke he placed his hand on my arm and on my shoulder, so that I trembled to feel that that thread ion of Nature, God's soul endless, who had been—and my heart whispered, who still could be—my base and mind-darkener, leaned upon me for support, as the spoiled younger born on his brother—"what king," said this cynical mockery, with the beautiful boyish frame—"what king in your civilized world is the envy of a chief of the East? What link is so strong between mortal and mortal as that between lord and slave? I transport you poor fools from the land of their birth; they preserve here their old habits—obedience and awe. They would wait till they starved in the solitude—wait to hearken and answer my call. And I, who thus rule them or charm them—I use and despise them. They know that, and yet serve me! Between you and me, my philosopher, there is but one thing worth living for—life for one's self."

It is age, it is youth, that thus shocks all my sense, in my solemn completeness of man? I know not to this hour. But perhaps, in great capitals, young men of philosophy will answer, "It is youth; and we think what he says!" Young friends, I do not believe you.

CHAPTER LXXX.

ALONG the grass track I saw now, under the moon, just visible, a strange procession—never seen before in Australian pastures. It moved on, noiselessly but quickly. We descended the hillock, and met it on the way. A noble litter, borne by four men, in unfamiliar Eastern garments; two other swarthy servitors, more bravely dressed, with yataghans and silver-hilted pistols in their belts, preceding this sombre equipage. Perfume Margrave divined the dashanful thought that passed through my mind, vaguely and half consciously; for he said, with the hollow, bitter laugh that had replaced the lively zeal of his once melodious mirth:

"A little leisure and a little gold, and your new colonist, too, will have the tastes of a pasha."

I made no answer. I had ceased to care who and what was my tempter. To me his whole being was resolved into one problem: Had he a secret by which Death could be turned from Lilian?

But now, as the litter halted, from the long dark shadow which it cast upon the turf, the figure of a woman emerged, and stood before us. The outlines of her shape were lost in the loose folds of a black mantle, and the features of her face were hidden by a black veil, except only the dark, bright, solemn eyes. Her stature was lofty, her bearing majestic, whether in movement or repose.

Margrave accosted her in some language unknown to me. She replied in what seemed to my ear the same tongue. The tones of her voice were sweet, but inexpressibly mournful. The words that they uttered appeared intended to warn, or deprecate, or dissuade, for they called to Margrave's brow a lowering frown, and drew from his lips a hoarse, half-smothered anger. The woman rejoined, in the same melancholy music of voices. And Margrave then, leaning his arm upon her shoulder, as he had leaned it on mine, drew her away from the group into a neighboring copse of the flowering eucalypti—mystic trees, never changing the hues of their pale-green leaves, ever shifting the tints of their sad-grey, shedding bark. For some moments I gazed on the two human forms, dimly seen by the glinting moonlight through the gaps in the foliage. Then, turning away my eyes, I saw, standing close at my side, a man whom I had not noticed before. His footstep, as it stole to me, had fallen on the sward without sound. His dress, though Oriental, differed from that of his companions, both in shape and color; fitting close to the breast, leaving the arms bare to the elbow, and of a uniform, ghastly white, as are the cerements of the grave. His visage was even darker than those of the Syrians or Arabs behind him, and his features were those of a bird of prey—the beak of the eagle, but the eye of the vulture. His cheeks were hollow; the arms, crossed on his breast, were long and lean. Yet in that skeleton form there was a something which conveyed the idea of a serpent's suppleness and strength; and as the hungry, watchful eyes met my own startled gaze, I recoiled impulsively with that inward warning of danger which is conveyed to man, as to inferior animals, in the very aspect of the creatures that sting or devour. At my movement the man inclined his head in the submissive Eastern salutation, and spoke in his foreign tongue, softly, humbly, fawningly, to judge by his tone and his gesture.

I moved yet farther away from him with loathing, and now the human thought flashed upon me: was I in truth exposed to no danger in trusting myself to the mercy of the weird and remorseless master of those lurkings from the East?—seven men in number, two at least of them formidably armed, and docile as blood-hounds to the hunter, who has only to show them their prey. But fear of man like myself is not my weakness: where fear found its way to my heart it was through the doubts or the fancies to which men like myself are exposed in the attributes, dark and unknown, which we give to a fiend or a spectre. And perhaps, if I could have paused to analyze my own sensations, the very presence of this escort—creatures of flesh and blood—lessened the dread of my incomprehensible tempter. Rather, a hundred times, front and defy those seven Eastern slaves —I, haughty son of the Anglo-Saxon who conquers all races because he fears no odds—than have seen again on the walls of my threshold the luminous, human shadow! Besides, Lilian—Lilian! for one chance of saving her life, how ever wild and chimerical that chance might be, I would have shrunk not a foot from the march of an army.

Thus reassured and thus resolved, I advanced, with a smile of disdain, to meet Margrave and his veiled companion, as they now came from the moonlit copse.

"Well," I said to him, with an irony that unconsciously mimicked his own, "have you taken advice with your nurse? I assume that the dark masked form by your side is that of Azeth!"

The woman looked at me from her sable mask, with her steadfast, solemn eyes, and said, in English, though with a foreign accent: "The nurse, born in Asia, is but wise through her love; the pale son of Europe is wise in his art. The nurse says Fortune!' Do you say 'Adventure?'"

"Peace!" exclaimed Margrave, stamping his foot on the ground, "I take no counsel from either; it is for me to resolve, for you to obey, and for him to aid. Night is come, and we waste it; move on."

The woman made no reply, nor did I. He took my arm and walked back to the hut. The barbaric escort followed. When we reached the door of the building Margrave said a few words to the woman and to the litter-bearers. They entered the hut with us. Margrave pointed out to the woman his coffer; to the men, the fuel stowed in the outhouse. Both were borne away and placed within the litter. Meanwhile I took from the table, on which it was carelessly thrown, the light sword that I habitually carried with me in my rambles.

"Do you think that you need that idle weapon?" said Margrave. "Do you fear the good faith of my swarthy attendants?"

"Nay, take the hatchet yourself; its use is to sever the cold flesh on the quarts in which we may find it embedded, or to clear, as this shovel, which I will also be needed, from the slight soil above it the ore that the mine in the mountain flings forth, as the sea casts its waifs on the sands."

"Give me your hand, fellow-laborer!" said Margrave, joyfully. "Ah, there is no faltering there! Surely, surely, I was not mistaken in the Man. What rests but the Place and the Hour? I shall live—I shall live!"

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

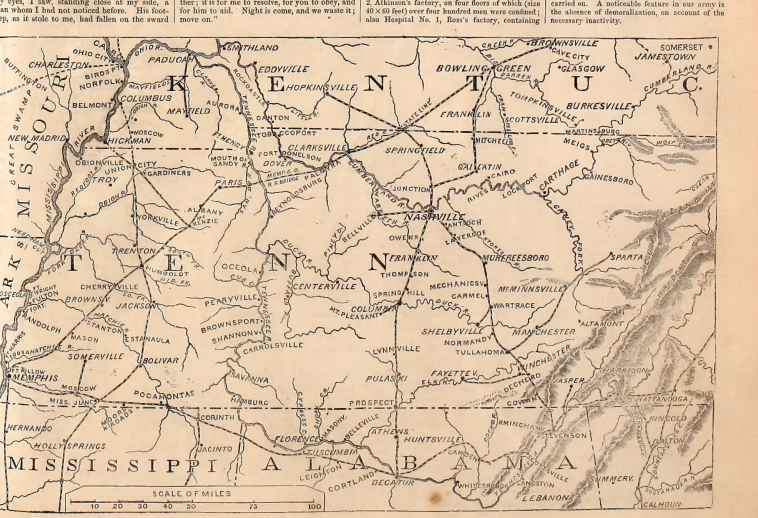
We publish on page 117 several illustrations of OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND, with portraits of their jailers, from sketches by Mr. James Gillette.

The testimony of those recently released goes to show that the published accounts of outrages perpetrated upon unarmed prisoners of war by their keepers, and the many sufferings they have undergone, have not been exaggerated, as many have supposed. Perhaps a mistake has been made in ascribing these circumstances to a vindictive spirit on the part of the revolutionary authorities. It is more generally results from their inability to control the passions of the drunken and ignorant hordes that compose the rank and file of their army, and the total absence of material or means necessary for the maintenance of a war prison. The necessities of their own army are avowed excuses for whatever deprivations the prisoners are obliged to submit to.

The condition of our soldiers, crowded in the damp and filthy tobacco factories of the South, is indeed fearful. Covered with vermin, which a want of change of clothing, filth, and improper accommodations have engendered, half-starved and nearly naked as they are, what wonder that so hardened to human suffering as will refuse to advocate measures by which these suffering patriots may be honorably relieved?

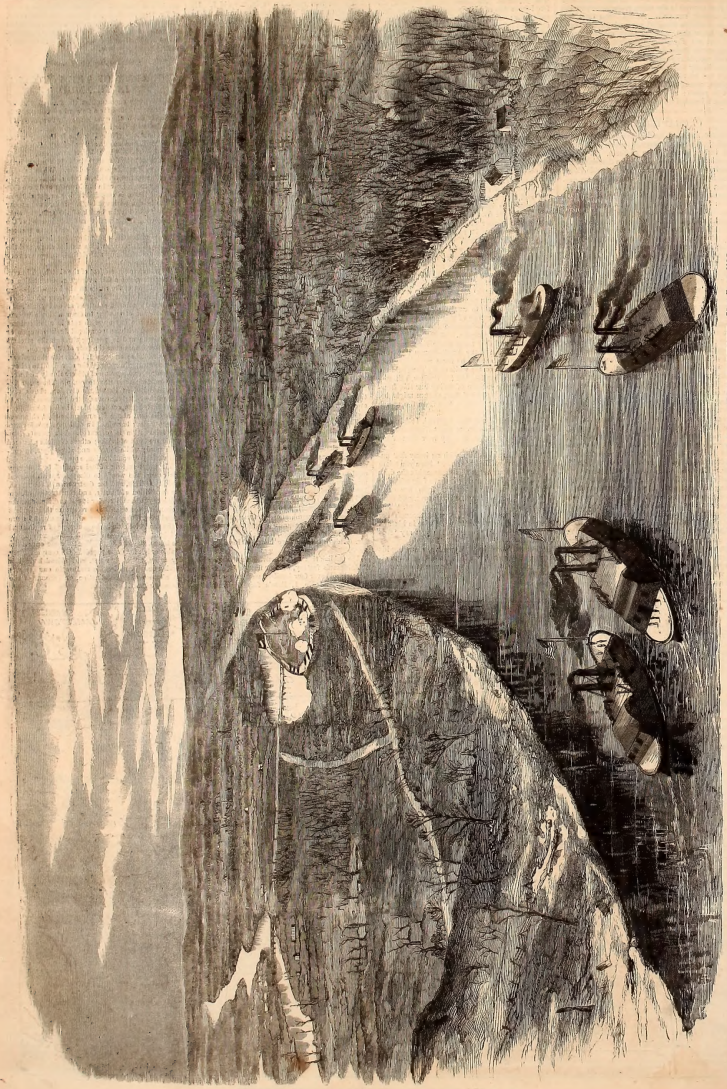
The return of MR. JAMES GILLETTE, of the New York 71st Regiment, who has been five weeks a prisoner in Richmond, affords us an opportunity to give our readers accurate representations of the prisons and prison scenes, from sketches made by Mr. G. during the weary hours of his imprisonment.

We publish this week illustrations of Prison No. 2, Atkinson's factory, on four floors of which (size 60 × 60 feet) over four hundred men were confined; also Hospital No. 1, Ross's factory, containing nearly one hundred wounded soldiers, in charge of Dr. Higginbotham, surgeon in the rebel army. These men are suffering from wounds received at the battle of Bull Run. We give other representations of officials and scenes of interest to the many friends of the prisoners.



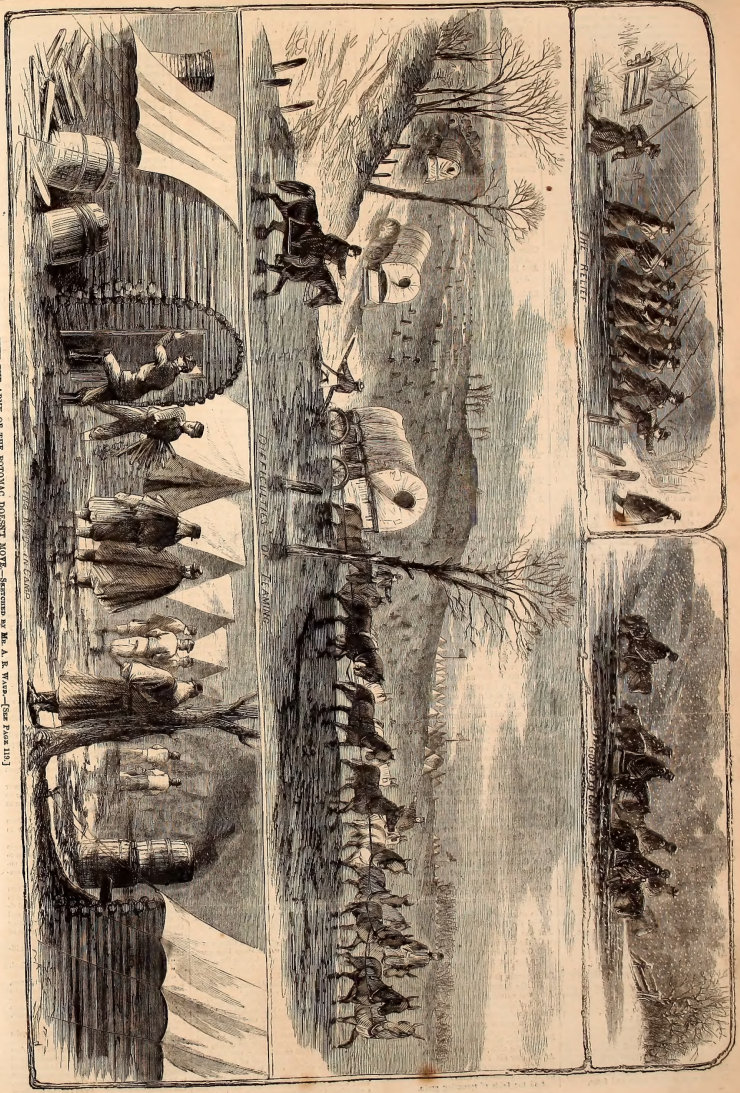
THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC AND THE MUD.

WHATEVER opportunities the fine weather of last month afforded for a forward movement, it is evidently out of the question to stir now, even if it accorded with General M'Clellan's strategy to do so. The Army of the Potomac is literally stuck in the mud, and no one attempts locomotion unless obliged. Those who think it as much as life is worth to get the feet wetted should see huge little difference it makes to the soldier. When he steps out of his tent at reveille, it is to sink at each step half-way to the knees in liquid mud; and from that time till tattoo is sounded he has to get along as well as he can with wet boots. It does not appear to interfere with the health of the men, the sick-roll showing fewer cases then before in most of the camps. In some places the officers have secured quarters in houses, where they shut themselves up in small close rooms, with a red-hot stove, and the whole is hermetically sealed (the Germans are very fond of this plan).



To return to the subject of the sketch. The centre picture gives a fair average representation of the condition of the roads on the line—sickeningly muddy, and abounding in holes, from which it requires the combined efforts of several teams and a vast amount of cursing to draw a single wagon. The fields are cut up with ruts in all directions, ornamented with an occasional broken wagon or dead horse; and in passing through the streams the water comes over the floor of the wagon.

The sketches on page 121 describe themselves. Soldiers struggling through the mired soil to relieve the guards, and a group of officers slowly and wearily wending their way to camp. The scene below, sketched in Franklin's division, shows several of the contrivances adopted by the soldiers to make their tents comfortable: the log foundation, with the tent above it, and make-shift chimneys of empty flour barrels. In chimneys much variety of invention is presented. The more aristocratic are built of bricks; others of sticks plastered with mud; while barrels and stove-pipes, in endless variety of combination, appear.



The large amount of fuel required by the army has caused the woods to disappear with magical rapidity. This, and the destruction of the fences, the demolition of houses, and construction of new military roads, will render it rather difficult for the abandoning secessionists to recognize their ancient boundaries, if they ever return. The worst feature of the mud blockade is the stoppage of regimental and brigade drill. Still, with mud nearly up to the knees, the 23d Massachusetts come out on the double quick for dress parade. On comparatively dry spots, target, bayonet, and skirmish drill is carried on. A noticeable feature in our army is the absence of demoralization, on account of the necessary inactivity.

AMY SCUDDER.

NORTHWARD down upon Long Island,
Where the white shores shrink away
Into winding creeks and channels,
Into many a dreamy bay,
Bordered round with hazel copses,
And with birch-trees silver gray—

There lies Farmer Scudder's homestead
Sloping gently to the South,
With a crawling fence of locust
Snugly hedging it around,
And its patch of bloomy apples,
And its patch of meadow ground.

'Tis a pleasant place that homestead
In the long-drawn summer days,
When the pigeons on the gables
Purple in the sunsets' rays,
And upon the swelling upland
Shines the glory of the maize.

Sweet, too, are the solemn pine groves,
Where the snowy pipe-flowers grow
O'er the graves of ancient Indians
Buried many a year ago—
Buried ere the white man's vessels
Flecked the Sound with sails of snow.

Beauteous is the neighboring highland,
Where the mansion of the Squire
Nests among the groves of laurel,
And of tulips all on fire,
Over which, across the distance,
Shines the village church's spire.

Here, where an abundant Nature
Ever on its Maker smiled,
Dwelt the pretty Amy Scudder,
Like a wood-flower blooming wild:
She was not the farmer's daughter,
But a poor adopted child.

Eighteen years ago last winter
To his door a woman came,
Faintly begging food and shelter
For her weak, emaciate frame.
Farmer Scudder, noble-hearted,
Never even asked her name—

Never asked her name or story,
But in mercy took her in,
Gave her food and gave her raiment,
As if she had been of his kin:
For he felt, though child of sorrow,
She was not a child of sin.

Close on spring her child was born,
Nearly eighteen years ago;
Thin the soft-some Amy Scudder
That the village gossips knew—
Then the mother heavenward drifted,
Melting with the melting snow.

Ere she breathed her last, however,
Though she did not tell her name,
She besought the honest farmer
Not to silly wrong her fame,
For she swore her little daughter
Amy was not born of shame.

And he knew, while she was speaking,
That she could not speak a lie,
With a host of white-robed angels
Bending o'er her from the sky:
So he swore to be a father
To her child if she should die.

So at peace with earth and heaven,
She passed up—all to the throne;
And the farmer, true to promise,
Claimed the orphan for his own—
Made her feel upon his bosom
That she was not left alone.

Oh! her lips had music on them
Like the murmurous hum of bees,
Or the singing of the breezes
When they're playing with the trees,
Or the low and mystic harpings
Of the liquid-fingered seas.

And her eyes had beauty in them,
Like the morning drop of dew,
Tinct with azure and with sunshine,
Sleeping in the lotus blue,
And they thrilled with maiden magic
All who met them through and through.

Aye her form was fair to look at,
As the rounding slope of hills
When the magic might of distance
All the rougher details kills,
Till the mystic enrvilinear
Every artist law fulfills;

And the neighbors loved to see her,
With her simply-banded hair,
Sitting in the church of Sundays,
All so virginal and fair,
And her virgin face illumined
With the holiness of prayer.

'Twas not strange when young Hugh Cameron,
Decked with college name and fame,
To his father's stately mansion
In vacation homeward came—
To the house upon the highland,
Where the spreading tulips flame.

'Twas not strange that he should love her
When he saw her in her pew,
So suffused maiden meekness,
Like a white flower bathed in dew—
None who looked could help but love her.
I would love her—so would you.

Well they loved. The same old story—
She in innocence and truth,
He with all the fire and passion
Of the stormy time of youth,
Seeing nothing save the present,
Scoffing at all hints of ruth.

Honest Farmer Scudder knew it,
And his cheeks with pride grew red
When he thought his darling Amy
With the proud Squire's son would wed.
That there could be bar between them
Never entered in his head.

He was honest—earned his living—
Owned those acres broad and free,
Came of good substantial parents,
And to no man bent the knee.
And his child was fit to mate with
Any man, whoe'er he kept aloof?
Ah! let fancy fling the shuttle
For this many-colored woof.

But the haughty Squire relented,
Even in his proud flesh some shame;
And in triumph from his travels
Happily Hugh Cameron came,
And the new-found bride, Countess,
Passed into a dearer name.

But old honest Farmer Scudder,
Though he felt his heart aglow
At the fortune of his darling,
Said, all kindlily you know,
That he thought he loved her better
When she was Amy down below.

PATTY.

I.

SUNDAY morning at Oakmere St. Mary's. The church is some half-mile from the village. The bells have ceased ringing. The last white-robed frock has left the green church-yard, and slouched up the street after it by his assigned pew. The clerk—a spectacled old man, with a head as bald and polished that it quite glitters in the sunlight—appears in the little gallery, and turns the leaves of the organ with solemn slowness. The Rev. Mortar Burford—a little, troublous, bent old man—creeps to the reading-desk, his hands cased in black, and overlarge black gloves, resting here and there on the projections it passes along the side. A low, and yet impressive tones, with perhaps a little of the pomp and singsong of an old school of elocution in his delivery, the pastor feeds his simple flock through the appointed morning service.

Farmer Barford—a sleeping, Roman-nosed gray mare drew a yellow-wheeled chaise through the village. This was Dr. Gregor, the nearest medical man. The mare was going slow for that Sunday. Perhaps his was off to see poor crippled Miss Hemingham, of Hemingham Priory, Chiddle Abbots, or to visit Squire Cudgrove's farm-bailiff, had with the ague at Little Higglington. Any how, he plodded about half way on the road through Oakmere St. Mary's, for he saw a man coming to him across the green.

"So it's you, is it?" said the Doctor, cheerfully. "How are you, Mr. Bryce?"

And he shook hands with a thin old man, with hair so white and closely clipped that it looked like a down skull-cap made to fit very tightly.

"I'm hearty, thank'ee," answered Mr. Bryce.

"Why, I thought it was a much younger man," the Doctor went on, "you were walking at such a pace."

The old man chuckled approvingly.

"Eighty—seven," he said, "come Christmas. Eighty-seven, and all my faculties! all my faculties!"

It was noteworthy, however, that he would put his hand to his ear, after the manner of deaf people, whenever the Doctor spoke.

"Not at church, Mr. Bryce; how's that?"

"I'm getting there now. I've been looking up the skulkers a bit; they try to hide behind the pump, and think I shan't see 'em. But I'm one too many for 'em, I am. I've just sent word to Billy Martin. That boy'd never be at church at all, I do think, if I weren't here to drive him. He's a bad 'un, that boy, if there ever was one."

As he put his hand again to his ear the fact that he had lost two of his fingers became apparent.

"How's Miss Patty?"

"Grown quite a great girl;" and there was a pleased look in the old man's sharp blue eyes. "Takes a class now at the school, under the schoolmistress! Is getting—getting—somewhat of a woman!"

"And is she here?" said the old man; "she'll do, for the matter of that, will my Patty."

That old boy," quoth the Doctor to himself, as he drove along the road to Chiddle Abbots, "if he isn't eighty-seven, must be very near it. As good an old soul and as obstinate an old toad as ever lived. Lost his fingers at Seringapatam, he says; a brave soldier, I've no doubt, just the man to be; but pig-headed to that extent—why, that cough of his was very nearly carrying him of last winter, and all because nothing could induce him to take his mixture. Ah, I remember his poor daughter well; what a sad, pale face she had! The husband, a scoundrel, I believe (though he's been dead long since, I hear); and the tiny baby! I never thought they'd rear it; but it thrived, somehow, get on wonderfully, and now there isn't a prettier girl about these parts than little Patty Dean. I ought to know," and a smile crept over his kind, tanned face, "for I've helped them all into the world—all the children about here for the last five-and-twenty years, and kept my eye on them ever since. I ought to know something about them. Come, old lady, wake up."

For indeed the gray mare, listening attentively to this monologue, her ears twitching about vividly in her interest and excitement, had slackened pace considerably, and there were some miles to go before Hemingham Priory was reached—always supposing that Dr. Gregor was proceeding thither.

Mr. Bryce turned toward the church, the while looking out sharply, however, for "skulkers." He was much curved now by his years, and it was difficult to believe that in his youth he had stood six feet high. The old military bearing was gone of late; it was noticeable that Mr. Bryce's back was very much bent now. But he moved more slowly, that his age was telling upon him—so all the village said. A handsome old man, but that the brow of his features were a little too hard and stern. He wore a very grim look when he was angry; his thick, projecting, white eyebrows came down over his fierce eyes, his nostrils dilated and stiffened, his lips disappeared, and left merely a deep dent or cut in his face to mark where his mouth was to be found ordinarily. There was rather a leonine expression on his face on the whole.

The presence of Mr. Bryce was almost as good or picturesque for stopping mischief in church. His sharp eyes settled steadily upon an offender in this respect, and held him tightly, as it were, for several minutes; the punishment was more than sufficient for the offense.

But during the singing Mr. Bryce's gaze was turned in another direction—away from the organ-loft and toward the chancel—and he looked out severely this time, but with pleasure and admiration. A little maiden, in a coarse straw-hat, with very thick chestnut hair and very blue eyes, soft rosy cheeks, and a charmingly-formed, well-developed mouth, sat there in charge of a detachment of school children, and often endeavored to restrain the exercise by aiding thereto her sweet mellow voice, perfectly in tune, and soft, flexible, and most witching in its tones.

Farmer Barford, the stout man with the hair brought over his forehead, his dress, the cheek-bockcloth, the blue coat, and the very rough hat, were a gloomy look as he came out of church. He had not fancy to interchange salutations with his neighbors, according to custom.

"Tity Jan in church, I thought it," observed Farmer Barford, wiping his forehead with a scented handkerchief kept in his hat, and thoroughly warm in consequence.

"It was, Mr. Barford agrees, and then she continues. "Did you notice stoodent chap in chancel pew?"

"Him as lives over at Todd's? Didn't notice un particler to speak on."

"Looks poorly like," says Mrs. Barford.

"Ah," then town lads I've noticed a most allays has white faces and a sickerly sort of look. Suppose they can't help?"

"Suppose so."

Soon Mr. Bryce and the little maiden in the straw-hat had come up to the Barfords.

"Well, Patty," said the old man, "how are you?"

"Very well, thank you, sir," said Miss Patty, courtesying.

"She do," said the old man, with a grin of pleasure. "Uncommon fine this morning, I thought sir. And then, in a whisper, "Wonderful clever girl! I taught her."

"Never heard you sing much tough yersell, Muster Bryce," quoth Farmer Barford, dryly, undeterred by his wife's nods and signs not to offend the soldier, "less it was 'Jemmy-lean-to-feedle,' or summut of that sort, at harvest supper."

"I taught her," repeated Mr. Bryce, persistently and proudly, and pointedly ignoring the last appellation.

At the gate of the Barfords' farm the two families divide. Farmer Barford plucks a rose, the largest he can find.

"Here, Patty," he says, giving her the flower with a gallantry that makes up in heartiness for its want of polish, "and I shall see such a pooty color as your cheeks, neither, my dear."

Mrs. Barford smiles approbation. Patty Dean blushes and her cheeks look as red as the rose hollow in point of crimson.

"I have some more roses, Patty, if you like," says the farmer. And then, by way of consolation to the old soldier, "There's plenty here, and I've no doubt your roses is somehow backward this season, Muster Bryce."

Patty glanced timidly at her grandfather. From something she saw in his face she seemed to fear to take no more roses. They went on slowly and silently for some minutes to their cottage at the end of the green—the last cottage but one, that being the wheel-wright's. They were soon out of sight of Farmer Barford's.

Mr. Bryce eyed the rose for some time rather illnaturedly.

"Are you very fond of flowers, Patty?" he asked.

"Yes, grandfather."

"You don't care for that one in particler, do you, Patty? I think we've got some in our garden that's pretty fair to look at—pretty fair, only that Barford's given to bragging, and thinks all his things are ever so much better than any body else's—a dull fool!"

"Oh, grandfather!" and Patty stopped quite suddenly, she was so shocked.

"Well, well, my dear, he means well; I dare say he means well. Perhaps one shouldn't call names like—sort of a Sunday name—coming from church and all. But those Barfords always want to be telling the high horse, and making presents, and looking down on one. I won't have it! Throw the flower away, Patty!"

"If you wish it, grandfather," she said, rather mournfully.

"The old man laid a trembling hand upon her shoulder, and said, in a low, moved voice:

"They want you to love them more than me, Patty! They want to take away your love from me, Patty. Don't let them; don't, there's a dear lamb! I'm a very old man, Patty, and troublesome, very likely, and hard to please sometimes; but I'm your grandfather—I'm your poor mother's father—and they're strangers, quite strangers. They're not blood-kin to you in any way, my dear. Don't get to love them more than me—don't, Patty. I want all your love, every bit, my child. You must love no one else—nothing else—only me, Patty!"

She looked into his face in a strange, scared way. For a moment there was the gleam as of tears in her eyes. Then she let fall the rose, and they went on again.

"Who's that coming along behind us, Patty?" asked Mr. Bryce.

Patty turned. She saw a young man following them, who stopped when he came to where she had dropped Farmer Barford's rose. Could she be mistaken? It seemed to her that he picked up the fallen flower, and thrust it into his breast-pocket. Again Patty blushed. She was rather given to blushing; and there was a slight falter in her voice as she said,

"It's the young man lodging at Todd's the wheel-wright's."

"Do you know his name, my dear?"

"I think it's Becket; at least, so Mr. Barford said."

What a splendid color adorned Patty's cheeks! The old man muttered something, It sounded very like "Bother Mr. Barford!" Perhaps it was even a more forcible expression. Probably the army at Seringapatam was accustomed to hear and to use rather strong language. I can find no other excuse for him.

II.

Was it from pure chance only that there came that beautiful glow on Patty's face—that brilliant gleam in Patty's eyes—when she mentioned the name of the young man lodging "over at Todd's the wheel-wright's?"

Mrs. Barford was right. Certainly Mr. Becket—"stoodent chap," as she called him—looked "poorly like;" had "a sickerly sort o' look," according to Mr. Barford. It was a very white face that had appeared over the chancel-pew door every now and then, during the morning ministration of the Rev. Morris Baldersby, for it was occasionally only that the members of his flock were visible to each other, the partitions between them were so high. During the Litany, for instance, the whole congregation were lost to view—secreted at the bottom of their pews—like solitary half-pence in separate money-boxes. But during the singing of the Psalms, pale Mr. Becket could be seen by all. He owned a handsome face, though it was so white. A little too womanly and delicate, perhaps, and wanned by illness apparently—yet certainly handsome, if only from its refinement and expression. Fair hair, a slender figure, and thin, white, nervous hands that matched the clergyman's, only they were without their tremor. Mrs. Barford had quick eyes. Did she notice that when Patty's singing from her seat near the communion-table drew Mr. Bryce's approving gaze upon her, that Mr. Becket's eyes also turned in the same direction—with looks of admiration of a very ardent kind indeed! But, perhaps, Mrs. Barford was a woman of discretion. It is as well not to see too much. It is as well to let some events occur without comment.

III.

Who was Mr. Becket? He had come down from London in bad health; he had taken lodgings at Todd's; he was studying law.

Looking from the window at the back of Todd's house, it was not possible not to see ex-Sergeant-Major Bryce's garden; still less was it possible not to see Patty Dean if she happened to be in her grandfather's garden—and she was there very often.

The student sat at his window poring over a thick book—an ugly-looking book—bound in what is known as law calf, with the name on a red label at the back. He leaned his head upon his hand, clutching a handful of his long, light hair, and frowning as he read, curving his back and twisting his legs together after the usual inevitable unwise manner of students. It was very still. The soft-scented air blowing gently in at the open casement, fanning the student's white face—only the noise of the stray jasmine branch, that would tap now and then upon the panes, or the buzzing of the loaded bee bungling at the glass striving to burst his way through and make free with the flowers inside the room; or now and then the glad notes of that intrepid aeronaut, the lark, high up above—a musical rocket—raining down sparks of song upon the world. It would be very pleasant to be atop of the purple hill at the back of the cottage, breathing the air at very first hand, as it were—while it was yet virginal and new—untaxed and unsoiled; or to be on one's back in the shade, watching the little Trill, enjoying its sparkling wrestle with its rushes! So the student thought, perhaps, as he glanced up at the sky—out at the hills—and then turned again to his law calf-bound book, and sighed. And this time thrust both hands into his tangled hair.

> "An agreement by a feme covert, having separate estate, for the purchase of property, has been enforced against the seller upon the ground that she may contract as if she were a feme sole for the purchase of an estate, and that her property will be bound by the contract, although she do not refer to it. But in a case before Sir J. Leach—"

Three times did the student stagger through this interesting paragraph, struggling to take it into his intelligence. But he couldn't. It was not the sky, nor the hill, nor the lark, nor the bee, nor the Trill that hindered him. Somehow he felt—there was as much feeling as seeing in the case—the presence of some one in Sergeant Bryce's garden. The next moment, and he encountered the exquisite blue eyes of Patty Dean! Of course each looked away instantly—he steadily at the sky, she intently on the ground. But the mischief was done. It was as though they were at the ends of a chain which love had electrified all ready for them. They had touched the wire—only with the very tips of their fingers—in the slightest way possible. It was enough.

Is love often so instantaneous as this? I don't know; I am only stating a single case, not laying down a general rule founded upon many facts. Certainly when Patty read in the student's rapt glance, "I love you!" she hung out signals in her eyes that expressed, as plainly as though she had spoken the words, "Thank you; I love you!"

Could he go on reading after that? Was it possible to chain himself to that ugly law book longer? No! "She may contract as if she were a feme sole!" What did the author mean? Would he dare to call that angel in Sergeant Bryce's garden—would he dare to speak of her as a feme sole? What an infamy! A feme sole! Ha! ha! Why not a fried sole? It was just as reasonable, quite as fit, That darling a feme sole! Great Heaven! And he kicked the book into a corner.

He strode about the room. There was a smile upon his lips now, and light in his eyes, and color in his cheeks. He looked already a hundred per cent. better. He seemed to grow quite healthy, muscular, and athletic all of a sudden. He gave the book another kick when he came into its neighborhood; he squared pugilistically at an imaginary foe, and hit out at him. Suddenly he stopped.

He looked again from the window, and devoted himself to watching Patty Dean's movements in Sergeant Bryce's garden. Hers was a simple occupation enough. A cord ran from the big apple-tree in the centre of the garden to the lime close to the house. On this cord Patty was engaged in hanging "the things" to dry. It was certainly interesting to the spectator was this employment. There was an element of chance about it. Now she was quite hidden behind a turbulent swelling sheet; when would she emerge? What a time she kept out of sight! There she was! Ah! gone again in a second. It was like a game of peep-bo! and every time their eyes met how they blushed, Patty and the student, and yet they enjoyed their own and each other's diffidence. They were quite children at the game—the game of love, I mean this time, and not peep-bo—but they played at it very creditably indeed for beginners. And the student grew desperately bad. He longed to sally forth and leap the little boundary hedge that sundered the domains of Mr. Bryce and Mr. Todd, and crown Patty with a wreath of apple-blossom; it was the most perfect decoration at hand, and very pretty would the white pink-tinted flowers have looked, starring Patty's clouds of chestnut hair, and setting off to perfection her blue eyes and her red lips, and the beautiful bloom of her cheeks; and then fall at her feet, and do fealty to her as the lawful queen of his heart.

Altogether, perhaps, it was no wonder that he looked at her so earnestly from the chancel-pew, or that she blushed when she saw him pick up and treasure the rose Farmer Barford had given her, and Sergeant Bryce had begged her to discard.

What would grandfather say if he were to know all this? What, indeed! But then he didn't know it. All things considered, it may be that it was quite as well he didn't.

IV.

Sergeant Bryce sat in his garden smoking a long clay pipe. On the rustic table before him rested a handsome wire cage, containing a canary bird with the brightest black eyes and the gayest yellow plumage that ever were seen. Bird and cage had been presented to Patty, some months before, by Miss Ada Morris, the rector's grand-niece, who had been charmed by the way Mr. Bryce's granddaughter had distinguished herself in the school, and by her singing in church. The bird hopped from perch to perch of his cage in the most sprightly manner, and tilted his head to and fro the better to eye old Mr. Bryce and his proceedings. A preliminary note or two, and the bird treated himself to quite a scena of song, full of difficulties, admirably executed. The merits of the performance, however, were lost on Mr. Bryce. He simply scowled at the bird; if it had been a little bigger I think he would have liked to have used his rattan to it.

"Little beast!" he muttered, "how I hate that bird! I wish Patty wouldn't bring it out here, parading it about enough to make one sick. She's allays pampering of it, and a-smartening up of its cage, and a-talking to it, and a-singing and a-whistling, and making it peck sugar from 'twixt her lips. I can't think what makes her so fond of it. I can't see nothing in it. Ugly little devil I call it."

And he looked round cautiously to see if he were watched, and then puffed a cloud of tobacco-smoke into the cage. The poor bird looked very dismal indeed under this violent change of atmosphere.

"I wish that girl up at Rectory had kept the bird to herself," the old man went on, regardless of the canary's aspect of astonishment and distress. "Patty thinks of nothing now but this bird, I declare. All day long, from morning till night, there's no comfort in the house now—none. She's too fond of it, that's what she is; it isn't right. I hate to see her so fond of it; she used to care a bit for me once; but now—"

Suddenly the old man stopped, and put down his pipe; a strange eager look came into his face; then he scrutinized the cage with great care. He took off his oilskin cap, and wiped his forehead.

"Why, the door isn't fastened," he said; "the slightest touch would open it. It would hardly be my doing, supposing—supposing the door was to open and the bird to hop out—hardly my doing; she ought to have seen that it was secure, of course she ought; it would be her own fault if the bird were to get away—entirely her own fault."

He thought over the matter a little. He took a puff or two at his pipe.

"Why, I believe a breath of wind even would do it. A breath—"

He stooped over the cage and blew in another cloud of smoke from the side of the cage opposite to that he had operated upon before. The door opened a little, a very little only, so he helped it by means of his pipe. The bird, puzzled by the smoke, hopped down to inhale the fresh air coming in at the door, now wide open; hopped on to the frame of the door, peered round cautiously. The sergeant held his breath; the bird was out—on the table—on the ground—away—over the hedge!

The deed was done. Of course he was sorry for it the moment after; shocked at his meanness, ashamed of his jealousy, trembling all over, his hand shook so he could not hold his pipe, and it fell and broke, and he stood pale, cowed, and guilty-looking—before his grandchild!

"Oh, my poor birdie! my dear, darling, little birdie!" and Patty was in agony of sorrow.

"I couldn't help it—indeed I couldn't!" he faltered. "You left the cage open, and the bird got out. I couldn't stop him—indeed I couldn't! You left the cage open."

"Poor, poor dickey!" Patty hid her face in her hands.

"Don't cry," said a voice they had neither of them heard before. Some one jumped over the hedge from the next garden. Patty looked up, and her eyes met the student's.

"It's quite safe," he said; "it flew straight to me, straight to my heart."

And he restored to her the little, warm, throbbing canary. In doing this their hands met for the first time. It seemed to be quite difficult to part them again. It was quite a long business, that passing the bird from his keeping to hers.

"How can I ever thank you enough," said Patty; "my darling! my darling!"

Of course these terms of endearment were intended for the bird; but somehow the student seemed to derive a sort of reflected tenderness from them.

"I am very glad," he said, "that I was able to secure it. But, indeed, I could hardly help it, for it flew straight to my heart."

He seemed to attach importance to that phrase—he dwelt upon it so. He turned to the old man:

"I saw how it escaped," he said, steadily.

The Sergeant-Major of the 140th Regiment quailed before the student.

V.

The hedge once leaped, words interchanged, hands met, and there was not now one wire only bringing Patty and the student en rapport, there was a whole electric coil; they were knit together now in quite a tangle of love. Could it be long before the story of the student's passion found its way from his heart to his lips? One delicious moonlight night Patty was in the garden, quite accidentally of course, and in a moment there was the student on his knees before her, telling her what she must have known perfectly well, and which yet she trembled to hear. How her heart beat, and her voice fled from her! No; she couldn't speak. Poor Patty! The tears came into her eyes, and she stooped down and kissed her lover. Perhaps the action was more eloquent than speech, after all. Poor Patty!

A hoarse, harsh shout startled them. It was like a cracked gong breaking in upon a pastoral symphony. Sergeant-Major Bryce, with fury in his face, was sundering the lovers; driving angrily one into his cottage, menacing the other with a feeble fist.

VI.

"I'd never have believed it of you; never, Patty, never! To think you should come to this; tricking, and lying, and cheating your poor old grandfather, as has been so kind to you. No," he screamed, passionately, "crying ain't no use, not a bit; you bad, wicked, heartless girl, you. You've no more feeling than a stone, you know you haven't. I, that has loved you so much, and hoped that you'd love only me—only me—a poor old man of eighty-seven. You might have waited a bit, Patty. I sha'n't be here long to trouble you. You might have waited till they took me to the church-yard, Patty. But you've no heart, no feelin', no thought but for your own wicked, worthless self. You bad girl, you—you," etc., etc.

So the old man rained down words that were blows upon poor Patty's devoted head.

"Don't speak so to me, grandfather, don't; you'll kill me."

And she went to him to kiss him. He thrust her from him rudely, fiercely even.

"Get away; I want no viper's kisses, I don't. You're no grandchild of mine no more. You're not my Patty. You're not—"

But he stopped. Her face was so white that it frightened him, even in his senseless anger.

"Will you give him up, Patty?" he asked.

"Any thing, any thing!" she cried, in a strange, broken voice, "only don't, don't, for God's sake, speak to me like that!" and she fell fainting into his arms.

VII.

"Oh, no; never, never; it can never be!" she said to her lover, at a last stolen interview; "have pity on me. Don't think unkindly of me, Henry. I do love you—indeed I do; but we must never meet again. I dare not see you any more; I hardly dare to think of you. My life belongs to him. Forgive me, Henry—and yet, no, no, please don't forget me."

What could he do? What but strain her to his heart, press his lips on her white face, swear that he would love her always, murmur "God bless you, Patty!" and then turn his back upon Oakmere St. Mary's. Forever?

VIII.

Months went by. Autumn mists brooded over the village green, almost obscured the pump. The landscape wore a threadbare look, like an old coat. The foliage waned and faded. The trees were losing flesh, as it were, and fast becoming skeletons. The cold winds had commenced already to whistle through their naked branches. The flowers were gone, and with them the roses from Patty's cheeks. She was very pale now, and so thin and weak that any effort seemed to fatigue and pain her. She could sing no more in church now. She had tried, but her voice gave way. She burst into tears, and nearly swooned in front of the chancel pew.

And no news of the student? None. He had gone, and left no trace—save the sorrow in Patty's heart and eyes. One thing to mark his visit: the ugly law book, with the name of "Henry Becket" and a London address written on the fly-leaf—he had left that behind him. Todd the wheel-wright—perhaps he could make a guess as to what had happened, he was a kind-hearted man, and very fond of his little neighbor Patty—Todd asked her if she would mind taking charge of the book until his lodger came or sent for it. Poor Patty! how she hugged it to her heart, and kissed it, and cried over it. It was a strange use to put a legal authority to. I don't think the learned author ever contemplated a feme sole conducting herself so curiously over his work.

"She'll go jist like her mother did afore her," so the old folks said up the village. "She fell sickerly, and got pale and agerish; and Muster Bryce, he ain't the man he were. Can't look after the boys in church as he used. He's agoing fast: and he be that deaf now—"

There were no more boasts about "eighty-seven and all his faculties." He was very feeble and peevish, and his voice was now quite a whine.

IX.

There had been sickness at Farmer Barford's house. Little Amos had been bad with the measles, and Dr. Gregor had been constantly in attendance. The sufferer, however, was convalescent now, and Mrs. Barford was able to talk to the Doctor upon other subjects than her sick child. One morning she had a very long conversation indeed with him. I think she was putting him in possession of the history of Oakmere St. Mary's during the past six months.

"He's a confounded old fool," said the Doctor, when she had finished. "I am going on to Hensingham Priory. I'll call on him as I come back."

Some hours later, and the Doctor returned through Oakmere St. Mary's.

"Is your neighbor in?" he asked of Todd, the wheel-wright. Todd nodded in reply.

"Then I'm going to bully him well," said the Doctor.

"Tew can play at that," Todd answered with a grin. (Todd came from Devonshire originally.) And he chuckled to himself. "Bully old Bryce! That's something like a joke. The hardest-mouthed old man about these parts."

The Doctor made his way into Bryce's cottage.

"You're a wicked old man," cried the Doctor.

He paused, expecting a violent outburst in reply. Mr. Bryce shuffled his feet and moved uneasily in his chair.

"I know I am," he said, humbly.

"You've made yourself miserable—"

"I have."

"And you're breaking your grandchild's heart."

"Don't say that," and the old man held up his hands imploringly. The Doctor had expected a fierce battle. But the foe surrendered without striking a blow.

"Don't you say she is going like her mother. I've heard them say so up the village. Any thing but that. Don't you say it."

"Send for him then," said the Doctor.

"I've thought of it often. I've been wrong and foolish, but I'm eighty-seven, you see. I'd have sent for him long ago, but—"

"But what?"

"I never knew his name, not to recollect it, much less his address."

Just then Patty entered with the law calf-bound book. When she pointed to the writing on the fly-leaf there was more color in her face than had been seen there for months.

"There's just half an hour to catch the London post," said the Doctor, looking at his watch.

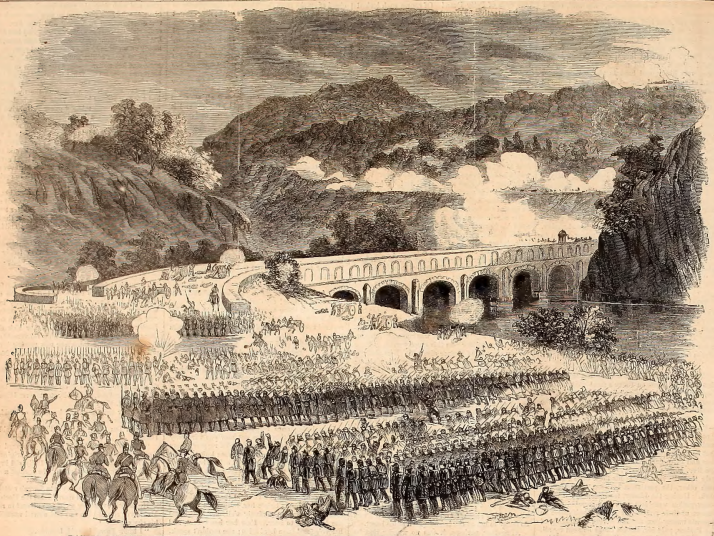
X.

It was not very long after this that the Rev. Morris Baldersby was busy with the Marriage Service.

"I Henry, take thee, Patty," etc., etc. (She was christened Patty, it appeared.)

Did Mr. Henry Becket's friends speak of a mésalliance ever? None who ever knew his wife. Indeed she should have been accounted a good match. Her heart was of gold.

Mrs. Barford provided a superb cake.



"Will you have it all," whispered the Doctor to Sergeant Bryce, "or will a slice do? A slice? Very good. Eighty-seven, and all your faculties; and, listen: perhaps when you are eighty-eight, or a little better, a great-grandfather—think of that! But shall you want all your great grandchild's love? Won't a slice of it do? Yes, so I should think."

Patty's grandfather was convinced. He shook hands with the Doctor, next with the bridegroom, then with every body else in the room. He was perfectly happy and comfortable. And to demonstrate his possession of his faculties, and especially to delight Farmer Barford, he straightway struck up and sang twice through his favorite song, "Jemmy-linkum-feedle."

FRESHET AT CINCINNATI.

We are indebted to an old correspondent, Mr. George M. Finch, of Cincinnati, for the picture which we reproduce on page 124, illustrating the recent Freshet in the Ohio. Mr. Finch writes:

> Cincinnati, Jan. 25, 1862.
> Inclosed I send a sketch of the Maysville packet landing during the great freshet in the Ohio River, now at its height. It is taken at the corner of Walnut and Water streets. As floods in the Ohio only occur about once in 15 years—and when they do, cause immense damage, as this one has done, the whole river-front of the city being inundated—I thought it might be of sufficient interest to your readers to publish a sketch.

SKATING CARNIVAL IN BROOKLYN, FEBRUARY 15, 1862.

TRAPPED.

I.

"THANK you! I'm quite out of breath, I declare, and don't intend to dance another step this evening!"

"You'll be obliged to repeat that cruel determination so frequently that I know you'll get tired of it and change your mind—in my favor, I hope."

"Merci, M'sieu! very prettily said, I'm sure! As a reward, you may sit and talk to me until they get through that odious schottische, if you're not afraid to do so."

"The position has its danger, I admit," replied the young man, with a glance which seemed to mark a compliment to the brilliant beauty of the dashingly-dressed woman beside him; "but I'll risk it."

"You won't understand me, sh? then I'll speak plainer. Don't you know that I'm a 'professional?'"

"Well?"

"Well, indeed! the man doesn't soon shocked, I declare, and be an employé of the Government?"

"A lady has a right to be coy thing she pleases, especially when she pleases to be as charming as Mrs. Heyward!"

"On my word, now! Then positively you wouldn't send me off to Fort Lafayette even if I talked treason against Mr. Lincoln?"

"I should be very sorry to deprive Washington of one of its most brilliant and fascinating ornaments. The women might thank me for it, but all the men would hate me."

"Ah, poor Washington I"—and Mrs. Heyward shrugged her bare and beautiful shoulders—"how you are changed!"

"In what respect?"

"In every one that I can think of. The Capitol turned into filthy barracks; the White House not much better, with its mobs of expectant office-seek and tailors, who speak through their noses, say, haire" and don't know enough to keep their swords from tripping them up, or their mouths out of a woman's dress when they're dancing—their dandy wives and vulgar relations, who don't pay the patience with every thing! You're not a Yankee, are you?"

"I was born in Maryland," the young man answered, who had listened with a not altogether assenting or pleased countenance to the remarks of his fair companion; "but I have lived for many years my earliest recollection in New York State, some thirteen up the Hudson."

"Ah! I thought you couldn't be a down-Easter —a Yankee proper! Maryland is with us in heart, you know, if not then say what they will, what have you're a Republican?"

"Oh no! I'm only voted for one Presidential election, and then I went for Douglas."

"Indeed! How came you to be in office then, as a constitutional man, too—at least sometimes was telling me you?"

"Mine is, in some respects. I am private secretary to Mr. ——" (naming a gentleman high in office in the present Administration). "He is an old and valued friend of our family—distinguished in relation to it, in fact—and has proved himself to me the most generous of patrons. Our Government, you must admit, is not a proscriptive one; it doesn't look at political antecedents."

"Oh, I dare say it's glad to welcome any body who comes over to its side, and to pay them well, too—don't suppose it's blind to your merits."

The face of the young man had crimsoned at the insinuation; he bowed, and was silent.

"Mr. Morton," the lady continued, modulating her naturally rich and sweet voice until it sounded almost confidential in the ear of the youthful private secretary, "you must forgive my freedom of speech; I am a Virginian, and haven't yet learned to conform myself to the stately usages of things. Besides, I must tell you that you are so like a cousin of mine, that I find myself talking more familiarly than usual."

"I am happy in the resemblance, I'm sure, and in the result. Where is the gentleman cousin?"

"Where I would be if I were a man—in the Southern army. But the tongue is the only weapon a woman can use, and sometimes I shut her up for doing that."

"Are you not a contribution to that assertion?"

"How long should I be so if I always spoke my mind as freely as I do now? If Mr. —— heard me"—naming the secretary's patron—"now, he'd think he'd apply for a lettre de cachet?"

"I think better of his gallantry," [illegible] me the question—if your opinions are really so severe to us as you allow me to infer, why do you risk personal danger by remaining in Washington?"

"We're not afraid of danger we Virginians, I'm waiting."

"Waiting? what for?"

"The time when I may find myself among friends again, and perhaps be of some service to those who tolerate me now. You'll fall to and very good offices if you ever need them. You have earned them by exhibiting moral courage enough to dance and converse with me as I present."

That is its own reward, and the obligation all on my side. I wish I could lighten it."

"Really?"

"Really."

"Then say you'll put me a pass beyond the lines if I wanted to go to Richmond?"

"That's a service I should be loth to perform, as I fear you would stay there, and then I should think Jeff Davis's capital a more desirable place to be in than Abe Lincoln's."

The words were spoken idly and gallantly, with no more of earnestness than sufficed to convey the impression that the young man was susceptible to the fascinations of his handsome companion. Instead of answering at once, and in the same strain, she fixed her eyes on his—they were dark brown eyes with a wine-gold light in them, marvelously beautiful to one—as if surprised into momentary seriousness, and then, after a little pause, dropped her lashes and replied:

"Don't talk like that. I might take you at your word!"

In his turn Morton looked surprised, and flattered. "I would retract nothing that might commend me to the favor of Mrs. Heyward," he murmured.

"Nothing?"

"Nothing consistent with my honor." He added the latter part of the sentence awkwardly: the significance of her accentuation of the word of two syllables had startled him.

"Ah! I forgive you!" And Mrs. Heyward slightly curled her ripe scarlet upper lip. "Hadn't you better go and dance now?" You have spent enough time upon me, I'm sure."

Morton was piqued at her change of tone. "If you are tired of my company," he said, "I will leave you; but"—and here, as he gazed upon her beauty, animation, vanity, and sudden passion flowering him, he added, "I would much rather by your side than any where else in the world."

"So?" Again she looked with a little wistfulness former fascinating glance, and smiling warmly motioned him to resume his place, for he had drawn withdrawn himself from the effect of her expansive crinoline. And forthwith there began an engrossing conversation between the two, which need not be reported. It ended abruptly in rather a singular manner.

Among the crowd of guests in the brilliantly-lighted hall-room there was a middle-aged man, handsomely dressed as a civilian, whose keen, watchful face, and wiry, relaxed figure suggested a latent perfect familiarity with good society. He had noted a lady, chatted a little, and received a smile here, dropped a word of recognition there, and came in time near to the two persons to whom the reader has been introduced. At first he glanced casually at them, though with a certain observant, attentive look which, as he came to the door, changed presently with a peculiar and growing interest, no more disguised than sufficed to prevent his attracting the notice of those around. Presently he watched the countenance of Basil Morton, who, with a flushed cheek and downcast eyes, was participating to what appeared to be the seductive pleading of the beautiful woman by his side.

The man's face, from any unconscious person the probability is that, before long, your glance will be returned—a certain fact which one might resort to the suspicion of animal magnetism to account for it. Raising his eyes, Morton found himself the object of those searching scrutiny. He colored still more deeply, and exhibited such marks of discomposure that Mrs. Heyward's eyes followed the direction of his own. She, too, recognized and had risen to her feet, asked him impetuously whether he still desired the pass, and received in reply only an answer, whirled the young man off into the thick of the circle of waltzers.

The middle-aged man smiled shrewdly, but directly afterward his keen face looked unfathomably grave. No longer making a show of watching the gaie, he moved on through the company. But throughout the rest of the night he remained in Basil Morton's still covered vicinity to the fair Virginian almost exclusively. When the ball-room and dancing young secretary felt a hand laid upon his shoulder.

"A handsome partner, my boy, but dangerous! Remember Brunton's daughter!"

"What of her?"

"She danced off a man's head, you know! I warn of that widow!"

II.

A MONTH after the date of that warning, Basil Morton sat alone at night in a small chamber, furnished as a prisoner's cell, in the prison of Richmond, engaged in transcribing certain documents of special importance, which the commandant of the place necessitated his unremittent labor until their completion. Seated at a business-looking desk, with an iron safe let into the wall behind him, a dingy lamp affording him light, with the only window of the apartment wide open, he was engaged in transcribing what air was stirring in the sultry July night. The young man wrote on with almost feverish assiduity, only pausing to dash off some rapid phonographic duplicates of each page in a species of hieroglyphic which looked like a modified French letter-paper. This he did in a curious, furtive manner, concealing the book in an inner breastpocket at the completion of each transcript, and reproducing it when another was to be added. All these precautions, and the concentration of his shadow, except the circle of light beneath the lamp-shade, and its smaller reflection on the ceiling. In the first place, he had very hards of the small hood out in strong relief; the countenance thus revealed exhibited signs of anxiety which were more than foreign to its former handsome self-complacency. A spectator would have supposed its owner to be overtasked, or disturbed, at least.

From his frequent glances at his watch which lies on the desk beside him, and his increased speed and straining after each glance, it was clear that he had no desire to complete his double task by some particular time. And, as the hour which approximately reaches the hour of eleven, the writer's fingers seem to emulate the progress of the minute-hand in its time and the flying moments. When the last is done at last, the documents copied, their secret duplicates hastily but accurately destroyed in the notary's breast-pocket, the gas turned off. Wiping his perspiring face and forehead, Basil Morton rose from his hot seat and about to undress himself, has withdrawn the key from its door for the purpose of locking it after him—then, perceiving that reading into the street close below heavily. Muttering an exclamation of impatience and anger, he stands for a few moments irresolute in the darkness, even glances back at the open window, as if with a transitory thought of availing himself of that mode of egress. But the room is on the third story of a tall house, and this involves a more dangerous attempt than the desire to escape by the window will prove a mere temporary hindrance seems to justify. So he waits, hoping the unexpected-ly returned patron will enter one of the lower rooms, leaving the staircase for him to escape unobstructed.

But the footsteps pass above the second story and still ascend. Putting a bold face on the matter, he closes and locks the door of the little apartment with ostentatious noise and goes toward them, distrusting, as they approach, his first impression as to the identity of the new-comer. A moment more confirm the doubt; he nosels, face to face, at a landing-place in a turn of the stairs, not the portly Mr. Lane and gentlemanly Mr. Heyward, but a young man in the uniform of a lieutenant of the United States Army.

"Jim, Frank!" exclaims the Secretary, with a start of surprise; "what in Heaven's name brings you to this place, this hour? I didn't know you were in Washington."

"I came hither to find you." Spoken in a tone indicative of deep agitation, contrasting markedly with the nervous surprise and affected cordiality of Morton.

"I'm in the greatest possible hurry—have to leave something which I've just completed at the post-office, and shall be back directly."

"I'll go with you." And they descended the stairs together, hand clasping normally at the inopportune arrival, and hoping to be soon rid of his companion.

"What did you arrive?" he asked, feeling the necessity of saying something, and walking swiftly onward as they reached the street.

"This evening, at sunset. I have been since then in company with my sister."

"Ellen Morton!" he says passing beneath the deep shadow of the trees bordering the sidewalk, which concealed both their faces, otherwise he had been struck with the self-repressing might have been visible on Morton's.

"Yes; do you know what brought her to Washington?"

Basil contrived to stammer out something about his being a stranger himself, and that he had been so engrossed in business that he had not found leisure to visit Ellen, that he was very glad, and surprised, and curious.

"She came here because she had heard nothing from you, but she affianced husband, for over a month. In spite of her most urgent entreaties. She fancied you might be sick, or that some calamity had befallen you."

Morton expressed thanks, and reiterated his excuses, with secret uneasiness at the tone of his companion.

She had reached Washington, it appeared, before she knew it, and, perhaps of a worse contagion prevalent here; but never supposed you had contracted the latter."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean treason—treachery! Never start! Accident to the noble-hearted gentleman whose name you have dragged down to infamy! And the speaker placed himself full in Morton's path, as if to obstruct his further progress.

"Are you mad?" inquired the Secretary, with a pallid cheek and blanched countenance, assuming in his manner. "Stand aside and let me pass directly. Or, I will answer your wild accusation at a better opportunity than the present."

"You will answer it this night, and to others to boot, unless you choose to act on my information you. I know the secret of your haste: you would hurry from the —— office to keep an appointment with the writer to whom you have sold yourself, for whom you have sacrificed every thing honor, reputation, and affection, the man to whom you have been your wife. But do not think to escape—you are trapped!"

"I am?" And Morton, crowding all his rage, mortification, and despair into one action, aimed a blow at his supposed friend and betrayer's brother-in-law. It was dextrously parried, and the striker seized by the collar. Another second and the two men would have been locked in mortal struggle. Very soon Morton found himself borne to the ground by the superior strength and determination of his antagonist, whose hand was at his throat.

"Let me up!" he gasped. "What do you want of me?"

"Yield yourself as my prisoner, subject to whatever disposal shall be made of you?"

"I do."

The conqueror assisted him to rise, drew from his pocket a whistle, and blew it, not too loudly. After an anxious interval of waiting, it was answered by another from the street.

"What is the meaning of all this, Frank Allen?" asked the discomfited Secretary. "Are you a secret detective? If I were as guilty as you insanely allege, by what right do you exercise this violence?"

"My authority has been of very recent origin, I should have used none. You will be more gently treated if you will submit to my escort. All I require is that you shall accompany us."

"Ur?"

"Yes, sir! I act only according to instructions." As he spoke a carriage, the noise of which had been heard approaching, rattled up the spot, and, answer to his hail, drew up near them.

"Enter, if you please." And the door of the vehicle opened, revealing within the figure of a man. It was the keen-faced, middle-aged person who had warned Basil Morton at the ball.

III.

RAPIDLY the carriage was driven through the deserted streets, its occupants preserving a strict silence, for which Morton would have spoken he was told to reserve all observations until they should be called for. So with arms folded and a raging sense of discomfiture and apprehension of coming evil in his heart—with the constant haunting thought of a beautiful woman waiting for him —waiting, unconscious of the ruin impending over the heads of both, he rode onward with his captors, until the vehicle drew up before a handsome private house, and he was requested to alight.

A momentary thought of striking them down right and left, and a desperate attempt at flight, flashed through his brain; immediately afterward he stood in a parlor, fitted up as an office.

The keen-faced man requested him to be seated, glanced at his watch, talked a while with Frank Allen, who then, as if in obedience to some order, left the room, closing the door behind him, when his principal addressed Basil Morton.

"You will hardly dispute my right to receive your arrest, though you may be surprised at the manner of it. Know that its secrecy is partly in tenderness to you. You have been suspected, seized in open day, before all the world, and consigned to the imprisonment due to a craven traitor, but for the attorney of one of the highest honor and friendship you have atrociously abused; thank him, if you retain the capacity for gratitude, that you are not now on your way to Fort Lafayette!"

Morton attempted to answer, but was checked by an imperious gesture.

"Listen, and then add perjury to treason if you dare! I dare say you have transmitted scraps of vital importance to the Government confided to you—and to you alone—in your capacity of private secretary to ——, which you have taken from transmission to the rebels." The speaker unlocked a desk and produced a packet. "These were seized this morning on the banks of the Upper Potomac by Lieutenant Allen, who was dispatched hither with them until such time as he could increase them by one, I do not doubt, by putting your hand into your pocket."

Morton turned pale, but said not a word.

"It was to secure that dispatch, in addition to Mr. ——'s confidence, that yourself was sent straight hither to-night. I authorized Lieutenant Allen to precede me, that his personal observation might confirm what he had read in the packet of treason to doubt—your treason! If you had remained for another hour in Mr. ——'s office, the papers would have been arrested there. It seems we were just in time!"

Still no reply from Mertoun; he breathed hard, but said nothing.

"You have been betrayed into this detestable treason by a woman as artful as she is unscrupulous. You expected to fly with her—had even procured passports for that purpose. Your purpose. You suppose she is at this moment impatiently awaiting you. If you would learn how miserably you have been duped—how little you are for any thing beyond effecting her own objects—I may give you the opportunity. Will you accept it?"

"Here!" The exclamation burst from Mertoun's lips in spite of himself.

"Here. But you will not be touch this bell to produce her. Go into this closet and I will do so-steps! give me the documents you have been copying this evening and its duplicates. Do you hesitate? Could I not have you searched if I chose?" Convinced of the truth of this, and in sheer perplexity withholding of one additional evidence of his treason from the already overwhelming mass, Basil Morton handed over the papers, and the closet door was closed upon him.

"Now enter the closet, leave the door ajar, and listen." And the speaker sounded a silver bell that stood on the table.

In response to the audience to the signal, the door opened, and two persons appeared—Lieutenant Allen and Mrs. Heyward. The latter was dressed in walking costume, including her bonnet and veil. She looked as handsome as ever, but defiant and startled. The keen-faced man rose and addressed her to a seat.

"You were desirous of an interview with me, Madam, I believe?" he inquired.

"I came hither three hours ago for that purpose," she said, haughtily, "and was very much vexed I have been detained a prisoner in this house—in your custody, sir! I suppose on my word, Sir, I carry matters with a high hand! I had, as is well known, no favorable opinion of your Black Republican Government, but was prepared to be had dispensed with the formality of even a lettre de cachet before depriving people of their liberty! When next, I wonder?"

The person she addressed, smiling shrewdly, and apparently not heeding her words, said that meanwhile made up some of the papers obtained from Mertoun into a packet, which he handed to Allen. "This, Lieutenant," he said, "and see that these are sent off at once. Now, Madam," as the door closed upon the officer, "I am at your service."

In the first place, what am I to understand from the sentiments you have expressed? Could I have been subjected?"

"You should you understand but that, unable to grant Mrs. Heyward an interview at the time of her visit, I was unwilling to deprive myself of that pleasure, and so made sure of it."

The lady looked sharply at him.

"Is that all, Sir?"

"Not exactly. We may detain you longer."

"I am a Southern woman, and in favor of Southern Rights. But I have never plotted against my country, nor entertained treasonable sentiments. Is it for that that I am kidnapped in a manner as atrocious as it is illegal? Am I to consider myself under arrest, Sir?"

"If you please. Hadn't you better sit down and talk the thing over? I am at your service in case of disdain and aversion. "Well, just as you like. From your note, sent to me immediately after your arrival, I supposed you had something to say about your husband."

"My name, Sir!"

"Your cousin! Oh, come, come! don't tell me! I know all about it." And the speaker nodded confidently. "It was prudent, of course, to sink him and become a fascinating widow while squinting in the camp of the enemy. The wife of Captain Heyward, of the Confederate army, might have found it difficult to retain her position in society, not to suggest more invidious reasons. We have known this little secret all along, and, I hope, sanctioned your visit to Washington in the public interest."

The handsome Virginian had eyed her interlocutor closely during the above address, as if desirous of ascertaining what serious purpose lay hid beneath the tone of raillery he adopted. She now seated herself, abandoned her assumption of pride and indignation, and spoke seriously enough:

"You speak truth, Mr. ——; I acknowledge it. My husband is a prisoner, I hear."

"Yes. He was captured in a skirmish between pickets this morning. You have very correct information."

"I wish to solicit his release."

The person addressed elevated his eyebrows and shrugged his shoulders.

"You will have to apply to the Secretary of War," said he, "or to Mr. Lincoln."

"If I had it in my power to do the Government some service adequate to the request I make, might it not avail, first, to free me from the detention you have threatened; second, to procure an early exchange for Captain Hayward with one of the Federal officers now imprisoned at Richmond?"

"Perhaps. Of what nature is the service you speak of?"

"The denunciation of a traitor in the employ of the Government."

"Indeed? I am afraid there are too many of them! Of course I can make no promises."

"The person I allude to has access to documents of vital national importance. He is in secret communication with the Confederates."

"That is important. Are you sure of it?"

"I can prove it."

"If it is a case of which we have no knowledge or suspicion, I might be warranted in promising my influence—nothing more—to secure what you ask, always provided that you can be identified as indicated."

"You are exacting, Sir." And Mrs. Hayward drew herself up imperiously. "I can keep my knowledge to myself."

"To be sure you can; and we can keep both you and the captain where it will be of little service to either of you."

The lady bit her lip, considered a while, and replied, "You may throw me into prison, but that will not help you to discover what I have spoken of. Without me you can not do it!"

"Perhaps so, perhaps yes! It is about young Merman?" Mrs. Hey ward did her best not to look conscious, but her face betrayed her. "Come, I see it is; better tell me all about it."

She needed more persuasion, but feeling that his knowledge and her detention would assuredly end Merman's career in the interest of the rebels, and being desirous of making the test of the case for herself and Ashangi, at length consented. And the concealed listener overheard the detail of his treachery by the tips that had lured him to it. She ended with a proposal to verify the truth of her statement by his arrest, supposing him to be awaiting her arrival at her residence.

"We will not go so far as that," said the keenfaced man, who had rapidly noted down the salient points of the narrative. "Have the goodness to open the door of that closet!"

"Sir?"

But the repetition of the request was needless. Stepping from his hiding-place, the Secretary confronted his tempter and betrayer, with a new assumption of strong nerve, but she rose from her chair, recoiled, flushed scarlet, turned deathly pale, and then stood with compressed lips, clenched hands, and heaving breast, mutely defying him.

* * * * *

Half an hour afterward Mrs. Heyward was removed to the house popularly known in Washington by the sobriquet of Fort Lafayette, where she still remains. In the Army of the Potomac, under a feigned name, is a private soldier suspected of exposing, by a glorious death in the service of his country, the past treason of Basil Merioun.

Bulwer's New Novel, complete.

A STRANGE STORY.

A Novel.

By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart.,

AUTHOR OF

"What will He do with It?" "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," "Paul Clifford," &c., &c., &c.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

Price 25 Cents.

Who is there uniting in one person the imagination, the passion, the humor, the energy, the knowledge of the heart, the artist-like eye, the originality, the fancy, and the learning of Edward Lytton Bulwer? In a vivid style, in profundity and a Gothic massiveness of thought—in style—in a calm certainty and definitiveness of purpose—in finishing—and, above all, in the power of controlling and regulating, by criticism, his illimitable faculties of mind, he is unequaled—he is unapproached.—EDGAR A. POE.

To Bulwer, the author of "Pelham," "The Caxtons," and "My Novel," we assign the highest place among novelists writers of fiction. There is always power in the creations of his fancy; he is always polished, witty, learned. Since the days of Scott were ended, there is, in our apprehension, no pinnacle so high as that on which we hang our wreath to Bulwer; like the Roman emperor, a prince among his equals, the first of his rank.—Blackwood's Magazine.

OUR "FAMILY SEWING MACHINE" having attained a well established and flattering reputation, as being one of all machines yet introduced the one best adapted to all kinds of family sewing, and having been improved upon in its rule beyond our greatest anticipations, which is, that for three months our orders have been ahead of our capacity to supply, we would now announce that we have increased our manufacturing facilities, so that from this time forth we shall be enabled to supply orders on demand.

In the changes brought about by the war, no one thing has played a more important part than the SEWING MACHINE. Without it three-fourths of our soldiers would today be clothed in anything but "Military Costume." All over the land army clothing has been the work required of our patriotic women, and many have they reported in their content to make only so many garments as their "Family Machines" could turn out, and not to use "Sewing Machines" to their aid, and by it have relied on the soldiers' COATS, PANTS, and SHIRTS, as a good profit and astonishing to themselves. Knowing that this work could not long continue, many thousands of prudent housewives were careful to select the machine of all others, which would do the heavy every work, and when done with that, then to be used as their family Machine, and in selecting one of the

FINKLE & LYON SEWING MACHINE CO.'S

FAMILY MACHINES, with which you may sew from the finest cambric to the heaviest cloth, without change of feed, needle, or tension—they have not been disappointed.

Thus having developed the adaptability of our machine for all kinds of work, we have made another step in advance, and by several important changes in our No. 2, MANUFACTURING, and No. 3, SHOE AND LEATHER MACHINES, which we confidently claim to be the "Best Machines" ever before produced, saving the contest Tailor thread with as much ease as the common cotton—and when required may be used to do the very finest comfortable work, with 150 or 200 cotton—thus combining in one compact form, every quality required in either a FAMILY or MANUFACTURING MACHINE.

We have had our Machine before the public long enough to establish their reputation. Dozens of others have started with flying colors "to have fallen by the wayside," and "soon the places that knew them will know them no more." Step by step has the Finkle & Lyon Machine won its way to public favor; its success is established, and heretofore our aim shall be, as it has in the past been, to still further improve, simplify, and reform the cost of our machines. We shall in a few days issue a new price list. For further particulars address

THE SURRENDER OF FORT DONELSON, FEBRUARY 16, 1862.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

CAPTURE OF FORT DONELSON.

We illustrate on this preceding pages a thrilling scene in the attack upon Fort Donelson, which took place on 14th, 15th, and 16th inst., the fort surrendering to General Grant on the morning of 16th. The victory was complete, resulting, as it did, in the capture of 15,000 rebel troops, an immense number of war materials, and the prisoners of Generals A. S. Johnston and Buckner. General Floyd marched off with his brigade of five thousand men on Saturday night. A special dispatch from Fort Donelson says:

The forces were about equal in numbers, but the rebels had all the advantages of position, being well fortified on two business hills, with their new fort on the highest one in place of ground. From the foot of their intrenchments the hills and ground descended quite perpendicularly to the river. Their fortifications on the side back from the river were at the foot of the hills. The river, at this point, is the centre of the fortifications, where it came down in the river, commanded the heavy guns.

The rebels were sure of securing their retreat by land and against reinforcements, as they could easily have held a position on the road to Dover to prevent it.

The fighting began on Thursday morning, the 13th inst., by our gunboats. The engagement lasted all day, and was not very severe, as the rebels kept under cover. Friday morning, at daylight, General Smith, with his brigade, consisting of the Eighth, Thirteenth, Twenty-sixth, Thirty-first, and Thirty-third Illinois regiments; Schwartz's and Dresser's batteries; met was General Wallace's brigade of the Eleventh, Twelfth, Fourth, and Seventh Indiana regiments. These three brigades occupied General M'Clernand's left wing, and lost the brunt of the battle.

It was found that the enemy was concentrating his main force to turn our right flank, which was drawn back by order of ammunition, and in the confusion of getting the reinforcements, wheeling about left to left. Another division, which had stood its ground manfully for three hours, retired, but was stopped and the left wing Generals Smith ordered General Smith to move forward his division to the position from which it had retired.

This movement was executed with great alacrity, and the shouts of our daring soldiery were heard, and the old flag displayed from within the enemy's intrenchments.

General Grant then sent word to General M'Clernand and Commodore Foote that General Smith had carried the enemy's intrenchments, ordering their forces to move forward and storm the works on the right. The gallant Wallace's brigade—the Eleventh Indiana, Eighth Missouri, and Seventh regiments—were pushed forward into position, and company A, of the Chicago Light Artillery, was planted in the road, and in the middle of the enemy we were in retreat, some yelling out of their works into the road, like lunatics, and others in a helter-skelter way, to escape into their ranks, slaughtering scenes of them.

Simultaneously with this the infantry commenced to fire at will, and the rebels went pell-mell back into their works in the greatest confusion. Our troops rushed on to the very edge of the enemy's intrenchments, but could not break in, and so were then thrown forward, and as the shades of night came on we were in a position to rest our troops in a simultaneous attack to be made on Sunday morning.

Some of our best officers and men had fallen in the long hour. Hardly a man that went over the field after the battle but discovered some comrade he knew dead. In fact three lieutenant-colonels, and at least one-quarter of all the other officers were wounded or killed.

During Saturday night a contraction of all our lines was made for a simultaneous assault on the enemy's works, and orders were given by General Grant to take the enemy at the point of the bayonet. Every man was to fall in at the fifty-seventh Illinois on the extreme right.

At daylight the advance was made, not when the full light of day broke forth white flags were hung in many places on the enemy's works.

An officer at a convenient point took down a white flag, and attached it to our arms and immediately sent in the morning.

The following correspondence passed between the commanders:

GENERAL BUCKNER TO GENERAL GRANT.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FORT DONELSON, February 16, 1862.

SIR,—In the present condition of affairs at this station, I propose to the commanding officer of the United States forces the appointment of commissioners to agree upon terms of capitulation of the forces at this post; and in order to save time, I would suggest an armistice until two o'clock to-day.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. BUCKNER,
Brigadier-General C. S. Army.

To Brigadier-General U. S. Grant, commanding United States forces near Fort Donelson.

GENERAL GRANT'S REPLY TO GENERAL BUCKNER.

HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP NEAR DONELSON,
FORT DONELSON, February 16, 1862.

To General S. B. Buckner:

SIR,—Your note of this date, proposing an armistice and the appointment of commissioners to settle the terms of capitulation, is just received.

No terms, except unconditional and immediate surrender, can be accepted.

I propose to move immediately on your works.

I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT,
Brigadier-General U. S. Army.

GENERAL BUCKNER ACCEPTS THE TERMS AND SURRENDERS.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DONELSON, TENNESSEE, February 16, 1862.

Brigadier-General U. S. Grant, U. S. A.:

SIR,—The distribution of the forces under my command, forbids my entertaining the change of commissioners, and the overwhelming force under your command, compels me, notwithstanding the inhumane character of your propositions, to accept the ungenerous and unchivalrous terms which you offer.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, SIR, your ob't s'v't,

S. B. BUCKNER,
Brigadier-General C. S. A.

Our fleet was soon in the enemy's camp, when the rebel officers gave up their swords.

Immediately on the receipt of the news of the capture of Fort Donelson by the gallant Grant, he was sent the name of General Grant to the President for promotion to a Major-Generalship.

OUR ARMY IN KENTUCKY.

On page 141 we give a couple of illustrations of the progress of the war in Kentucky. One of them, from the pencil of our artist, Mr. H. Mosler, represents GENERAL MITCHELL'S DIVISION crossing GREEN RIVER ON 10TH OCTOBER. The strategic movements of General Buell had already rendered the rebel stronghold at Bowling Green untenable, and General Mitchell has by this time occupied it. General Mitchell is the well-known gentleman-soldier by education, his heart and soul are in the war, and he will do his duty.

Our other illustration represents the CAMP OF THE FOURTH KENTUCKY REGIMENT ON THE CUMBERLAND, lately occupied by the 17th Tennessee under General Zollicoffer. Mr. Oscar D. Kraus, who sends us the sketch, writes: "I send you a sketch of a portion of Zollicoffer's camp, recently occupied by the 17th Tennessee Regiment (rebel), now held by the 4th Kentucky (Union), commanded by Colonel Speed Th. Fry, who killed Zollicoffer at the recent battle. We took possession of this camp on the 20th, the day after the battle, the rebels having fled during the night, leaving every thing behind them."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1862.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

THE capture of Fort Donelson, with 15,000 men, including both the Generals Buckner and Johnston, marks the decisive battle of the culminating point in the struggle between the United States Government and the malcontents. At the same time we record Buell, with 80,000 men, is pressing upon the Cumberland River; while General Grant, with 50,000, and Flag-officer Foote, with a gun-boat and mail-clad fleet, are ascending the same stream from the head at Dover. Rumor states that the remnant of the rebel army from Bowling Green, and that of the Bowling Green army, have taken refuge at Clarksville, and seem disposed to make a stand there. If they do, they will but hasten forward the fate of the army which has just surrendered. The events of the past week have rendered as indispensable as the right reversed, civil South-ern Tennessee rivers, of Nashville and all Northern Tennessee, and of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. Wherever we meet the enemy we shall be three to one, and by far superior to them in equipments, commissariat, clothing, transportation, and arms.

The fate of Columbus, Memphis, and consequently New Orleans, is now sealed. It is hardly probable that the right reversed, civil South-ern Polk will wait to be caught in the trap he has built for himself at Columbus. If he does, he will be caught in the trap, and all he does without firing a gun. If he evacuates his present post, the rebels themselves admit that they are not defend any line this side of the Mississippi. One Union army of enormous strength will advance on Memphis from Nashville, while another will advance on it from the river. Foote will drive Price before them through Arkansas, and both will meet on the Mississippi in time to co-operate with Farragut's fleet in mortar and mortar-fleet. Unless some unforeseen accident occurs the whole Mississippi will be ours, from the Gulf to the Falls of St. Anthony.

Meanwhile, Burnside is cutting off the retreat of the Virginia army through North Carolina, and making for the line of the Weldon road. He was at the mouth of the Roanoke the people of Weldon fled from their houses. Norfolk should be in our possession at the present writing.

Simultaneously, Dupont and Sherman are moving against Savannah, and Commodore Porter's fleet is on the way to Mobile and New Orleans.

Against such a combination of forces working together on such a plan, the rebels are hard set for it.

ABOLITION AND FREE TRADE.

THE latest foreign canard about this country is to the effect that the Confederate envoys have offered to purchase the recognition of the South-ern Confederacy by assenting to a permanent free trade for fifty years, and by decreeing the emancipation of every negro born at the South after the ensuing year. British journals gravely discuss the proposal, and many of them declare that it should be accepted. Some of our more malignant foes speculate upon the probability of the proposed scheme of emancipation, and pronounce the rebels in advance of the Government of the United States on the subject of slavery.

We hazard nothing, however, in asserting that no such proposal has been or will be made. It is impossible at the present time to suppose that emancipation is desirable or possible at any future time. Every leader of the rebellion has placed himself or herself on record in favor-ial slavery of the negro race, as their natural and normal condition, and as the only condition upon which the white race can be safe and rich with the black. In the emphatic language of Vice-President Alexander H. Stephens, the revolution of 1861 established the first time in the pacity of white men to govern themselves; the revolution of 1861 is to establish, for all future time, the incapacity of the negro for self-rule, and the inalienable right of the former to the service of the latter. Slavery is, in a word, the chief and vital aim of the present rebellion. It was begun to prevent the restriction of slavery within its present limits. It is carried on to secure, protect, and extend slavery. If it had been successful, it would have consolidated slavery and postponed emancipation for many generations. To believe that any Southern envoys have proposed to surrender slavery for any consideration whatever is to suppose them guilty of unnecessarily giving up the fight, when they are fighting for, and yielding gratuitously the whole point at issue.

Thirty years ago there were consistent and conscientious emancipationists at the South. Charles J. Faulkner, of Virginia, the rebel leader, was one of them. But in those days cotton was an insignificant article of produce, and male adult negroes were not worth over $200 in the market. Slaveholding was unprofitable. Since then the extension of cotton culture, and a foreign demand for slave produce, have risen the value of negroes to gangs of $225,000,000 per annum, have completely crushed out the old sentiment of good South-ern men on the subject of slavery; themselves the commanded the aid of religion and morals, and it is now deemed both impious and disrespectful in good Christian society to question the propriety of slaveholding. If the culture of cotton were abandoned, or its consumption checked, the old sentiment of Washington and Jefferson would revive at the South, and schemes of emancipation would be mooted. But so long as the British manufacturer of the South, and the world is clothed with it, no Southern man of any mark will venture to contemplate the question of slavery, and no political newspapers and statesmen will expend their best efforts in bolstering up the institution with texts from the Bible and news from Africa. The British Government are much more likely to propose to Europe to establish a mercantile Government over the Confederate States in Europe than to do, in-stead, than to admit the possibility of extinguishing slavery at any future period.

The Messrs. Mason, Slidell, Mann, Mason, and Slidell may have talked about free trade in quite likely. But, after all, what have they to offer in this connection? When the Constitution of the Confederate was framed it was proposed that the public revenue would be derived from direct taxation, and the slaveholders were induced voted to accept this form of taxation on condition of paying taxes in proportion. In the course of a few years it was discovered that a 5 per-centum tariff of duties on foreign imports would, with the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, provide revenue enough; and the idea of direct taxation was abandoned. It is not believed till now. The Government under which the Southern States have prospered so wonderfully during the last thirty years has been almost entirely supported by duties on imports levied at three Northern ports—New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. The Southern States would never to have paid any taxes at all.

If, as an independent power, the rebels propose to dispense with customs duties, what revenue now are they to mine revenue? They have already tried one plan—an export duty on cotton. Foreigners will not have that; but they will have the Morrill Tariff. It is literally making foreigners support their government. As to direct taxes, they have never paid yet, and when a direct tax on slaves was hinted at in the South Carolina Convention, the member who made the suggestion was silenced on the spot. In Alabama, about a year ago, a war tax was imposed by the Legislature, but it was found impossible to collect it. It would seem that the foreigners, before committing themselves to the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, would require, some guarantee that its citizens would pay direct taxes to support their Government. Without such a guarantee, a promise to admit foreign goods free of duty for fifty years would de-prive of any revenue to be more honored in the breach than the observance. What guarantee could the rebels offer?

We have never believed that foreigners would interfere in our contest if we performed our part with vigor and promptness. But the British autocracy would like to see this country divided and ruined, because we are a rival to England, and because the ruin of this republic would delay the progress of democracy in England for many years. The class of people who are represented by the London Times, the Morning Post, and the London Herald were evidently disappointed at the pacific solution of the Mason-Slidell affair. But there is a limit to the capacity of these malignant enemies of the Union; and so long as France continues to be guided by the grand principles of right and honor which have always marked her foreign policy, that limit lies this side of war. It is not in the power of the Southern envoys to make any temptation to Europe which can overcome the principles of France, or the fears and the necessities of England.

THE LOUNGER.

WHERE IS BURNSIDE?

One of the weapons of the dark day at Bull Run, is that when M'Dowell came in sight of the enemy's batteries, and saw that bloody work was at hand, he rose in his imperiority and asked, most coolly, "Where is Burnside?" as if instinctively turning toward the man whom he knew to be a skilled soldier.

That day Burnside, with the Rhode Island line, the New York 71st, and the other troops of his command, gave brave account of themselves. The months pass, and the whole country, not a single General, asks earnestly "Where is Burnside?" And from the roar of spoalling wintry surges, from the thick smoke of sharp battle, from the heart of the enemy's country and the rear of his position, comes the quiet voice of the leader, "Here, where I meant to be!"

The men he leads are men in earnest. They went to fight and to conquer. They knew that the terrible chance of battle was for every one of them. But they knew also that they were but the van-guard; that all were soldiers in this war whether they had marched or were only waiting—that the country must be watched closely and from discomforture itself—and the knowledge cheered the eyes that were fixed upon success, and strengthened the hands that were armed to secure the victory of Roanoke.

And now if you ask again "Where is Burnside?" the answer rings from the lips of millions of grateful countrymen, "Fast in our hearts forever!"

FOOTING UP THE REBEL ACCOUNT.

Ber while the South wind brings us the welcome music of victory, the North wind is not less eloquent. The gallant capture of Fort Henry by Foote's brave little boats that "moved to within a hundred yards of the batteries"—the battle or victory that paled the stern resistance—the pressing forward of Buell's army, and the rapid march-ing into Alabama—the welcome of the old flag along the shore, as if summer had come again: the manner Wolf-Burnside and securing the best hearts winter-bound with doubt—the enlistments of men by the half score—all this is rapid foliage: That gun-boat Conestoga pushing into the heart of the rebel section seems like a firm ray of down pierc-ing the thick leaves.

Before these words are read there must be news from Fort Donelson; from Price, perhaps, and from more than one point in the line of great battle at Bowling Green, or at any point, and the Western army be again in motion. Meanwhile the Confederates can hardly help feeling the shock to the very heart of their treason. They must begin to think that Secession is a fearful mistake, if they then remain? Richmond will be directly threatened. The line of the Virginia Central will be cut from the border States; the movements upon the sea-board will clear Virginia; the active rebellion will be shut up in the Gulf States, and the whole loyal-hearted region of Europe will be stayed. Then Victory must be organized. Then we shall have to look practically to the question, How shall we be made permanent?

Meanwhile the nation is beginning to feel its strength, as it has long known its purpose. Conscious strength is itself an inspiration. The army of the nation will be more than ever filled with every victory. It is alive and glowing along the whole line. Pamlico Sound rejoins to the Tennessee:

"And now the answer from mountain to mountain."

Back to the joyous Aye that call to her island!"

—Thus much was written before this Tuesday the 25th of February—when the whole country came pouring in from the West. Let it stand. While the hurry-drops are falling, and the country rings to the type which were to tell of our hopes and anticipations, the telegraph was clicking off the news that they had come true. Abundant news! In Kentucky, Bowling Green abandoned; in Missouri, Price in full retreat, with our forces in hot pursuit; in Tennessee, Nash-ville abandoned evacuated. What a dispatch night tot Grant have sent to Washington! "We have won the battle of Fort Donelson." Four Generals, a score of Colonels, Majors and Captains by the hundred, fifteen thousand men prisoners!" And now, as we write, we hear the shouts of the newsboys announcing the capture of Savannah. We shall not be surprised to-morrow whether the report is true, but our readers will know before these words meet their eyes.

NATIONAL MORALITY.

THE reports of and about the results of the labor of the Secretary of the Treasury, the speeches of the speeches of Mr. Dawes and Mr. Van Wyck, will hardly fail to show the most sanguine man that our problem has not been entirely solved in the question of the despatch attendants and the most threatening commercial crisis. Party heat may prevent or newspapers, will of course turn the facts to party account. They will endeavor to make it appear that the success in the management of our resources belongs peculiarly to the administration of the party that is in power. But the evidence will be partially successful when it is remembered that all those who have profited by the corruption belong to that party—but not to it.

These revelations do not indicate a partisan but a national evil. The difficulty did not begin with the war, but with the long prosperity that so greatly increasing opportunity. The close observer of our social life for the last twenty years must have asked himself constantly the question whether our mental and moral education kept counterpacing pace with the increasing facilities of great prosperity. A commercial nation is always in danger of being overwhelmed unless it is willing to sell them for peace and high profits. Virtue is in the old story and in universal experience the essential property; and the saints come out of the cottages, not the palaces.

The most dangerous symptom in our condition now, as for many years past, is the want of a high moral tone. For the moment a nation which is ruled by the rules will lose faith in principle it is precisely in the condition of a man who does the same thing. The Rule of Three and the law of gravity are governmental compared with the moral laws. Consequently, whenever that nation, whether from ignorance of their value or from long familiarity, or from that sodden spiritual stupidity which springs from incessant devotion to personal advantage, actually disbelieves in the fundamental laws; and, for the ostensible reason that men and parties are equally knavish, but from the real reason that they exclusively regard their immediate individual interest, connives at injustice in the form and at moral sophistication in the matter is "it certainly raised as a liar and a swindler who is at the same time a coward.

In the present case we have, of course, the right to set against the revelations of reports in individual cases the spectacle of the generous and general rising of the people. Moreover, we may justly add to that the universal public conviction that the chief officers of state are eminently men of pure hands. That knaves should swarm upon the chance of contracts is not surprising. The only sadness is that the old suspicion of a very wide demoralization should be revived by the apparent implication of men hitherto beyond a whisper of suspicion. For there is no man and no nation so 'cute that they can be saved without faith.

A QUEER MISTAKE.

A RESOLUTION was lately introduced into our Legislature to invite a clergyman to address the Assembly upon the Great Rebellion. A worthy member objected, saying that he would very gladly listen to a clergyman upon the subject of Christ's Sermon on the Mount; but when clergymen interfered in politics they transcended their duty—or as the report has it, "when they came out of the pulpit to preach politics to the Assembly, they unduly interfered with the members in the discharge of their constitutional duties!"

This is in the reports of the Assembly and not in Rabelais.

But when were the clergymen disfranchised? When did they cease to be American citizens? When did they lose the right to speak upon public affairs which every American, of whatever profession, justly prizes as so characteristic a right of our system?

It was Mr. Stetson who is reported to have made this extraordinary objection. He did not urge that the Assembly had not time—that if it listened to one member's friend it could hardly courteously refuse another's—that the clergyman and his friends could appoint a time and place for his address and invite the members who wished to hear it to come, all of which were obvious remarks upon such a proposition. But he took the ground that the Assembly ought not to invite one of their fellow-citizens to address them upon the state of the country, because his address would be an interference with the discharge of their constitutional duties, and for the reason that he was a clergyman!

But suppose he had been a lawyer, or a doctor, or a merchant, or a shoemaker, or a manufacturer, or a leather dealer, or a salt dealer, or a farmer, or a blacksmith, would his address have been equally impertinent? And if not, why not. Has an American citizen any more interest in the welfare of the country because he is a horse-jockey or a lawyer than he would have if he wer a clergyman? And if a clergyman, although a citizen and as much interested in the nation as anybody ought to stick to his profession, so ought every other citizen, no more and no less And if so, what is Mr. Stetson doing in the Assembly

That gentleman's profession is not announced. But if he be a lawyer, why does he not stay in court or his office, and talk of the statutes at large or the Pandects of Justinian? If he be a shoemaker, why does he not sti k to his last? If a farmer, to his plow? If a carp nter, to his plane? If a merchant, to his ledger? If a mason, to his trowel? If a doctor, to his pills? Because a clergyman preaches sermons and takes the charge of a parish is he to shut his eyes and mouth upon the National welfare, in lu..ng his own and that of each of his parishioners?

Mr. Stetson has made a ludicr us, but a not infrequent mistake. He is selected by his fellow-citizens of all professions, and leaves his own special business to fulfill a duty which is just as incumbent upon every clergyman as it is upon every lawyer or mechanic—the duty of practical interest in public affairs. If he and his associates think they can be assisted by the thoughts of any citizen, whatever his calling, they can not do wrong to hear him. His speech would be no interference, it would be an assistance If the citizen be foolish or dull, that is enough, don't ask him. But to say that the Assembly ought not to hear him because he is a clergyman, is to declare that you have yourself no business to be speaking to them, for you must have some profession, and every man in every other profession is your exact political peer.

MAKING CITIZENS SOLDIERS.

LITTLE Rhode Island was the first State to offer, through her Governor, her aid to the Government last April. She has sent some of the best and bravest soldiers that have marched. Her boys were at Bull Run; they are at Port Royal, and in Pamlico Sound. The blood of Rhode Island has not forgotten that Greene in the Revolution and Perry in 1814 were Rhode Islanders. The heart of Rhode Island will nev r forget the younger he oes who face de. di r foe to-d. y.

The intelligence with which t mall State has regarded he rebellion from the eginning is manifested in n w bill whi h has been introduced into its L gislature abolishing the distinction between enrolled and active militia. Rhode Island now proposes to say, a.l Rhode Islanders capable of bearing arms must be made practically proficient in military knowledge and ready for all events. As went Rhode Island last spring so went the loyal States. As she goes now so will they.

For henceforth we are to be a military republic. Hitherto we have made a curious but a natural mistake. We have thought that our situation and our system enabled us safely to dispense with arms. We are now taught that it is our character and education which allows us to bear them safely. Our situation and our system, united with our condition and education, will secure us a permanent but not a pusillanimous peace. The possession of fire-arms and skill in their use promote war only among a barbarous or semi-civilized or oppressed people. To a nation of peaceful pursuits, of an equally prosperous political condition, and of general intelligence, they are simply a guarantee, not a temptation.

Every State may wisely follow the example of Rhode Island, as every college and school may follow that of the University of Michigan which contemplates a military department. As there is no restriction upon the possession of fire-arms in this country, so the practical knowledge of their use in military combinations should be made universal. Nobody probably expects an immediate peace. Nobody supposes that, when a tempest so long gathering as our civil war at length bursts with a fury that threatens the very existence of the nation, its consequences are to be smoothed away by a surrender. The rebels may be conquered. They may surrender. But hate is not vanquished by bayonets. The whole rebel section must long have military occupation, or be readily commanded by military superiority.

A military nation, also, speaks to foreign powers with significance. Its whispers are a breeze. Its words may be a tempest. We have sometimes congratulated ourselves that we knew nothing of military science and had little military skill. But it is not the loss of any knowledge, it is the subordination and application of all that makes wisdom.

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITH THEM?

"WHAT do you gentlemen who are so clamorous for releasing the slaves of rebels propose to do with them?" is a question constantly asked. "It is very easy to cry emancipate! emancipate! but what is your panacea for those who are emancipated?"

The question, in itself, is fair and timely—although it is often asked contemptuously, and is intended to wither any further remark.

The answer is, first of all, that something must be done. At the present time we have several thousands of persons within our lines who were lately slaves. They can not be returned to rebel masters. They can not be retained as slaves. They can not be left to themselves. The Government is charged with the responsibility of their care. They must be fed, clothed, and educated, and labor must be given them. In fact, the released slaves are the pupils of the Government.

The question is of such scope, and the necessity is so urgent, that Congress should at once provide the means of dealing with the actual facts. Since the advance of our arms upon rebellious soil inevitably releases so many, it is useless to suffer the facts to be winked out of sight. Congress should at once declare that the slaves of rebels are free. That would at once determine a policy. The grave decision would not be left to the whim of a General, and the released slaves would not be forced to believe that any kind of slavery was better than such freedom as leaves them naked and starving.

That being settled, a sub-department of the Interior should be created for the special purpose of carrying into operation all the details necessary for the proper disposition of the slaves thus released. The exportation of a people, if more numerous than the Acadians, is not practicable. Yet if any wished to colonize within our own territory or elsewhere they should be assisted. Centres of operations, under sufficient military protection, should be established, and strict order maintained. Then laws looking to their advance to citizenship, at such graduated times as should be found desirable, should follow. They would be at first like a mass of rude immigrants; but after due lapse of time they would be quite as competent citizens as many other immigrants.

The difficulties of emancipation are always upon the side of the slaveholders, not of the slaves. The impediments in the West Indies were not the incompetence of the slave but the injustice of the master. The friction with us will be in the same place.

The question can not be deferred, for it is here. The slaves already with us must be cared for, and the system that properly cares for thousands should be adapted to hundreds of thousands and millions. It is confessedly the gravest point of the war—so grave that most people wish to shut their eyes upon it, hoping that Providence will settle it.

Providence will settle it, as it settles all things, by our hearts and brains.

A STRANGE STORY.

BULWER has well named his last exciting story, which is now published with the illustrations. It is a strange story. All the weird, mysterious influences that affect the human imagination, and fascinate certain scholars, surrounding daily life with an atmosphere of romance and wonder, a half-miraculous world, are used as the machinery of the tale, and with the skill of a master. It belongs to the same class of romances as his "Zanoni," which is the most highly wrought and passionate of all.

Bulwer is fully aware that great rivals, of a later date than he, are in the field; and he does not hesitate to measure swords with them. The great host of readers that acknowledge the spell of his enchantment will feel with delight the new wave of his wand, and follow with delight the fortunes of a man who seemed to have found the elixir of youth.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LENITY PROPERLY REBUKED.

A TELEGRAM from Naples states that the brigand chief, Chiavone, "has been deprived by the Bourbon Committee at Rome of the command of the brigands, for having disobeyed instructions by shooting prisoners." Telegrams are usually incomplete; but we understand that this merciful manner of murdering the prisoners has given great offense at the Vatican, and that the successor to Chiavone has imperative instructions either to burn his captives, or to put them to death gradually, in the Chinese fashion. As the Pope justly remarks, "these are not times for sentimental mercy to the enemies of the Church."

DIFFERENT VIEWS AT DIFFERENT TIMES.—Much as we may have hated a man before, it is very strange what a very different view we take of him the moment we are going to ask a favor of him!

FRIENDLY ADVICE TO THE POPE.—"Stand not upon the order of your going, but go at once."

STYLES OF CONSOLATION.

A MAN'S.—"Well, I'll tell you what you must do."
A WOMAN'S.—"Ah! I told you how it would be."

THE PRUSSIAN CROWN AND CUSHION.—The Kreuz Zeitung reports a speech made the other day by the King of Prussia, in which his Majesty said: "My basis will, however, be the same, and will be inviolable. I have received my crown from the altar." What has King William's receipt of his crown from the altar to do with the inviolability of his basis? What relation does his basis bear to his crown? Is not the one the direct opposite to the other? If the King of Prussia puts his crown upon his basis, what, we should like to know, does he put his hat upon?

THE STAMP OF IMPRUDENCE.—The imprudent man carries postage stamps in his pocket-book, the prudent man never does—for he knows well enough that he can always borrow of the man who has them.

It is as uncomfortable to feel like scolding and have nothing to scold about, as it is to be hungry and have nothing to eat.

Good sayings always suffer by repetition; good deeds never do.

An auctioneer while selling a stock of jewelry, describing a pair of jet ear-rings to a very respectable company of ladies, exclaimed, very earnestly, "Indeed, if my wife were a widow, I would positively buy them for her."

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, February 11, in the Senate, a resolution of the New York Chamber of Commerce, in favor of the immediate passage of the Treasury Note bill, and pledging the support of the merchants of New York to the Government, was presented; also a petition from the Chamber on the subject of postal reform. A joint resolution was adopted that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the House of Representatives on Washington's birth-day, the 22d of February, and that the President, the members of the Cabinet, the foreign representatives, the officers of the army and navy, and others, be invited to attend, and that Washington's Farewell Address be read. A bill authorizing the banks of the District of Columbia to issue notes of less than five dollars was referred. Senator Sumner offered a series of resolutions declaring that the revolted States have committed felo de se, and that their relations as members of the United States no longer exist; that their allegiance has been severed, and the Federal Government owes no obligation to any pretended State Government usurping certain territory; that individuals occupying such territory owe allegiance to the General Government only, and the General Government to the individuals; therefore persons heretofore held as slaves may look henceforth to the General Government for protection as individuals. A motion to lay them on the table was carried by a vote of 21 to 15, Senator Sumner voting aye. The bill making appropriations for completing sea-coast and lake fortifications was then taken up and discussed till, upon coming to a vote upon a motion, it was discovered that there was no quorum present, whereupon the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate's amendments to the bill appropriating ten millions of dollars for the construction of twenty iron-clad steam gun-boats were concurred in, so the bill only requires the President's approval to become a law. Mr. F. A. Conkling offered a preamble and resolution setting forth that the army countersign was known to the rebels on the Potomac on the day the steamer Pensacola passed down the river, before it was communicated to the Union forces; that information of Union military and naval movements is frequently communicated in advance to the enemy, under circumstances justifying a suspicion of treachery on the part of persons in the service of the Government; and that the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War investigate these charges and report thereon. The resolution was adopted. A bill establishing a Department of Agriculture was introduced. The case of Mr. Segar, who claimed a seat as representative from the First District of Virginia, was resumed, and upon coming to a vote the House, by a vote of 85 to 40, adopted the report of the Committee on Elections, declaring Mr. Segar not entitled to a seat.

On Wednesday, February 12, in the Senate, the bill providing for punishment, by fine and imprisonment, of persons convicted selling spirituous liquors to Indians, was passed. The bill appropriating nearly seven millions of dollars for the completion of fortifications was also passed. Bills providing for a reorganization of the Navy Department, and for the appointment of a Warden of the District jail, were introduced. The Treasury Note bill was taken up, and speeches made by Senators Fessenden, Collamer, and Howe. The Senate Finance Committee's amendment, restoring the clause making the interest on the public debt payable in coin, was adopted. An amendment, that the Treasury notes issued in July be received in payment of public dues, was adopted. An amendment setting apart the proceeds of the public lands, and confiscated property, and duties on imported goods, as a special fund for the payment of the interest of the debt in bonds and notes of the United States, and for a sinking fund, was adopted. The amendment striking out the provision that the notes be exchanged for bonds bearing seven per cent. interest, was adopted. Several verbal amendments of the Finance Committee were adopted. Senator Fessenden moved to amend the first section, so as to make the bonds for which the notes are funded redeemable at pleasure in five years instead of twenty, and payable in twenty years. Pending the question, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill were agreed to, and the bill passed. A preamble and resolution, setting forth that Henry Wikoff had refused to state to the Judiciary Committee from whom he received a portion of the President's annual Message previous to its being laid before Congress, and transmitting the same to the New York Herald, and that said Wikoff be brought before the bar of the House to answer for contempt, was adopted. Whereupon Wikoff was brought to the bar of the House. Upon being interrogated formally regarding the matter, he said that, while he hoped he would not be considered as wanting in respect either to the House or the Judiciary Committee, yet the information demanded was received by him under an obligation of secrecy that he felt bound to respect. Mr. Richardson moved a postponement of the subject until Thursday, in order to give the prisoner time for reflection, but the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Hickman, pressed a resolution handing Mr. Wikoff over to the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms until he shall purge himself of the alleged contempt, which was adopted, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, February 13, in the Senate, the Treasury Note bill, with the legal tender clause, and the clause providing for the payment of the interest of the public debt in coin, was passed by a vote of thirty to seven. A conference committee was appointed on the amendments to the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill. A bill fixing the number of Representatives under the new apportionment was reported. The bill fixes the number at two hundred and thirty-nine. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, presented a series of resolutions declaratory of the rights of the States and of the United States. The series concludes with the following: "That no State, by any vote of secession, or any other act, can abrogate her rights or obligations, or the obligations of the United States to preserve her people in all their rights, and guarantee to them a State republican government. That there can be no confiscation of any property or the rights of loyal citizens unless for acts declared to be criminal. That it is the duty of the United States to suppress the rebellion, to carry the 'sword' in one hand and the 'olive branch' in the other, and to restore the States as they were before the war."——In the House, a resolution was adopted authorizing the Secretary of War to pay the Hannibal and St. Joseph and Pacific Railroad companies for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, etc., according to the schedules issued by the War Department in July last. The consideration of the Naval Appropriation bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole. A clause requiring that naval officers shall be employed to charter and purchase vessels when necessary, and wherever their services are not available the compensation to other parties for chartering and purchasing vessels shall not exceed five thousand dollars per annum, and at the same rate for a shorter period of service, was agreed to. The Committee then rose and the House adjourned.

On Friday, February 14, in the Senate, an amendment to the Army bill was adopted, giving the bounty allowed to soldiers, in case of death, to the relatives of the deceased. A resolution was also passed authorizing and requesting the President to dismiss from the army or navy such officers as, in his judgment, were unsuited to the service, or when the service would be benefited by such dismissal.——In the House, the Naval Appropriation bill was passed, with an amendment appropriating fifteen million dollars for building additional gun-boats, as also one million for an ordnance foundry at Washington. The Senate's amendment to the bill for the suppression of the coolie trade was concurred in by the House. Mr. Wikoff, who had purged himself of contempt to the House by answering the question propounded by the Committee, was ordered to be discharged from custody. Both bodies then adjourned over until Monday.

On Monday, February 17, the excitement in the Senate incident to the reception of the news of the glorious successes of the Union arms entirely unfitted that body for the transaction of public business. After some routine business, of little importance, they went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.——The House participated in the general jubilee consequent upon the announcement of the news from Tennessee. No business was done beyond the passage of an amendment reducing the salary of the Commissioner of the Agricultural Department, and the bill authorizing the employment of a stenographer by the committee on the conduct of the war. The bill making an appropriation for the signal service of the army was also passed.

BOWLING GREEN EVACUATED, AND BUELL IN PURSUIT.

Bowling Green has been evacuated by the rebels, and our troops, under the direction of General Buell, are availing themselves of its evacuation to press on southward. On learning that the rebels were evacuating that place, General Buell ordered a forced march by General Mitchell, to save, if possible, the railroad and turnpike bridges on Big Barren River. They, however, had all been destroyed when General Mitchell reached the banks of the river. The brigades of General Breckinridge and General Hindman were until Thursday evening at Woodburn station, but subsequently moved on to Russelville, and are probably now near Nashville.

It is believed now that no rebel forces exist in Kentucky east of the direct road from Bowling Green via Franklin—a town on the railroad, nine miles south of Woodburn Station—to Nashville. It is reported that General M'Cook and General Thomas left with their divisions, by way of Salt River, for the Cumberland on Saturday; General Buell, it is said, accompanied M'Cook's division, to take command on the Cumberland River in person, where 80,000 of our troops were expected to arrive on 18th. While he presses the enemy on the Cumberland with his tremendous force, their flank and rear are threatened by the heavy divisions under Generals Nelson and Mitchell.

THE ATTACK UPON CLARKSVILLE.

General Cullum, in his dispatch received by General M'Clellan on 18th, states that Commodore Foote, although suffering from the wound he received, will immediately follow with two gun-boats and the mortar-boats which he expects to overtake, and make an attack on Clarksville, another strong post of the rebels on the way to Nashville. Clarksville is distant from Nashville about fifty miles, in a northwesterly direction. It is fortified pretty strongly from the bluffs surrounding it, and is by this time most probably held by a large force of the rebels.

PRICE DRIVEN OUT OF MISSOURI.

An official dispatch was received by General M'Clellan on 14th, from General Halleck, announcing that the rebel General Price, with his whole army, evacuated Springfield on Wednesday night upon the approach of our troops toward Wilson's Creek. Our cavalry pursued them, while the main body of our army took possession of the town and hoisted the "old flag" on the Court-house. A large amount of stores and equipage fell into our hands. On 16th we received intelligence from General Halleck that the rear-guard of Price's army was overtaken, and after a short resistance fled and dispersed, leaving in the hands of our troops more prisoners than they could well take care of, and deserting all their wagons and baggage on the road.

A VICTORY BY GENERAL LANDER.

A dispatch received by General M'Clellan, on 15th, from General Lander, dated Pawpaw, Virginia, at eight o'clock on Friday night, announces the fact that his forces surprised a rebel camp at Blooming Gap, capturing seventeen commissioned officers, some of them of high rank, and a number of others—in all amounting to seventy-five men. Thirteen of the rebels were killed. This affair opens the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad as far as Hancock, and clears General Lander's department of the rebels completely.

THE GREAT SAWYER GUN BURST.

The great Sawyer gun at Newport News burst on Tuesday afternoon, while being fired off, killing two privates of the Massachusetts Twenty-ninth Regiment, and wounding five or six others more or less seriously.

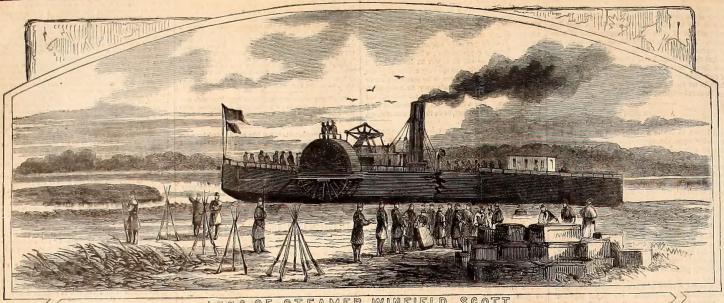
AN AMNESTY TO POLITICAL PRISONERS.

The President has issued an order, through the Secretary of War, releasing all political prisoners now in the custody of the military authorities in every quarter, upon giving their parole to afford no aid to the enemies of the Government—spies alone excepted. The President states that, as the rebellion is now manifestly on the decline, the severe measures resorted to in the beginning are no longer necessary.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

GREAT BRITAIN TO REMAIN NEUTRAL.



LORD JOHN RUSSELL has addressed an important letter to the Lords of the Admiralty, laying down very stringent rules with regard to American vessels of war or privateers (belligerents) which may enter British ports. No such vessels from the North or South will be permitted to enter any port of the Bahama Islands without special leave of the Lieutenant-Governor; and with reference to all British ports, whether in the United Kingdom or in the colonies, the vessels alluded to will not be allowed to obtain any of the facilities for warlike equipment; and when a ship belonging to one belligerent has sailed, twenty-four hours must elapse before a ship belonging to the other belligerent may also leave the harbor. When under stress of weather, vessels may have coal or supplies to enable them to proceed to the nearest port of America—North or South—where they will find shelter. As the Union war ships require no aid, except in case of casualty, from Great Britain, this order will operate healthfully for the Union cause in undocking the privateers now ensconced in English harbors, as well as effectually breaking up the nests of rebel smugglers and pirates which have been formed at the Bahamas and other parts of the West Indies by the secessionists since the commencement of the rebellion.

THE "NASHVILLE" TO GO.

The Nashville has been ordered from Southampton; but her commander sent in a pitiful appeal begging more time, and pointing to the fact that "certain destruction" awaited his vessel from the Tuscarora if he went out immediately after her.

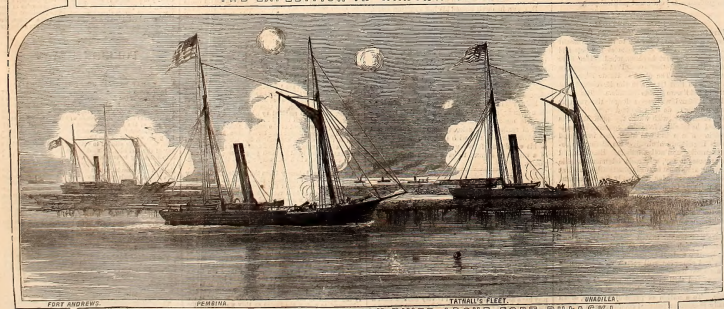
THE "SUMTER" LIKEWISE.



The military commander of Gibraltar has ordered the Sumter from that harbor within six hours, notwithstanding that her captain begged time to wait for the arrival of cash wherewith to purchase coal and food supplies. It was said that the Sumter would be sold to parties in Genoa.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

WE devote a large portion of our space this week to illustrations of the Burnside Expedition. On page 136 we give portraits of the commanders, GENERAL BURNSIDE and FLAG-OFFICER GOLDSBOROUGH; on the same page a picture of the DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL NAVY UNDER COMMODORE LYNCH; on page 137 an illustration of the CHARGE OF HAWKINS'S ZOUAVES upon the rebel batteries; on page 140 a portrait of GENERAL FOSTER, who received the surrender of the rebel troops; on page 134 A CHART OF ALBEMARLE SOUND, showing the field of operations of the expedition: and on this page a MAP OF ROANOKE ISLAND, showing the position of the rebel batteries.

A very neat and comprehensive report of the operations of the combined fleet and army is given in General Burnside's Report, as follows:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF NORTH CAROLINA,
ROANOKE ISLAND, Feb. 10, 1862.

To Major-General George B. M'Clellan, Commanding United States Army, Washington:

GENERAL,—I have the honor to report that a combined attack upon this island was commenced on the morning of the 7th by the naval and military forces of this expedition, which has resulted in the capture of six forts, forty guns, over two thousand prisoners, and upward of three thousand small arms.

Among the prisoners are Colonel Shaw, commander of the island, and O. Jennings Wise, commander of the Wise Legion. The latter was mortally wounded, and has since died.

The whole work was finished on the afternoon of the 8th inst., after a hard day's fighting, by a brilliant charge in the centre of the island, and a rapid pursuit of the enemy to the north end of the island, resulting in the capture of the prisoners mentioned above.

We have had no time to count them, but the number is estimated at nearly three thousand.

Our men fought bravely, and have endured most manfully the hardships incident to fighting through swamps and dense thickets.

It is impossible to give the details of the engagement, or to mention meritorious officers and men in the short time allowed for writing this report, the naval vessel carrying it starting immediately for Hampton Roads, and the reports of the Brigadier-Generals having not yet been handed in. It is enough to say that the officers and men of both arms of the service have fought gallantly, and the plans agreed upon before leaving Hatteras were carried out.

I will be excused for saying in reference to the action that I owe every thing to Generals Foster, Reno, and Parks, as more full details will show.

I am sorry to report the loss of about thirty-five killed, and about two hundred wounded, ten of these probably mortally. Among the killed are Colonel Russell, of the Tenth Connecticut regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Victor de Monteil, of the D'Epeneuil Zouaves. Both of them fought most gallantly. I regret exceedingly not being able to send a full report of the killed and wounded, but will send a dispatch in a day or two with full returns.

I beg leave to inclose a copy of a General Order issued by me on the 9th inst.

I am most happy to say that I have just received a message from Commander Goldsborough stating that the expedition of the gun-boats against Elizabeth City and the rebel fleet has been entirely successful. He will, of course, send his returns to his department.

Since then the fleet have occupied Edenton, Hertford, and have made explorations up the Chowan and Roanoke Rivers without meeting any enemy. In all probability the troops have already severed the railway connections at or near Weldon.

CAPTURE OF THE FORTS.

We clip the following account of the Battle at Roanoke Island from the correspondence of the Tribune:

By daybreak on 8th, General Foster had his brigade in motion to attack the rebels, followed soon after by the brigades of Generals Reno and Parks. The advance was supported by six howitzers, commanded by Midshipmen Porter and Hammond, and manned in part from the fleet. After fording a creek, General Foster's force came up with the enemy's pickets, who fired their pieces and ran. Striking the main road, the brigade pushed on, and after marching a mile and a half came in sight of the enemy's position. To properly understand its great strength, in addition to what skillful engineering had done, the reader will bear in mind that the island, which is low and sandy, is cut up and dotted with marshes and lagoons. On the right and left of the enemy a morass, deemed impassable, stretched out nearly the entire width of the island.

The upper and lower part of the island being connected by the narrow neck on which the battery was situated, and across which lay the road, the battery of three guns had been located so as to rake every inch of the narrow causeway, which, for some distance, was the only approach to the work. General Foster immediately disposed his forces for attack, by placing the 25th Massachusetts, supported by the 23d Massachusetts, in line, and opened with musketry and cannon. The enemy replied hotly with artillery and infantry. While they were thus engaged, the 27th Massachusetts came up, and were ordered by General Foster to the left to the enemy in the woods, where the rebel sharpshooters were stationed. The 10th Connecticut was placed in support of the 25th Massachusetts.

General Reno now came up with his brigade, consisting of the 21st Massachusetts, 51st New York, 51st Pennsylvania, and 9th New Jersey, and pushing through the swamps and tangled undergrowth, took up a position on the right, with the view of turning the enemy. This was done with the greatest alacrity. Meanwhile the contest raged hotly in front, our men behaving gallantly, not wavering for a moment. The Massachusetts men vied with the men of Connecticut; those of New York and New Jersey courageously supporting their brethren of Pennsylvania. Our troops were gradually overcoming the difficulties which impeded their approach, and though fighting at great disadvantage, and suffering severely, were making a steady advance. Regulars were never more steady. General Burnside was near the place of landing, hurrying up the reserves, receiving reports, and, so far as practicable, giving orders.

General Foster was in active command on the ground. His brave and collected manner, the skillfulness with which he, as well as General Reno and General Parks manœuvred their forces, their example in front of the line, and their conduct in any aspect, inspired the troops to stand where even older soldiers would have wavered. In this they were seconded nobly by officers of every grade. General Parks, who had come up with the 4th Rhode Island, 8th Connecticut, and 9th New York, gave timely and gallant support to the 23d and 27th Massachusetts. The ammunition of our artillery getting short, and our men having suffered severely, a charge was the only method of dislodging the enemy. At this juncture Major Kimball, of Hawkins's Zouaves (New York 9th) offered to lead the charge, and storm the battery with the bayonet. "You are the man, the 9th the regiment, and this the moment! Zouaves! storm the battery! Forward!" was General Foster's reply. They started on the run, yelling like devils, cheered by our forces on every side. Colonel Hawkins, who was leading two companies in the flank movement, joined his regiment on the way. On they went, with fixed bayonets, shouting "Zou! Zou! Zou!" into the battery, cheered more loudly than ever. The rebels, taking fright as the Zouaves started, went out when they went in, leaving pretty much every thing behind them, not even stopping to spike their guns, or take away their dead and wounded that had not been removed.

General Foster immediately reformed his brigade, while General Reno, with the 21st Massachusetts and 9th New York, went in pursuit. Following in quick time, General Foster overtook General Reno, who had halted to make a movement to cut off the retreat of a body of rebels, numbering between 800 and 1000 on the left, near Wier's Point, and not far from the upper battery. Taking a part of his force, General Reno pushed on in that direction. It being understood that there was a two-gun battery near Shellbag Bay, Colonel Hawkins, with his Zouaves, was dispatched in that direction.

General Foster pushed on at double-quick with the 24th Massachusetts, followed by an adequate force, in the tracks of the rebels, who, panic-stricken, were fleeing at the top of their speed, throwing away as they went guns, equipments, every thing, so that the road for miles was strewn with whatever the fugitives could disencumber themselves of. Thus was the pursuit kept up for five or six miles, when General Foster, as he was close on the heels of the enemy, was met by a flag of truce borne by Colonel Pool of the 8th North Carolina, with a message from Colonel Shaw of the North Carolina forces, and now senior in command, asking what terms of capitulation would be granted. General Foster's answer was, "Unconditional surrender." Colonel Pool wanted to know how much time would be granted. "No longer than will enable you to report to your senior." Colonel Pool retired, and, after waiting for what he supposed was sufficient length of time without a reply, General Foster commenced closing on the enemy, when Major Stevenson of the 24th Massachusetts, who had gone with Colonel Pool to receive Colonel Shaw's answer, appeared with a message that General Foster's terms were accepted.

DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL FLEET.

The destruction of the rebel fleet by Commander Rowan is thus described by the same correspondent:

We came in sight of Elizabeth City about eight o'clock, and as we approached we discovered the enemy's steamers—seven in number—in line of battle, in front of the city, ready to receive us. A fort was also discovered on a point which projected out some considerable distance—one-fourth of a mile, perhaps—in front of the rebel line of steamers; and directly opposite of this fort was a schooner, anchored, on which were two heavy rifle guns, the distance between the fort and this schooner being about half a mile. Four large guns were mounted on the fort, and it was thought by the rebels that no fleet of ours could pass this narrow channel; consequently they considered themselves safe, with the assistance of their navy, drawn up between the city and fort.

At the sight of the enemy every thing was in readiness for battle. To describe the wild delight of our brave blue-jackets when they first discovered the enemy is more than the pen can do.

The charge was short and desperate, and, without any exception, is one of the most brilliant ever made by the American Navy. All eyes were on the Commander, Rowan, to see what the first order would be, as we were rapidly approaching the foe.

In due time he ran up the signal to engage the enemy in close action, hand to hand. We were then about two miles from the enemy. This was a signal for a test of speed as well as a signal for a deadly encounter with a desperate foe, whose all was staked upon this final engagement. For a distance of two miles it was a race between our steamers in their eagerness to outstrip each other, and to be first to meet the enemy of the Republic face to face.

The river began to narrow as we approached the city. The point where the fort was situated necessarily brought our steamers nearer together, making them sure marks for the enemy's guns; indeed, it would be a miracle if a shot from one of the enemy's guns did not strike some one of our steamers. Under the circumstances, most any other commander would have thought it advisable to first attack the fort and silence the guns on both sides of that narrow point, and then attack the rebel steamers; but not so with the brave and intrepid Rowan, whose motto is to charge bayonets on the enemy whenever and wherever he may be found. In action the position of the commander's ship is in the centre of the squadron. The Delaware, Captain Rowan's flag-ship, was at the head of the advancing column, and led the van. No attention was paid to the fort or armed schooner, as they dashed by them through a perfect torrent of shells and grape, boarded the rebel steamers, and engaged them at the point of the bayonet, as the panic-stricken rebels leaped into the water in every direction. Many were killed by the bayonet and revolver in this hand-to-hand fight, and sank below the water. Their real loss will doubtless never be known to us; the slaughter, however, was fearful, and the struggle short and desperate—not more than fifteen minutes in duration.

The fort and armed schooner were deserted quite as soon as were the rebel steamers, for it was made quite as hot work for those behind the guns as it was for their confederates on the gun-boats. Our loss is two killed and about a dozen wounded—all seamen. The death-struggle was brief. In less time than it would take to write a telegraphic dispatch the victory was ours.

The Commodore Perry was in the advance, and made for the rebel steamer Sea-Bird, the flag-ship of the rebel navy, on which was Commodore Lynch, and ran her down, cutting her through. The Ceres ran straight into the rebel steamer Ellis, and run her down in like manner, boarding her at the same time. The Underwriter took the Forrest in the same style; while the Delaware took the Fanny in fine shape, she having received ten shots from our squadron, which made daylight through her in as many places. The Morse, Shawsheen, Lockwood, Hetzell, Valley City, Putnam, Whitehead, Blinker, and Seymour also covered themselves with glory. Every officer and man in our entire squadron behaved like a hero, one as brave as the other, all through this desperate charge. The terrified rebels, as they forsook their gun-boats, fired them, and thus all but the Ellis were burned, including a new one on the stocks. Four were burned, one captured, and two made their escape—the Raleigh and Beaufort. They are in the canal which leads to Norfolk, but are not able to go through, on account of the locks having been destroyed; consequently they will be captured before this reaches you, as they can go only some few miles toward Norfolk.

ACTING MAJOR-GENERAL BURNSIDE.

The Commander-in-Chief of the expedition, Brigadier-General Ambrose Everitt Burnside, was born at Liberty, in Union County, Indiana, on the 23d of May, 1824, and is consequently now in his thirty-eighth year. In 1842 he entered the West Point Military Academy, and graduated in 1847, with the rank of Second Lieutenant in the Second United States Artillery. In September of the same year he was transferred to the Third Artillery, and was attached to the rebel General (then Captain) Bragg's company, with which he marched in the division of General Patterson to the city of Mexico, and there remained until the close of hostilities. With this company he also was engaged for three or four years in the Indian border wars of New Mexico, distinguishing himself in an encounter with the Apache tribe in August, 1849, near Los Vegas, where he completely routed them, killing eighteen and taking nine prisoners, besides capturing a number of horses. For his gallantry on this occasion he was brought to the notice of the President and Congress, and in December, 1851, was promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant. In the commission appointed to settle the boundary lines between the United States and Mexico after the war between the two countries, General Burnside served as Quarter-master; and in 1851, in the capacity of bearer of dispatches from Colonel Graham to President Fillmore, he traversed a distance of twelve hundred miles across the Plains, from the Gila River through the Indian country, attended by an escort of but three men, in seventeen days. Subsequent to this he was stationed at Fort Adams, in Newport harbor, and retired from service in October, 1853. In the interval to the outbreak of the present troubles he occupied himself in the civil walks of life. Shortly after his retirement from the army he turned his attention to the manufacture of a breech-loading rifle—well known as the "Burnside rifle"—invented by himself, and possessed of peculiar and superior merit. During the Administration of Buchanan it was submitted to Secretary of War Floyd, who gave assurances that it would be adopted. It transpired subsequently, however, that Floyd had made a bargain with another inventor, with whom he was to share the profits, and General Burnside, who had incurred considerable expense in bringing his weapon to perfection on the strength of Floyd's promises, was consequently involved in some pecuniary difficulties, from which an upright and honorable character and persevering industry have since entirely relieved him. He sold the establishment in Bristol, where his rifle was manufactured, to his brother-in-law, who has since carried it on, and furnished a considerable quantity of the arms to the Government. He was, subsequent to this transaction, connected with the Illinois Central Railroad, in company with General M'Clellan. While in Rhode Island he became acquainted with and married a charming and most estimable lady of Providence, named Miss Bishop, with whom he removed to Chicago when appointed to the position in the railroad company. Having been elected treasurer of the company, he removed to New York, where he had been but a short time when summoned by Governor Sprague to take command of the First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers, with which he took part at the Battle of Bull Run, acting during the engagement as Brigadier-General of the Second Brigade of the Second Division. It may be interesting to mention in this connection that the First Company of his regiment was armed with the "Burnside rifle"—a weapon that did good execution in the battle in avenging the wrongs of the inventor upon the co-rebels of the traitor Floyd. Colonel Burnside's skillful generalship on this occasion brought him to the immediate notice of the authorities at Washington, and on 6th of August last he was promoted to a full Brigadier-General. Personally, General Burnside is a man of fine appearance, with a lofty forehead, expressive of deep penetration. His manners are very winning and pleasing, while at the same time his features denote a firmness and decisiveness of character eminently appropriate to the important position which he occupies. He is, withal, a strict disciplinarian, a most implacable enemy to military irregularity, and yet a most popular man with every one.

FLAG-OFFICER GOLDSBOROUGH.

Flag-Officer Louis M. Goldsborough, commander of the naval part of the Burnside expedition, was born in the District of Columbia. He is a citizen of the State of Maryland, but received his appointment in the United States Navy from the District of Columbia.

His first entrance into the navy bears date June 18, 1812. He has consequently been nearly fifty years in the United States service, over eighteen of which he has passed at sea in the various grades of the naval service. Among others, he commanded the Marion, 38 guns, in 1842, at the time she was attached to the squadron of Commodores Ridgely and Morris at Brazil. In 1847 he commanded the Ohio, 74 guns, and afterward commanded the Cumberland, 44 guns, and the Levant, 18 guns, at the time those vessels were attached to the squadron of Commodore Silas H. Stringham in the Mediterranean. The Cumberland was the flag-ship while under his command. His time of service on shore is about twelve years, and he has been off active duty about eighteen years.

The date of his present commission is September 14, 1855. He lately commanded the United States frigate Congress, from which position he was appointed to command one half of the Atlantic Blockading Squadron, superseding Commodore Stringham, who was formerly in command. His flag-ship was the Minnesota, and his station for some time was Fortress Monroe. Although the late act relative to officers in the navy places him nominally on the retired list, having been over forty-five years in the service of his country, yet Commodore Goldsborough, like many other old officers in the navy, is a man of too much experience and energy to be allowed to retire upon his laurels, as his brilliant performance at Roanoke Island abundantly testifies.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL FOSTER.

Brigadier-General John G. Foster, commanding the First Brigade, who received the surrender of the rebel troops on Roanoke Island, was born in New Hampshire in 1824, graduated at West Point in 1846, standing number four in his class, and was breveted Second Lieutenant of Engineers in the company of which the rebel General Gustavus W. Smith was then Captain and General M'Clellan First Lieutenant. On the 20th of August, 1847, he was breveted First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. He was with the storming party engaged at El Molino del Rey, in which engagement he was severely wounded, and for his gallant and meritorious conduct while in this battle he was breveted Captain, his commission bearing date September 8, 1847. He was Assistant Professor of Engineering at the Military Academy during 1854, and in April of that year was made a full First Lieutenant of Engineers. On the 1st of July, 1860, he was made a full Captain, at the same time holding a brevet higher rank. He was also one of the brave few who so long and so gallantly defended Fort Sumter against the rebel soldiery of South Carolina. Since his return from that fort he has been actively engaged in the superintendence of the fortifications at Sandy Hook, and has there shown forth some of his engineering qualifications. In consideration of his military capacity and experience, he was created by the President a Brigadier-General of Volunteers.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT HENRY.

WE devote page 133 to illustrations of FORT HENRY, whose capture by our gallant Navy, under Flag-officer FOOTE, we recorded in our last number. Our pictures are from sketches by our attentive Western correspondent Mr. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT. We refer to last number for a full account of the affair, and subjoin the following references to the letters on the MAP of the Fort:

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST SAVANNAH.

WE devote page 132 to illustrations of the movements of our EXPEDITION AGAINST SAVANNAH, from sketches by our artist, Mr. Davis. He writes:

THE ENTRANCE OF OUR GUN-BOATS INTO THE SAVANNAH RIVER, ABOVE FORT PULASKI.

On several occasions previous to starting this expedition Captain John Rogers, of the navy, in company with Captain Donohoe and Lieutenant Wilson, of the army, made frequent trips for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of water and facilities for entering the Savannah River above Fort Pulaski. These officers had need to use all caution, and in the dark, foggy nights had some escapes that were exceedingly narrow.

This preface to the expedition being successfully accomplished, General Sherman made, with the swiftly-rowed gig of the M'Clellan, under the cover of the guns of the Pembina, Unadilla, and others, a reconnoissance to ascertain the exact position of affairs. While so engaged the gun-boats of Tatnall's fleet came down, and a brisk cannonade was commenced between our boats and those of Secesh—in which Secesh could not see the point, and ran away. The low stage of the tide prevented our boats, not yet in the Savannah, from pursuing.

The steamer Winfield Scott, in conveying the 48th New York Regiment, Colonel Perry, to the scene of action, ran on a mud flat, and upon the receding of the tide cracked entirely open, rendering her, with the exception of her machinery, a total loss. She was at best a mere shell, and it is perhaps fortunate that she was lost in a creek.

THE EXPEDITION TO WARSAW SOUND.

The large steamers Cosmopolitan, Boston, Delaware, and Belvidere, with a number of schooners in tow, went down to Warsaw in company with several gun-boats for the purpose of entering the Savannah River by the way of the Wilmington River, and in this way avoid any danger from Fort Pulaski, the steamer M'Clellan, with General Sherman and Commodore Dupont on board, following shortly after. The M'Clellan, being used as the flag-ship, returned shortly after to Hilton Head.

We have information from Fortress Monroe that severe fighting has been going on near Savannah, and that the city was reported to have been captured by the Union troops, most probably those of General Wright and Captain Davis, who entered the Savannah River by Warsaw Sound.

CARE-WORN.

"How pale and care-worn Mr. Emory looks!" remarked a lady to her husband, as the person to whom she referred crossed the room with an elegantly-dressed young lady, his daughter, leaning on his arm.

"No wonder," was replied. "Mr. Emory has enough to make him look pale and care-worn."

"Has any thing happened in his family?" The lady turned curiously toward her husband.

"I believe not."

"What is wrong, then?"

"Much; as witness the troubled look that rests always on his face when it is in repose. A peaceful mind never records itself in such an expression. I am glad to see him among us for a few days. He needs the change and mental recreation—needs them a great deal more than nine out of ten who are here. But he can not stay long enough to receive any permanent benefit. Wife and daughters will remain; he must speed back to the city."

"Why?"

"Business."

"Yes, that is the word with men. They worship business with the blind devotion of idolators. Every thing is sacrificed to business."

"Why?"

The husband's face was serious. His wife did not answer the question.

"I will tell you. It is chiefly because men, in our day, try to do more business than they are able to manage. They are anxious to secure large returns in a brief time."

"Men should be wiser and more prudent," was responded. "Common sense should teach them a better way."

"I grant you this. But there are influences at work with almost every man that too frequently prove stronger than prudence or common sense."

"What are they?"

"Social pride."

"Has that any thing to do with Mr. Emory's care-worn face?"

"Every thing. Mr. Emory possessed a business, ten years ago, which, if rightly managed, would have made him to-day an independent man in the world, instead of one almost harassed to death. It is the old story. His family must occupy a certain position in society. They must go with the fashionable crowd. There must be a fine house and costly furniture; dress and show; costly emulations. All these things require money. It is easy to sink a few thousands of dollars every year in home extravagances, and have nothing very satisfactory to show for it at the end. Two thousand dollars a year for ten years make the handsome sum of twenty thousand dollars; and I'm very sure that, without the abridgment of a single comfort or the removal of a single element of rational enjoyment, at least that large amount of money could have been saved by the family of Mr. Emory during the period mentioned. What then?"

"Mr. Emory would have been just twenty thousand dollars better off than he is to-day," said the lady. "So much richer, but whether any the less a pale, care-worn devotee of business is open to a doubt. This business, it strikes me, is a kind of mental disease."

"Only in a few cases," was replied. "In Mr. Emory's case, as I happen to know, necessity, and not impulse, is the law in force. I saw him ten days ago, and the interview left a painful impression on my mind. We are personally intimate enough to talk freely together. I said to him,

"'Are you going to the sea-shore this year?'

"He shrugged his shoulders and smiled faintly. It was the ghost of a smile, dying almost as soon as born. 'Can't get away, even if I could afford it.'

"'Why can't you get away?' I asked.

"He reached his hand for his bill-book, and opening to the month of August, pointed to half a page of entries, which my practiced eyes very well understood. 'Foots six thousand and upward,' said he, significantly.

"'You have the funds in bank, or to come in during the month,' I remarked.

"'Not five hundred in bank,' he answered, looking painfully concerned, 'nor a thousand beyond on which any certain calculation is to be made. So you see that I shall have to be on hand all the time, just to work and scheme in the direction of money-raising. Heaven only knows how I am to get through! As for business, I might shut my store for a month and not be any the worse off.'

"'I wish, from my heart,' said I, speaking from a kind impulse toward Mr. Emory, who is a true man, 'that you had twenty thousand dollars in bank.'

"'I should be the happiest man alive!' he answered, with a sudden light flashing over his face. How quickly that light receded! How sad the face its fleeting radiance left behind!

"Now two thousand dollars a year for ten years, saved in expenses which have not increased the happiness of his family one iota, would have given to Mr. Emory a large sum of money. With that in possession, I doubt if his face would be so pale and care-worn as you see it to-day. Visions of bankruptcy, of commercial dishonors, and of home desolations the bare thought of which almost drive men to madness, would not haunt his waking reveries and midnight dreams. I see no reasonable hope for a safe deliverance out of his troubles. As his expenses went on eating into the life of his business, and payments became, in consequence, hard to meet, Mr. Emory increased his trade by forced means, not always safe—buying more largely, and selling to a wider range of customers, with less of scruple in regard to their standing, until he found himself in deep waters, and in danger. Since that time I am afraid it is growing worse with him instead of better. There is only one remedy, if its application be not already too late."

"What?"

"It is said that a knowledge of our disease is more than half the cure. This means that in a removal of discovered causes effects must cease. Mr. Emory's only hope lies in a reduction of his home expenses. If these go on, exhausting him more and more, ruin is inevitable."

"It will be a hard thing for his gay daughters to step down from their advance position," said the wife.

"Better for them to step down than to fall down. Down I am sure they will have to come, and that before a very long time. We shall hardly find them here in the next watering season."

A young lady, unobserved by the speakers, had been sitting in a window recess close enough to hear every word. She leaned and listened in an attitude of deep interest, her face flushing and paling by turns.

"Isn't that one of Mr. Emory's daughters?" said the lady to her husband, as the person referred to arose and crossed the long parlor.

"I believe so," was answered.

"It can't be possible that she heard your remarks about her father?"

"They were not meant for her ears; but if they have found their way there, well. I can not say that I regret their utterance."

"I'm sorry," said the lady. "Poor girl! How hurt and mortified she must be."

"All of her pain and mortification will be light in comparison to what her father suffers daily and hourly," was replied. "If she have any true love for him, she will now seek to lighten rather than increase his burdens."

The person of whom they spoke, Mr. Emory's second daughter, after leaving the public parlor, fled up stairs like one escaping from pursuit. On gaining her own room, she shut and locked the door—then sat down with her hands across her breast, pale-cheeked and panting. The aspect of her countenance was that of one oppressed by sudden terror.

Agnes loved her father purely and tenderly. She had not failed to observe the cloud which was gradually settling upon his life, nor the pale, care-worn face that looked in upon their home at the close of each recurring day. As Mr. Emory never referred to his business in the family circle, the true cause of all this remained completely hidden. Not the remotest suspicion thereof had, up to this time, reached her apprehension. Suddenly a veil was drawn aside, and she stood in pain and fear, looking at the undisguised reality of her father's true position.

What could Agnes Emory do? Young, inexperienced, inefficient, through defective education, she felt her weakness, and for a time wept in conscious helplessness.

"Agnes!" It was her mother's voice.

The weeping girl endeavored to stanch her tears, but in vain. Her face was flooded as she opened the door.

"Why, Agnes, my child! what has happened?" said Mrs. Emory, in surprise.

Agnes tried to answer, but sobs came in place of words. At length, as the turbulence of feeling began to abate, she said, with tears still falling over her face,

"Won't you ask father to come here?"

"Yes, dear. But why not tell me about your trouble first?"

"I'll tell you all about it. Oh, ask him to come, mother; and bring Emma and Alice."

In a few minutes Mr. Emory came hurriedly to Agnes's room, followed by his wife and other daughters. Already Agnes had been able to dry her tears; but her face was colorless.

Tenderly, almost pityingly, she looked up at her father, and seizing one of his hands in both of hers, held it tightly against her breast, saying, as she did so,

"Oh, father, if we had only known what was troubling you!"

"Troubling me!" answered Mr. Emory, in astonishment, as he held Agnes a little away from him and gazed at her wonderingly.

"Yes, father, you've been troubled a long time. I've seen it, and we've all seen it. You come home and sit silent all the evening. You have grown pale and thin. You look often so care-worn. And instead of helping you, we have only laid heavier burdens on your shoulders."

"What does the girl mean!" exclaimed Mrs. Emory, in a half-reproving voice.

"Come, sit down, dear, we must have all this explained," said the father, leading Agnes to a chair, and taking one beside her. "You say that I've been troubled?"

"Isn't it so, father?" Agnes raised again her brimming eyes to her father's face.

"This is a world of trouble, my child, and all must take a share," he answered, evasively.

"Our share has been very light, and yours very heavy," was the prompt reply; "and now there must be a change. We must take off some of the burdens that weigh down your stooping shoulders. Oh, father! why did you not let us share them long and long ago? Did you doubt our willingness? did you question our love?"

"I am bewildered, my child," said Mr. Emory, his voice growing unsteady. "It is true that I am troubled—that my burdens are heavy; but from what source have you received information in regard to them? Speak out plainly, Agnes."

And she did speak plainly, relating, almost word for word, the conversation we have given.

"Is this all true, Edward?" said Mrs. Emory, as Agnes ceased speaking. Her voice was sad, but not weak. She had drawn near to her husband, and now stood with her hand resting firmly upon him.

"All true," was gloomily answered.

There fell upon the group of father, mother, and daughters a deep silence, in which heart-beatings were nearly audible.

"We have no right to be here," said the oldest daughter, breaking the silence. "Let us go home to-day."

"In the next hour, if a train starts," responded Agnes.

"Why did you let us come? Oh, father, it was so wrong—so wrong!"

And the youngest of the group laid her face down, weeping, on her father's shoulder.

"I meant to have spared you this," said the brave, enduring man, with an irrepressible emotion. "I trusted that all would come out right. I struggled hard to maintain myself, so that no shadow might darken my home. But I fear that all has been in vain. The weight lies too heavily upon me; and if not lightened in some way I must sink."

"You shall not sink, father, if we can bear you up," answered Agnes, bravely. "Let us go home to-day; and when we get home tell us every thing about your business, so that we can understand just what duty requires. I'm sure we will all be of one heart and mind. If we are living too expensively, let us go down lower and take a humbler position. With what I heard just now ringing in my ears, I shall not have a moment's peace of mind until we retire from the public gaze."

"We are of one mind," said all. And with one mind they acted, starting for the city on that very day.

The change that followed was thorough, reaching to every department of their home life. In a brave and self-denying spirit wife and daughters rallied to the rescue. Watches, jewelry, surplus furniture, pictures, and articles of simple ornament, were sold, and the money, which reached the sum of nearly two thousand dollars, returned to the business from which it should never have been taken. Their large and handsome dwelling was exchanged for a cheap and modest home. One servant only was retained—three had been required—and the cost of living, under a system of the most rigid economy, reduced from between three and four thousand dollars a year to a ratio of about twelve hundred.

A new hope sprung to life in the heart of Mr. Emory. The money received for the sale of surplus furniture and articles of mere ornament came to his hand just in time to save him from protest, and carried him over a difficult place where he would inevitably have fallen. He felt that his ship was lightened; that she was answering more steadily to the helm, and bearing up to the wind. "Courage!" he said to himself. "I shall yet come out safely."

If the home to which Mr. Emory returned after each day's hard battle was humbler, the face he brought was not so care-worn. A cheerful light shone oftener in the eyes that were always sad before. He did not sit silent and withdrawn from the home circle as once, brooding over the dark and doubtful future, but read and talked through the evening hours with his wife and children, giving and receiving strength. Had the daughters lost more than was gained by their withdrawal from gay circles, and denial of pride and social ambition? Had duty been all a burden? Not so: duty is never all a burden. If it be sometimes hard and rough, there is always a sweet kernel at the centre. They were, in their seclusion and patient service, happier than before, and growing into a stronger, purer, and truer life. As for Mr. Emory, an almost despairing struggle with fortune had been changed for a hopeful one. Confidence took the place of doubt. He began to feel, under the lighter burdens that rested upon him, a more elastic and vigorous condition of mind. He was clearer-seeing and more sagacious in business. There was a lifting up of the darkness along the black horizon, and a promise of the coming dawn.

"Father is very late to-night," said Agnes, looking up at her mother, who entered the room where she sat with some needle-work in her hands. It was the evening of New-Year's Day.

As she spoke, the father's well-known tread was heard in the passage.

"Oh, there he is now!" And Agnes laid aside her work, moving to meet her father as he ascended the stairs.

"How late you are!" she said, as she bent forward to receive the kiss that now almost always accompanied his return.

"It is late," replied Mr. Emory; "but I could not leave the store until I had completed some calculations I had in hand." His face was cheerful—more cheerful than it had yet been; radiant, in fact, with smiles.

"The work must have been satisfactory," said Mrs. Emory, "judging from the pleasant state of mind in which it has left you."

"It was satisfactory," replied Mr. Emory, with emphasis. "For two or three days we have been taking an account of stock, and to-day has been spent in closing the account and getting at the result. I am happy to say that it is more encouraging than was anticipated. Six months ago bankruptcy stared me in the face, and I saw no means of escape. Now I think the danger past. If I had been left standing alone, I must have fallen; but, wife and children sustaining me, strength came in the hour of exhaustion. All is safe now, I trust; safe for the present, and safe for the future. Our home is not so large nor so luxurious as it was on last New-Year's Day; but then it rested on a sandy foundation, and the storm was gathering, which, had it burst over us, would have left all in ruins. Now, solid earth and rock are beneath our house, and I do not shudder in fear of the rising tempest. Is it not far better with us than then? Are we not happier, though humbler?"

"Happier a thousand-fold!" said Agnes, as she drew an arm fondly around her father. "We speak of it to each other every day, and wonder at our former blindness and folly. To see smiles in the care-worn face of our father again—to hear him speak cheerfully and hopefully—to know that we have helped to lift burdens from his shoulders that were crushing him down—these are our rich reward!"

"And mine in having such children!" replied Mr. Emory, with feeling. "In every home, if rightly ordered, lie all the elements of happiness; and, thank God! we have found them at last. I was at fault in not taking you long ago into my counsels. How much of pain and peril might have been saved! But the night is past, and we bless the morning!"

And so might the morning break in thousands of homes over which shadows rest if wives and daughters were wholly trusted, and made to comprehend the real struggle with fortune in which husbands and fathers are engaged. Thousands of pale, care-worn faces would grow warm and cheerful; and thousands of stooping shoulders, lightened of crushing burdens, grow erect.

Wives and daughters, ponder these things! Husbands and fathers, take them into your counsels!

IN WESTERN MISSOURI.

I.

"I TELL you what it is, John Elliot, you'd better clear out of this, and do it right smart too. I ha'n't goin' to have no dog-gauned Abolitionists sneakin' round after my daughter, 'specially when drest in that uniform. It war bad enough when you only talked Yankee; now you've got to actin' it right out it's time to quit. I don't want no quarrel with you, for the sake of old acquaintance; but you're bound not to come inside of this yere shanty agin with my good-will, let alone who says yes to it. And now you know my mind on the matter."

The speaker, an elderly man of large frame, with an expression of inflexible obstinacy in every lineament of his wrinkled and weather-worn countenance, stood at the threshold of his own farm-house, as if to bar entrance to the person addressed. This was a tall, good-looking young fellow of perhaps three-and-twenty, newly attired in the uniform of a captain of Illinois volunteers, who, with a flush of surprise and deprecation on his sun-burned face, looked wistfully over the old man's shoulder, as if in hope of some interposition in his favor, before replying.

"Why, Squire Jennifer," he said at length, "I'm only going to fight for our country."

"For the white-livered, blue-bellied Abolitionists, you mean, agin the South! Now I war raised in Arkansaw, though I've ben in Missouri most ever since it war a State, and I go for Southern Rights and Southern Institutions agin all the Yankees out of ——! You didn't want to be told that, John Elliot; why come h'yar to have me put it in hard words at you?"

"We always used to be friends—" the young man commenced. The elder interrupted him.

"We did," he said, "as long as you could keep down your onremittin' abolitionism; that I always went agin, and always will. But now you've come out flat-footed as a Linc'lnite and a soldier, we've got to part. I don't wish you no harm, an' I hope you'll live to know better and be sorry for what you done; but I shet right straight down upon it now, and so good-by!"

"Hold on!" cried young Elliot—for the farmer was closing the door upon him—"and listen to me. If you suppose for one minute, Squire, that I don't know I'm right, and that I shall repent my choice, whatever comes of it, you are mightily mistaken. It's no use talking about that—I'm one of Uncle Sam's fighting-boys, and proud of it. But before I join my regiment—I start by the 6 o'clock cars—I want to see Susie."

"What for?"

"I'll tell her that."

"I don't see the good of it. Whatever sparkin' you done (I were always opposed to it) had better end to wonst. You are no match for her, John, and you know it."

"I ain't so rich as Judge Jones, if you mean that; but he'll have to get more than your consent to have Suse for his wife."

"That's none of your business. The Judge is a good Southern Rights man, any how, and as sech I respect him. When the fightin' comes he won't be found alongside of —— Dutchmen and nigger-stealing Yankees, but right in front of them, and then, if you've any thing agin him, you can jest blaze away—he'll face the music, be sure of it!"

The look of contempt upon the volunteer's face implied doubt of this, and scorn of the person eulogized. However, he did not pursue the subject, returning to that from which he had digressed:

"You won't refuse me a word or two with your daughter, Squire?" he said, amicably; "we've known each other since we were boy and girl together, and I don't like to go without parting with Susie."

"There's no use in it, nohow! besides, she's not to home. She went up to Aunt Sally's this morning to stay a day or two—come in and see for yourself, if you don't believe me. What time did Suse and little Pete go off, Dinah?" This inquiry was addressed to an old negro woman bustling about in the interior.

"Seven o'clock, massa," she responded, turning her wrinkled, good-humored, black visage, surmounted by a gayly-colored, knotted handkerchief, in the direction of her owner—not without a peculiar glance at Captain Elliot, full of recognition and sympathy.

"Ten miles away!" he murmured. "I shouldn't have time to get there and back, let alone stopping. Well, Squire, if you'll tell her I wished to say good-by, I'll be obliged to you. And good-by yourself!" Saying which he offered his hand. Paul Jennifer hesitated a little and then took it.

"For old acquaintance' sake," said he, returning the grasp, though with qualified cordiality. "But I can't wish you as well as I'd like to, for you're dead on the wrong side, and I don't want that to win, nohow. Good-by!"

"Good-by, then!" And so they parted, the volunteer turning his back on the homestead in which he had spent some of the happiest hours of his life by the side of pretty Susie Jennifer. Musing on her many perfections, and chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancies, he had walked at least a quarter of a mile when he was hailed from behind, and, turning, beheld the old negro woman.

"Bress de Lord! how fas' you do walk, Massa John!" she said, panting with the exertion of overtaking him; "didn't you see ole Dinah makin' sign at you all de time you was a talkin' wid the Squire? I'se got something for you from Miss Susie."

"Yes?" And the young volunteer poured forth his thanks, watching with all the eager impatience of newly-raised expectation the search for a letter amidst the miscellaneous contents of the capacious pocket of Dinah. It was discovered at last and handed to him.

Very short were its contents, and presumably sweet—for their perusal brought an expression of tenderness and gratification into the hardy countenance of John Elliot pleasant to see, while the ebony physiognomy of his humble friend fairly grinned into broader grin from combined triumph and sympathy.

"Miss Susie go to her Aunt Sally's, to be sure," chuckled Dinah, "because ole massa make her. But he say nothing agin her stoppin' in at de town. He do say, at the dress-maker's—and dere you find her sure enough." And the speaker's fat sides shook with delight and merriment.

Hastily reiterating his thanks, and adding to them a piece of money, Captain Elliot was about to hurry onward when the old negress grew grave serious, and she laid her hand upon his arm.

"You gwine to fight for de Stars and Stripes and Massa Linkin, ben't you, Cap'n Elliot?" she demanded, with great earnestness.

"Yes, Aunty! What of it?"

"De good Lord in hebben bress both you and him! dat's all. Nebber doubt you'll do right, and dat He will bress you. And now I mus' jus run back, or de ole massa'll be s'pecting something."

II.

"Here's two Abolitionists at the North, Squire," they such it in at the breast; I've lived among 'em and know it. There's no reasoning with a Northern man on the subject; he don't reason at all; he never gets beyond asking you whether a nigger ain't a human being? They won't fight either, if there's no fight in 'em, and you can't instil 'em into it—you are not going to leave us, Miss Susie?"

"My mother was a Northern woman, Mr. Jones, and I won't stay to hear her memory insulted!"

"No offence, ma'am—none!"

And "Stay, girl, stay!" added Susie Jonniffer's father. But she, not displeased at the chance of escaping from a person and conversation which were disagreeable to her, gathered up her knitting, and palmetto-hat and scarf of her father, and left to greet the more congenial company of old Dinah.

"You've soared her off now," said Paul Jennifer, "and I'm glad of it. I ought to have thought that her mother came from down East—she's mightily techy on any thing' agin the Yankees in consequence."

"I didn't know," apologized Jones. He was a little man, puny, priggish, and self-important, with a sharp nose and a peculiar expression of the left eye—partly will, partly stubborn. A shrewd lawyer of the new, earlier Western stamp, a thorough Missourian in language and habits as well as in political principles, capability of pleasing and love of the favor of Jennifer, while his comparative wealth seemed to recommend him as a desirable son-in-law.

"Gals is skeary things," the old farmer continued, with a laugh; "it's like coons in a tree. If you run up the wrong way of the fur you are like to get scratched. What's the news, Judge, up to the Corners?"

Jones enumerated the current rumors of the time and locality, the stories of border-burning, tearing up of railroad, pillage and shirrishness characterizing the war in Missouri, relating them in the bitterest spirit, accompanied with many caustic objurgations of the Unionists, to all of which Jennifer listened attentively.

"There was some talk of an Illinoy regiment being ordered here, to attack the boys down to——" naming a locality some miles to the south, in which a considerable body of secessionists was known to be encamped; "but I don't make no 'count of it. I reckon they'd find it rough on 'em in this country too hot to hold 'em, and that's a fact," concluded Jones.

"What shall you do if they do come, Judge?"

"Turn out and help whip 'em, by ——!" said the little man, fiercely. "I wanted to have a settlement—me to be captain—I'm good for five hundred dollars toward it, any day—but they've been so backward about it, Squire, up to the Corners —mighty few of 'em like you and me! If there's one thing under heaven that I'm ashamed of in this country too hot to hold 'em, and that's a fact," concluded Jones.

"What shall you do if they do come, Judge?"

"Turn out and help whip 'em, by ——!" said the little man, fiercely. "I wanted to have a settlement—me to be captain—I'm good for five hundred dollars toward it, any day—but they've been so backward about it, Squire, up to the Corners —mighty few of 'em like you and me! If there's one thing under heaven that I'm ashamed of in this country it's a fellow as won't stand up like a man and fight for his principles."

Jennifer gazed approvingly at him. "You air a right spunky mag, Judge, there's no denyin'!" he answered. "Suppose we take a drink?"

To this proposal his companion (who had never refused an invitation of the kind in his life) at once assented, and took not only one, but two, three, and four successive draughts of the fiery corn-whisky set before him, his descriptions of the state of public and enthusiasm in behalf of the South increasing with his potations. The next half hour's conversation that ensued between him and his host will be very well spared the reader; it was terminated by a sudden clamor of voices without, by the opening of the door, and the irruption of one white and two black faces into the apartment, the first apparently the young Jennifer, the second that of the old Dinah and her grandson, incidentally attended to heretofore as "little Pete." The boy—he might be considered as entitled to that appellation in a Northern as well as a Southern sense, being a bright, well-clothed mulatto-lad about fifteen, rather dwarfish in stature—was plentifully bespattered with Missouri mud, and held a broken whip in his hand, as if he had abruptly dismounted from horseback. His yellow countenance indicated considerable excitement, already mirrored in the faces of those to whom he had imparted his news.

"What's the matter, boy?" demanded old Jennifer, hastily.

"De nigers, massa! de nigers!" was the boy's answer: "dey's comin' here right away!"

"What soldiers?" inquired Jones, rising and finishing the contents of his tumbler.

"De Yankees, Sar! Eldery body say so. I was down to Atchison's about de ole man', an' de people all scared dar out ob dar wits, 'specin' 'em come right along all de time. Day bin burnin' houses and killing folks at ——. Young Mass' Daniel he tell me ole ooman and tell Massa, if he want to shet up de house and clear out."

"Clear out!" repeated Paul Jennifer, softly. "I shall jes' stay an' take my chances and risk it, I reckon, will the rest of you. Let 'em come as soon as they like; unless they want to shoot folks for their opinions, it'll only make it bad for the boys and hen-roosts. I ha'n't been out agin 'em, though I hate 'em mightily. I think I'll stay. I think my company you was talkin' of had, bein' used—we'll have give them somethin' to remember us by."

"Yes, by ——!" spoiled Jones, though with less alacrity than might have been looked for, considering his recently-manifested enthusiastic inclinations. Turning to the boy, he questioned him minutely as to his recent news, eliciting, however, nothing more definite than that there was related the rumor of the approach of a body of Union soldiers, and of Atchison's family's flight from the apprehension of a neighborhood which, if not openly inimical to the Government, was yet tainted with the political opinions of secession.

"Will you stop with us, Judge?" asked Jennifer. "I reckon you'd better; you are well known, and might meet some of 'em what you'd have nobody to stand by you."

"Thank you, no," Jones replied, hurriedly, walking up and down; "I must start right away for town. I've got information that must be part of each in case the Yankees get there. You understand. Pete! my horse, and be quick about it, sir!" And he turned his shoulder, "because—you won't be angry now?"

"What is it, gal?"

"Look here." Coloring a little, she drew a scrap of paper from her bosom, containing a few lines of writing, and gave it to her father.

"Read it, sir, as I ain't good at sech," he replied.

"It's a protection, certifying that—that the holders of it are—not enemies to the Government; signed by General ——," she faltered.

The old man deliberately took it into pieces and threw them into the fire. "I won't have none of it," said he, "and I'm mighty much obliged to you, if they burn the house down over our heads, or don't leave a stick of it standing—what's that to me? I'm ready to stand or fall with the country past the house of two or three riders, white and black, evidently mounted, for among the boys to which had reached Jennifer's dwelling. He had not time to comment upon it before a fresh clatter of hoofs gave notice of the arrival of the mounted. Judge Jones's saddle, informed him that that ardent secessionist had effected his departure.

"Go your ways, Susie, and get on a half-solitaire," "I don't like to think you're scared, and them young rascals of secession hurrying, and ready for it; but I wish you hadn't gone off at such a Bull Run stampede for all that—it looks bad!" And then, taking down his gun, he, too, hastily loaded and put it by. "For there's no knowing what's going to happen!" he added, lighting his pipe and looking out in the direction in which the Union soldiers were expected to appear.

III.

ANOTHER half-hour brought other stragglers, and with them an unexpected and important emendation in the news received. The approaching troops were not Union and Federal soldiers, but the advancing band of native Missouri rebels, from the encampment to the South previously described. They were, however, without any material incursion, with some reference to the expected Illinois soldiers, and were on the pig-and-pudding of the vicinity. Little Pete had only too faithfully reported one of the errors incidental to the time. The rebels had lingered a long while to hear the correction.

Paul Judge has fairly run away from our own boys!" said he; "let 'em come along! they shall be welcome!" And entering the house he communicated the news to his daughter and to Dinah, neither of whom received it with any particular expression of satisfaction.

The day drew on; the shadows of evening fell over the monotonous prairie landscape; other straggling parties, emerging here and there, gave no sign of an unsatisfactory, not to say startling character.

"The boys," said a keen farmer, seven or eight miles to the south again, as he checked his wagon, at Jennifer's hail and inquiry, affording and observed set fire to it; it was said the landlord was killed. He hoped they wouldn't be coming that way, lantern was hidden or destroyed, and he and his old woman would have the shanty shot up and the stock out of the way. Didn't Squire Jennifer intend doing the same thing?

"Well, no," that person responded, though with some hesitation, answering, "politics is pretty well known, and I don't suppose the boys will harm an Arkansaw man and a straight-out secessionist!"

The keen farmer shook his head dubiously. "It's risky, Squire," said he; "and I wouldn't give 'em no chance if I was you." And starting his tired cattle into as brisk a pace as they could accomplish, he left the keen farm dispositions to their own conducting darkness.

Susie Jennifer's father bestowed certain amount of consideration upon the warning and to Dinah, himself up with the hope that his nativity and political proclivities would secure his household from outrage. His uneasiness increased, however, and amounted to positive alarm when he beheld, in the direction of a neighboring farm-house, at about two miles distance, a ruddy flame, ominously suggestive of a conflagration.

"I can't stand this no longer, Susie," he said, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, and looking out into the night. "That's Jess Pate's house a blazing sure, and he as good a Southern Rights man as any in Missouri. I'm goin' to saddle the mare, and ride over to see about it. But I'll come up every thing, and lie low and keep close till I come back."

"I'd rather have you stop, father." The girl put her arms about him, old Dinah's wistful glance fixed upon her countenance.

"Don't go, massa," the negress said, earnestly; "de's all de boys dar, sure; an' dey'll be glad wan any berry wicked work done he always rosin up wid whisky. S'posin' dey kill you, what become of Miss Susie, den?"

The farmer started and shuddered. "I can't think that of 'em," he muttered; "—but—but ought I to risk it? I'll try and keep low out of the old shanty for ten minutes, I know, if they were minded to burn it, and then put fire to it, and it'll look like pine shingles. Pete! hitch up the horses—both of 'em—to the big wagon, and do it right smart, Sir! Dinah, you'll get together that linsey petticoat—I'm goin' to tote the bull of ye down to Hudson's!"

Very few words sufficed to explain his intentions. Conscious of the danger which another hour might bring, Jennifer was quick enough to secure a few of what they supposed would prove a mere temporary change of residence. Paul Jennifer's intention was to drive rapidly and scarcely think within fifteen minutes they were all safely bestowed in the "big wagon"—packages of provisions and clothing collected together with as many lighter and more valuable articles of furniture as could be thrown into the vehicle, and the family, with the exception of Pete's assistance, turned the cattle loose and drove them off (preferring the chance of loss to that of the most certain slaughter by the rebels), mounted to the front of the wagon to begin a night journey of twenty miles to the quiet village of Hudson.

It was at first very dark and silent, for the moon did not rise till late in the night, and then in a faint, gusty sigh of wind swept over the dell, treeless landscape, in harmony with and adding to the melancholy of the time. Those months would convert it into a sea of grass, decked with innumerable flowers of every color, and also into a wide ocean and hum of insects, as variegated in hue and no less delicate in form; but it is at present the barrenest month of the year, and the middle of the February aspect, appears a waste of mud. The wagon-wheels sink into it, the horses' heels plash, and only by certain certain paths well known to the driver is progress rendered possible.

He says but little, and that in a low tone, his own utter thoughts respecting its necessity, engrossing his attention. His daughter, watched by the solicitude of a love of fifteen years, sits beside him. Dinah, leaning against a white and bent dully children by his side, and Pete, perched perhaps five miles, when the wagon-wheels stick in a deeper rut than ordinary, necessitating the descent of himself and the raising of the negro boy to effect their dislodgement. What blankets the old man's check as his eye turns toward the direction from which they are retreating? what provokes a cry of surprise from Pete? Not the distant reflection of the burning house. But an unwonted light has broadened over the plain, a light, bright, light flame is nearer by full six miles. It is Jennifer's farm-house on fire.

The farmer gazes a while with set teeth and a savage brow, helps the vehicle out of the slough; proceeds to his usual pace, and then quietly without a word. Presently his daughter's hand touches his sleeve. She has witnessed the conflagration from the wagon, in company with the sympathizing Dinah.

"We are here, father, she says simply. He bends forward and kisses her on the forehead, and they fall into earnest conversation. The bitter less has involved in finding himself by a few simple and homeless wanderer, from those whose treason he had virtually abetted by his own hospitality. Susie had virtually abetted by his own hospitality. Susie had the soothings of a dearly-loved daughter, to whom affection, combined with the recollection of her dead mother, has already taught loyalty. After an hour's talk Jennifer again kisses his daughter, saying:

"Well, girl, perhaps you are right and I'm wrong, after all. I see hard with John, I grant; and, Susie Gal, you can't stand between a boy and love. Now lie down and try to have a sleep."

She obeys him, or seems to do so, praying, in sorrowful thankfulness, both for him and her absent lover. And in due time the motion of the vehicle, the cracking and straining of the harness, the sensation of being warmly wrapped up within, the consciousness of the raw, dank night without, induces slumber, complete and overpowering.

She slept she knew not how long, to be aroused by her father, who, with a new source of surprise and apprehension in his voice, bids her look forth and tell him what she sees. Dinah, already awake, and incapable, from disuse of vision, of adding to the powers of observation of the party, is watching her master's countenance in agitation and alarm.

"There, gal, what do you see there?" inquires Jennifer, pointing toward the west, where the moon is just rising.

Something dark, indistinct, and distant, upon the road they are traveling; something moving and coming toward them. A body of men, progressing steadily forward. A company of marching soldiers.

"If they turn out as bad as these we've left behind we're in a pretty fix," said Jennifer, bitterly, the last identity of the coming object had been determined upon; "what should sojers do here, I wonder?"

"They may be Union men, father," suggested Susie, with a beating heart.

"I hope they are," returned her father, savagely, "and bound to chop the infernal villains that have burned us out of house and home into mincemeat. However, we'll soon know for certain; we can't avoid meeting 'em." And, half in desperation, half in impatience, he gave the horses a cut with the lash, urging them forward with violent gesticulation.

Some minutes of such dire suspense as those intervening between themselves and the marching soldiers had never before agitated the breasts of the little party. They must soon be upon Susie Jennifer, with a scream of joy, recognizes at their head, as captain, her lover, John Elliot.

A very brief explanation accounts for its appearance and for the sudden difficulty that followed. It was that part of the country, as rumored in the afternoon gossip of Judge Jones, in pursuance of a general plan to attack the secessionist camp allluded to. The reports of the outrages committed by the rebels had induced John Elliot's determination for the safety of the Jennifer household, and stimulated a forced encampment near it, for that reason. That thanks and the mutual felicitations which followed need not be chronicled. Detailing a few men to escort the party to their destination, Captain Elliot had expressed his determination of continuing his march for the purpose of punishing the incendiaries. It was with some difficulty that the injured farmer was dissuaded from accompanying him.

"I'll arrange you, Squire, in spite of it," said the Captain. "They don't expect us, and will be used up with the devil's work they've been after. Mr. Bo-ney, we took a prisoner over the Corners whom I think you're interested in."

"Who's that, sir?"

"Judge Jones. He was hiding in a loft for fear of Unionists; but he mistook our boys for Secesh and—Dinah is not at all—and some rat and bragged of his fondness for 'em, and his devotion to the South. If you had seen how white he turned, and how he tried first to beg and then to bribe himself off when he found himself under arrest, I think you'd have allowed the existence of a courage."

"I have already, John, and some others into the bargain. Whip those ——scoundrels; come back safe and sound; and you shall be my son-in-law just as soon as you can get leave upon it."

The groom of the hand he received in response—the love-light that shone in John Elliot's eyes at parting with the person immediately referred to—was such as to make the bridegroom apprehensions for his sake—were eloquent of hope and thankfulness. He then gave the order for marching—to be taken on the road to the Jennifer farm of the promise. There is now in Western Missouri no braver officer than Colonel Elliot; no more loyal citizen than Paul Jennifer.

DOWN BEYOND THE SAW-MILL.

"WHITHER going, Daisy Allen?
Where away with gipsy hat
Slung across your shoulder free?
Tying down the saucy flat,
Touching lightly faithful Bruno,
Daisy turned her pretty head;
"Going down beyond the saw-mill,"
Thus the little maiden said.

"Gentians pale are always blooming
Just beyond the water-wheel,
And the wild rose scents the water
At the fall begins to reel;
In the brook are snowy pebbles,
And they shine as flakes of silver,
While the whirring of the saw-mill
Seems to haste the water's flow."

* * * * *

"Whither going, Daisy Allen,
Now the sun is in the west,
And his golden light lingers
On the distant mountain's crest?"
Why did Daisy's accents falter,
And her cheeks grow white,
Saying, "Just beyond the saw-mill,"
With an eye so strangely bright?

Ah! no blossom pale the gathers,
No flower wet with falling spray
From the brook so shining pebble
Seeks the wandering girl to-day;
Words so soft and strangely varying,
Making music appear the sight,
Whispered one beyond the saw-mill—
"Father—mother—home—good-night!"

* * * * *

An old man, pale, and wan, and weary,
Walked in sunset's fading light;
If any asked him who he wandered,
Golden tresses wet to brown;
Pale lips that can tell no story,
But their secret to the world.
In the shadow of the saw-mill
Daisy Allen sleepeth well.

Gentians pale are blooming yonder,
And the rose-leaves flutter down—
Down on something white and ghastly,
Golden tresses wet to brown;
Pale lips that can tell no story,
But their secret to the world.
In the shadow of the saw-mill
Daisy Allen sleepeth well.

CAPTAIN W. D. PORTER, OF THE "ESSEX."—[SKETCHED BY MR. BILL D. TRAVIS.]

THE UNION EXPEDITION UP THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

On this page we illustrate the WELCOME of the Union men in Tennessee and Alabama to the gun-boats which ascended the Tennessee River after the fight at Fort Henry. The dispatch to the Associated Press said:

After the capture of Fort Henry, the Lexington, Commander, and Tyler gave chase to the rebel steamer Dunbar, and on reaching the Memphis and Louisville Railroad bridge set fire to a portion of it, and captured some stores, etc. They then passed on in chase of the Dunbar, but did not overtake her. It is supposed that she escaped by running up a creek.

Tuesday night the gun-boats went to Florence, Alabama, the head of navigation, and two hundred and fifty miles from Paducah. Every where along the river they were received with astonishing welcome by numerous Union families in Southern Tennessee and Northern Alabama, and at the towns along the river the old flag was looked upon as a redeemer, and hailed with loud shouts of joy. The people of Florence are so delighted at finding the Stars and Stripes once more giving protection to them that they were prepared to give a grand ball to the officers of the gun-boats, but the latter could not remain to accept their courtesies.

Wherever our boats landed, and the people became assured that we did not come to destroy, but to save, they seemed to have no means too extravagant to express their delight and joy.

Old men cried like children at the sight of the Stars and Stripes, and invited the officers and men of the gun-boats to their houses, and told them all they had was at their disposal. Large numbers were anxious to enlist under the old flag, and the Tyler brought down two hundred and fifty men to fill up the gun-boats' crews.

The officers were assured that they could walk a few days' distance and no one would be injured, and if the Government would give them arms to defend themselves they could bring Tennessee back into the Union in a few months.

They said that when the secession ordinance was passed armed men stood at the polls, and every thing went as certain politicians said.

At Savannah, Eastport, and Florence the officers and men of our gun-boats were taken without arms, and mingled freely with the people.

The Union men along the river comprise the wealthy and influential of the inhabitants, large numbers of whom have AMERICAN FLAGS.

Not a gun was fired either going or coming.

CAPTAIN PORTER.

We publish herewith, from a sketch by Mr. Bill D. Travis, a portrait of CAPTAIN W. D. PORTER, of the gun-boat Essex, who distinguished himself at the battle of Fort Henry, and was scalded by the explosion of a boiler on board the Essex.

Captain Porter is a Louisianian by birth. His father was the famous Commodore Porter, of the Essex, whose fame shines brightly in our naval annals. In 1823 the son entered the navy as a boy on board the United States ship Franklin, under command of Commodore Stewart, and received a fine naval military education, under Commodores Hull, Chauncey, Patterson, and Rodgers. He projected and is the founder of the present light-house system; was through the whole Mexican war, where he did noble service; in 1855 was placed on a retired list by a secret Navy Board; four years after was restored to his rank as commander by President Buchanan; was then appointed to the command of the United States ship St. Marys, and did important service in Northern Mexico.

On the outbreak of the rebellion he was ordered home from the Pacific; and though he had property in Virginia, which has been confiscated, and all his family save his youngest daughter were in the rebel cause, still he proved faithful to the noble old Government, in the service of which his father spent his life. Laying aside all personal considerations, he tendered his aid in putting down the rebellion, and was assigned to a boat which has been built chiefly under his superintendence. He christened it, after his father's ship, the Essex. At the battle of Fort Henry Captain Porter ran up within one hundred and fifty yards of the fort, and fought with daring and effect until he was recalled by the fatal ball which entered at one of the bow-ports, passing through the boiler. He was blown out of the same port, and would have been lost but for the heroic daring of a seaman, John Walker, who rushed through the scalding steam after him, and caught him just as he was going overboard, and carried him aft along the outer-guard, a space just nine inches in width. Of this act the Captain speaks in the most grateful terms.

The Captain had the presence of mind to close his mouth and eyes, so that his scald is not serious. He is under the very tender and efficient care of Surgeon Thomas Rice, who proved his skill by the manner in which he attended the wounded on board the Essex after and during the battle.

It is hoped that the Captain's face will not be disfigured. He says he went into the fight with high colors, and though disabled, the stars and stripes still waved as he floated back.

A STRANGE STORY.

By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

MARGRAVE now entered the litter, and the Veiled Woman drew the black curtain round him. I walked on, as the guide, some yards in advance. The air was still, heavy, and perfumed with the breath of the Australasian sirocco.

We passed through the meadow-lands, studded with slumbering flocks; we followed the branch of the creek that wound up to its source in the mountains; we threaded the gloom of stunted, misshapen trees, guarded with the stringy bark which makes one of the signs of the wrath that nourish and, at length the pass, now with all her pomp of light, mid-heaven among her subject stars, gleamed through the flaunts of the cave, on whose floor lay the relics of antediluvian races, and rested in one flood of silvery splendor upon the hollows of the ancient volcano, with tufts of dank herbage and wide spaces of paler sward covering the gold below.—Gold, the almost universal organized Matter's great mystery, storing in itself, according as Mind, the Informer of Matter, can distinguish its uses, evil and good, curse and blessing.

Hitherto the Veiled Woman had remained in the rear, with the white-robed, idolatrous image that had crept to my side unawares, with its noiseless step. Now, in each revolving turn of the difficult path at which the convoy, following behind me, came into sight, I had seen first the two priests bowed armed men, next the black bier-like litter, and last the Black-veiled Woman and the White-robed Skeleton.

But now, as I halted on the table-land, backed by the mountain and fronting the valley, the woman left her companion, passed the litter and the armed men, and paused by my side, at the mouth of the mouldy cavern.

There for a moment the stood, silent, the procession below mounting upward laboriously and slowly, she turned to me, and her veil was withdrawn.

The face on which I gazed was wondrously beautiful, and severely pale. Not, indeed, whether youth nor age—a beauty mature and majestic as that of a marble Demeter!

"Do you believe in that which you seek?" she asked, in her foreign, melodious, melancholy accents.

"I have no belief," was my answer. "True science has none. True science questions all things, takes nothing upon credit. It knows but three states of mind—Denial, Conviction, and that vast unexplored between the two, which is not belief, but suspense of judgment."

The woman let fall her veil, moved from me, and seated herself in a crag above which the between mountain and creek, to which, when I had first discovered the gold with which the land teemed, the rain from the clouds had given the rushing life of the cataract, but which now, in the drought and the bath of the skies, was but a dead pile of stones.

The litter now ascended the height; its bearers behind it. I heard none the curtains aside, and Margrave descended, leaning, this time, not on the black-veiled woman, but on the white robed skeleton.

There, as he stood, the moon shone full on his wasted form; on his face, resolute, cheerful, and proud, despite its hollowed outlines and sickbed hues. He raised his head, spoke to the baggage unknown to me, and the armed men and the litter-bearers grouped round him, bending low, their eyes fixed on the ground. The Veiled Woman rose slowly and came to his side, motioning away with a mute sign the two priests on which he leaned, and passing round him silently instead her own sustaining arm. Margrave again spoke a few sentences, of which I could not even guess the meaning. When he had concluded, the armed men and the litter-bearers came nearer to his feet, knelt down, and kissed his hand. They then rose, and took from the bier-like vehicle the coffer and the urn. This done, they lifted again the litter, and again, preceded by the armed men, the procession descended down the sloping hill-side, down into the valley below.

Margrave now whispered for some moments into the ear of the hideous creature who had made way for the Veiled Woman. The grim skeleton bowed his head submissively, and moved noiselessly away through the long grasses; the slender arms, trampled under the white robe, relifting themselves, as after a passing wind. And thus he too sank out of sight down into the valley below. On the table-land I and the Veiled Woman, and the three—Margrave, myself, and the Veiled Woman.

She had resumed herself apart, on the gray crag above the dried torrent. He stood at the entrance of the cavern, round the sides of which clustered parietal plants, with flowers of all colors, some emitting their sickening pistol odor, exhaling their fragrance only in the hours of night; so that, as his form filled up the jaws of the dark arch, observing the moon-rays that strove to pierce the shadows that slept within, it stood now—wan and blighted—as I had seen it first, radiant and joyous. "literally framed of blooms."

CHAPTER LXXXII.

"SO," said Margrave, turning to me, "under the soil that spreads around us lies the gold, which to you and to me is at this moment of no value, except as a guide to its twin-born—the regenerator of life!"

"You have not yet described to me the nature of this substance which we are to explore," nor of the process by which the virtues you impute to it are to be extracted."

"Let us first find the gold, and instead of describing the life-amber, so let me call it, I will point it out to your own eyes. As to the process, your share in it is so simple, that you will ask me why I seek aid from a chemist. The life-amber, when found, must be first subjected to heat and fermentation for six hours; it will be placed in a small caldron which that coffer contains, over the fire which I will first feed. To give effect to the process, certain alkalis and other ingredients are required, which I have prepared, and mine is the task to commingle them. Of your science as chemist I need ask nothing. Nay, I know that you have read the life of a Man."

"If that be so, why indeed seek me at all? why ask confide in those swarthy attendants who doubtless are slaves to your orders?"

"Confide in them? No! I have task enjoined to them would be to discover, and refrain from purloining, gold. Seven such unscrupulous knaves, and I know them well, have obedience and feeble! Such is not the work that vile manners are suited to pursue. But that is the least of the reasons which exclude them from my choice, and fix my choice of assistant on you. You can forget what I bid you do; danger which the Dervish declared no bribe I could offer could tempt him a second time to serve?"

"I remember now; those words had passed from my mind."

"And because they had passed away from your mind, I chose you for assistant. I need a man by whom danger is scorned."

"But in the process of which you tell me I see no possible danger. Why should ingredients you mix in your caldron have poisonous fumes."

"It is not that. The ingredients I use are not poisons."

"What other danger, except you dread your own Eastern enemies, the Jins, can be added to these solitudes? and if so, why not bid me be armed?"

"The Eastern slaves have, ere now, fulfilled my commands; they wait for my summons where their eyes can not see what we do. Those slaves are a kind on which the boldest son of the East would be more craven perhaps than the dastiest Sybarite of Europe. Fear not them, fear not the panther and laugh at a ghost. In the creed of the Dervish, and of all who adventure deeply in realms of nature which is closed to philosophy and open to magic, there are races in the material world as dreadless as inhabitants of the Moon world of a drop. 'For the tribes of the drop science has its microscope. Of the hosts of you nares Infinite, science knows nothing. Of the Jins, gains, by command, consumed over fluid conductors that are to them as the lightning. Of these races some are wholly indifferent to man, some benign to him, and some dreadly hostile. But all are subjected to conditions unknown to mortal being this magic realm seems as blank and tenantless as your vast sea. Nor does the ken of its, strives to pass over those boundaries at which philosophy says, 'Knowledge ends,' that is like all other travelers it beguiles unknown; he must propitiate or brave the tribes that inhabit the waters, and that by life on the tribes that are friendly. Though your science discredits the alchemist's dogma, your knowledge tells you that all substances were not ignorant impostors; yet those whose discoveries most approach to ours, whose chief allies to your practical knowledge ever hint in their mystical works at the reality of that realm which is open to magic—even they, whose means lesh familiar than furnace and bellows are essential to the alchemist, never name to life. He who once quaffs that elixir obtains in his very veins the bright fluid by which he transmits the will of his will to agencies unknown to nature, to giants unseen in the space. And here, as he passes the boundary which divides his allotted and material universe from the regions and races that magic alone can explore, so here he must learn to be safeguard from the wrath and the tribes that are hostile. It is not ever thus between man and man. Let a race, the most gentle and unarmed, occupy the land on which a river or mountain, and another have home in the waters beneath, and, if it have not the barrier between them, may with each live in peace. But if ambitious adventurers scale the mountain, or cross the river, with designs to subject and enslave the populations they boldly invade, then all the invaded arm in wrath and defiance. Their habits are changed into foes. And, therefore, this process, by which a simple though rare material of nature is made to yield the life-amber, is soon of a life which brings with its glorious resistance to Time desires and faculties to subject to the sovereign that dwells in the soil, the air, and the deep, has ever been one of the most fatal wonders to the human race. Once it crosses the bounds of his nation. By it a key alone you unlock all the cells of the adjacent bee; by this alone you command all the hive, which a chemist's crudest apprentice could destroy. Hence arises the universal belief in the dwarfed children of science. Nature, that stores this priceless boon, seems to shrink from conceding it to man—the invisible tribes that abhor him oppose themselves to the gain that might give them a master. The dullor of these, who were the life-seekers of old, would have told you some chance, the most trivial, unlooked for, foiled their grand hope at the very point of fruition; some doltish mistake, some improvident oversight; a defect in the alembic, a cold overlooked in quicksilver, or a flaw in the bellows, or a pupil, who had but to replenish the fuel, fell asleep by the furnace. The invisible foes seldom vouchsafe to make themselves visible where they can frustrate the bungler, as they need to in his toils from their ambush. But the mightier adventurers, equally foiled in despite of their patience and skill, would have said, 'Not with us rests the fault; we neglected no caution, we failed from no oversight. But out from the rock, from the mountain cave, and the spectre or demons dismayed and baffled us.' Such, then, is the danger which seems so appalling to a con ceit of science. It seemed to a seer in the dark age of Europe. But we can deride all its threats, and say, 'Be it so! I own fearlessly that I have all the safety that the charms and resources of magic bestow. You, for your safety, have the good and disciplined reason which reduces all phantasies to nervous impressions, and I rely on the courage that can laugh to contempt at quailing the Luminous Shadow, and wrested from the hoof of the magician himself the wand which conceals or reveals the Infernal.'

"To this strange and long discourse I listened without interruption, and now quietly answered,

"I do not merit the trust you affect in my courage; but I am now on my guard against the chains of the sophist. And the human eye alone can scarcely bewilder the brain in the open air of this mountain-land. I will not be misled like those which you tell me vicwless in space, as do gases. I believe not in magic; I ask not its aids, and I disdain its fears. I will but rest I am confident of one mournful courage—the courage that comes from despair. And, whatever you may be, whatever it be, as a sufferer whom colleges doom to the grave submits to the quack, when he can only specify some hope I live! My life is naught in itself; my life lives in another. You and I are both brave from despair; you, who had nothing from youthful vitality turn death from one I love more than myself. Both know how little and how vain from the colleges, and both, therefore, turn to the promises most audaciously cheering: Dervish or Magician, alchemist or phantom, I trust you, and I? And if they fail us, what then?' They can not fail us more than the colleges do!"

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

THE gold had been gained with an easy labor. I knew where to seek for it, whether under the soil or in the bed of the creek. With shining eyes, hungrily gazing round every spot from which the ore was disturbed, could not detect one substance of value. Margrave was of more wizard appearance. I had begun to believe that even in the descriptions given by him of the life-amber, he had been credulously duped, and that no such material existed; when coming back from the bed of the water-course, I saw that the yellow gleam amidst the roots of a giant parasitic plant, the leaves and blossoms of which were of the hues of the ore—it was the life-amber. The gleam was the gleam of gold, and an experienced eye would pause at the sight of the plant we came on— No, I will not—I dare not describe it. The gold-digger would cast it from his dreaming eyes, would pause not to look, and did I describe it, and chemistry deign to subject it to analysis, would chemistry alone detect or discover its boasted virtues?

Its particles, indeed, are very minute, not assuming exactly the form of each; each enfolds each in itself of uniform shape and size, spherical as the egg which contains the germ of life, and small as the egg from which the life of an insect may quicken.

But Margrave's keen eye caught sight of the atoms upcast by the light of the moon He exclaimed to me, "Found! I shall live!" And then, as he gathered up the grains with tremulous hands, he called out to the Veiled Woman, who remained motionless where I had left her. At his word she rose and went to the place hard by, where the fuel was piled, busying herself there. He had no leisure to look after her. Intently in search in the soft and yielding soil that time and the decay of vegetable life had accumulated over the Pre-Adamite rock, he dug out the roots of the rare vested its mighty keystones.

When we had collected of these particles about thrice as much as a man might hold in his hand, we seemed to have exhausted their bed. We continued still to find gold, but no more of the delicate substance to which, in our sight, gold was so dross.

"Enough," then said Margrave, reluctantly desisting. "What we have gained already will suffice for a life-time, if the legend attributes to Haroun. I shall live—I shall live through the centuries."

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

WHILE we had thus labored and found, Aysha had placed the fuel where the moonlight fell fullest on the sward of the table-land—a part of it already piled as for a fire, the rest of it heaped carefully close at hand—and by the side of the fuel the coffer and the urn. Since she stood, her arms folded under her mantle, her dark image seeming darker still as the moonlight silvered all the ground from which it rose. Margrave opened his coffer, the Veiled Woman did not aid him, and I watched in silence, while he as silently made his weird and wizard-like preparations.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

ON the ground a wide circle was traced by a small rod, tipped apparently with sponge saturated with some combustible, naphtha-like fluid, so that a pale lambent flame followed the course of the rod as Margrave guided it. Within up the herbage over which it played, and leaving a distinct ring, like that which in our lovely native fable-talk we call the "Fairy Ring," but no more visible, because marked in phosphorescent light. On the ring thus formed Margrave placed twelve small lamps, fed with the fluid from the same vessel and lighted by the same rod. The light emitted from these lamps was more vivid and brilliant than that which circled round the ring.

Within the circumference, and concentric to round-the wood-pile, Margrave traced certain geometrical figures in which, not without a shudder, I observed that he drew at times the effigies of will in murmuring to myself the name of "Lilian," I recognized the intersecting triangles of the talisman, and in the spell enforced on a sleep-walker, had described on the floor of the wizard's parlor. Within these figures he traced, like the circle, in flame, and at the point of each triangle (four in number) was placed a lamp, similar to that of the ring. This, last, was performed, the caldron, based on an iron tripod, was placed on the wood-pile, and then the urn having, before inactive and unheeding, slowly undergazed, knelt by the pile, and lighted it. The fire would crackle and the flame burst bright, licking the rims of the caldron with tongues of fire.

Margrave flung into the caldron the particles he had collected, poured over them first a liquid colorless as water, from the largest of the vessels drawn from the coffer, then, more sparingly, drops from small crystal vials, like the vials I had seen in the hand of Philip Derval.

The mixture simmered over the flames of awe. I watched these proceedings, curious yet distrustful, as one who watches the mummeries of an enchanter on the stage.

"If," thought I, "there are but artful devices to inebriate the sense, and by excitement, my imagination is on its guard, and reason shall not, this time, be the dupe of fancy."

"And now," said Margrave, "I consign to you the easy task by which you are to merit your share of the gold. It is my task to feed and replenish the caldron; it is Ayesha's to heed the fire, which must not for a moment relax in its measured and steady heat. Mine task is the lightest of all; it is but to renew from this vessel the fluid which burns in the lamps on the ring. Observe, the contents of the vessel must be thriftily husbanded; there is enough, but not more than enough, to sustain the lights in the lamps, on the lines traced round the caldron and on the figures within the circle. Three thousand pounds dissolved in this fluid are scarce—only obtainable in the East, and even in the East the quantity that can be procured at one time has increased my supply. I had no months to waste. Replenish than the light only when it begins to flicker or fade. Take heed that no drop from any part of the outer ring—no, not an inch—and no drop of the twelve, that are in circular like stars, fade for one moment in darkness."

I took the crystal vessel from his hand.

"The vessel is small," said I, "and what if yet left of its contents is but scanty; whether you suffer me to replenish the lights I can not guess, even but with your instructions. But more important by far than the light to the lamps and the circle, which Asia or Africa might seem away the wild beasts unknown to this land—more important than light to a lamp is the strength to your flame, with your leave? What will support you through six weary hours of night-watch?"

"Hope!" answered Margrave, with a ray of his old dazzling smile. "Hope! I shall live—I shall live through the centuries!"

CHAPTER LXXXVI

ONE hour passed away; the fagots under the caldron burned clear, but with no glowing air. The materials within began to seethe, and their color, at first dull and brick, changed into a pale rose hue. From time to time the Veiled Woman replenished the fire, after she had done so ceaselessly for about two hours, and then her head bowed over her knees and her face hid under her veil.

The lights in the lamps and along the ring and the triangles now began to pale. I replenished their nourishment. The flame within the caldron started my eye or my ear beyond the rim of the circle. Nothing audible save, at a distance, the musical, whistling cry of the herons, and, further still in the forest, the howl of the wild dogs that never bark. Nothing visible but the trees and the mountain range girding the plains silvered by the moon, and the arch of the cavern, and the dark, still blooms and the pale, dead the gleam of dry bones on its floor where the moonlight shot into the gloom.

The second hour passed like the first. I had taken my stand by the side of Margrave, watching with him the caldron and the lamps, further still in the forest, the howl of the wild dogs that never bark. Nothing visible but the trees and the mountain range girding the plains silvered by the moon, and the arch of the cavern, and the dark, still blooms and the pale, dead the gleam of dry bones on its floor where the moonlight shot into the gloom.

The second hour passed like the first. I had taken my stand by the side of Margrave, watching with him the caldron and the lamps, further still in the forest, the howl of the wild dogs that never bark. Nothing visible but the trees and the mountain range girding the plains silvered by the moon, and the arch of the cavern, and the dark, still blooms and the pale, dead the gleam of dry bones on its floor where the moonlight shot into the gloom.

"I know not, I care not," he answered, impatiently. "The essence is burning the child that confined it. Here are my air and my earth! Trouble me not. Look to the circle—feed the lamps if they fail."

I passed by the Veiled Woman as I walked toward a place in the ring in which the flame was waning dim. And I whispered to her the same question which I had whispered to Margrave. She answered briefly, and somewhat coldly,

"So is it before the Invisible make themselves visible! Did I not bid him forbear?" Her head again drooped on her breast, and her watch was again fixed on the fire.

I advanced to the circle, and stooped to replenish the light there was it waned. As I did so, on my arm, which stretched somewhat beyond the line of the ring, I felt a shock like that of electricity. The arm fell to my side numbed and nerveless, and from my hand dropped, but within the ring, the vessel that contained the fluid. Recovering my surprise or my stun, hastily with the other hand I caught up the vessel, but some of the scanty liquid was already spilled on the sward; and I saw with a thrill of dismay that contracted, indeed, the natural indifference with which I had first undertaken my charge, how small a supply was now left me.

I went back to Margrave and told him of the shock, and of its consequence in the waste of the liquid.

"Beware," said he, "that not a motion of the arm, not an inch of the foot, passes the verge of the ring; and if the fluid be thus unhappily misted, reserve all that is left for the protecting circle and the twelve outer lamps. See how the grand Work advances! how the hues in the cadron are glowing blood-red through the film on the surface!"

And now four hours of the six were gone; my arm had gradually recovered its strength. Neither the ring nor the lamps had again required replenishing; perhaps their light was exhausted less quickly, as it was no longer at once exposed to the rays of the intense Australian moon. Clouds had gathered over the sky, and though the moon gleamed at times in the gaps that they left in blue air, her beam was more hazy and dulled. The locusts no longer were heard in the grass, nor the howl of the dogs in the forest. Out of the circle the stillness was profound.

And about this time I saw distinctly in the distance a vast Eye! It drew nearer and nearer, seeming to move from the ground at the height of some lofty giant. Its gaze riveted mine; my blood curdled in the veins, and its angry ball; and now as it advanced, larger and larger, other Eyes, as if of giants in its train, grew out from the space in its rear; centred on numbers, like the spear-heads of some Eastern army, soon all by pale worlds of baleful orbs loomed to the dust. My voice long refused an utterance to my awe; at length it burst forth, shrill and loud:

"Look—look! Those terrible Eyes! Legions on legions. And ah! this ring of numberless feet; they are not seen, but the hollows of earth echo the sound of their march!"

Margrave, more than ever intent on the cadron, in which, from time to time, he kept dropping powders or essences drawn forth from his coffer, looked up, defyingly, fiercely:

"Ye come," he said, in low mutter, his once mighty voice sounding hollow and hoarse, but fearless and firm—"ye come, not to conquer, vain rebels!—ye, whose dark chief I struck down at my feet in the tomb where my spell had raised up the ghost of your first human master, the Chaldee! Earth and air have the limits ye were fashfol to me, and still I remember the warning that summons them up to confront you! Ayesha—Ayesha! recall the shadows that ye pledged among foes; recall the dread bond by which we united our sway over hosts that yet rein thee as spoken, though not named by me, by my diadem reft from my brow!"

The Voice Woman rose at this adjuration. Her veil now was withdrawn, and the blaze of the fire between Margrave and herself flushed, as with the rich bloom of youth, the pallid beauty of her softened face. It was seen, detached, as it were, from her dark-robed form; seen through the mist of the vapors which rose from the cadron, framing it round like the clouds that are sublimely pierced by the light of the evening star.

Through the haze of the vapor came her voice, more musical, more plaintive than I had heard it before, but far softer, more tender; still in her foreign tongue; the words seemed to me to be yet their sense, perhaps, made intelligible by the low, which has one common language and one common look to all who hear. Never, more unmistakably heard in the loving tone, unmistakably seen in the loving face.

A moment or so more, and she had come round from the opposite side of the fire pile, and, bending over Margrave's upturned face, spoke to him quietly, solemnly; and then her countenance grew fierce, her crest rose erect; it was the lioness protecting her young. She stretched forth her arm from the black mantle, athwart the pale front that now again began to rise in menace; stretched it toward the haunted and hollow-sounding space beyond, in the gesture of one whose right hand has the ear of the Invisible! And then her voice stole on the air in the music of a chant—loud, yet far-reaching, like the flow, so sweet, and yet so solemn, that I could at once comprehend how legend united of old the spell of enchantment with the power of song. All that I recalled of the effects which in the former time Margrave's strange chants had produced on the ear that they ravished and the thoughts they confused was but as the wild bird's imitative carol, repeating the air it has caught, and the art, and the soul of the singer, whose power seemed endowed with a charm to enthrall all the vices of creation, those that are natural, it used for that charm might to them, as to me, be unknown. As the song ceased I heard from behind sounds like those I had heard in the forest before me: the tramp of invisible feet, the whirr of invisible wings, as if armies were marching to aid genuine armies in march to desert.

"Look not in front nor around," said Ayesha. "Look, like him, on the caldron below. The circle and the lamps are yet bright; I will tell thee when their light again fails."

I dropped my eyes on the caldron.

"See," whispered Margrave, "the sparkles at last begin to arise, and the rose-hues to deepen: signs that we near the last transition."

Major Winthrop's New Novel.

The Publishers announce that

JOHN BRENT,

BY THE LATE THEODORE WINTHROP,

has reached a FIFTH EDITION in ten days after publication. It is universally pronounced a book of superior interest, even to "CECIL DREEME."

(From the N. Y. Evening Post.)

"John Brent' is a tale of adventure on the Western Prairies, in which the author's chief rapidly from Cuba Scenes to Chicago, and afterwards from New York to London. The characters are few and the incidents few, but the plot has a hold on interest, and the events are thrilling. Major Winthrop is a writer of no ordinary talent, and the present work is marked by the description, full of the fresh life of the great Western Plains, and yet so poetic and grand as to say romance of Chivalry.

OUR VICTORY.

RING out, O bells! a joyous peal!
  Wave, Freedom's flag, o'er land and sea!
Above the graves of Freedom's slain
Let living voices shout again
  In honor of our victory!

'Tis but a little while ago,
  Since, looking on our list of dead,
We marveled Justice should delay:
Thank God! at last has dawned her day,
  The sky is in a blaze of red!

Deep, fiery clouds surround the sun,
  Thrice welcome now the storm shall be;
'Twill purify our atmosphere,
Once more the pathway shall be clear
  Where walk the sons of liberty.

Ours is no haughty tyrant's glee,
  To chain our brothers at our feet;
Over no nation's wrongs we vaunt,
Columbia saved is all we want;
  For her sake is our triumph sweet.

Then ring, O bells! a joyous peal!
  Wave, Freedom's flag, o'er land and sea!
Above the graves of Freedom's slain
Let living voices shout again
  In honor of our victory!

THE REBEL INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

ON Saturday, February 22, while the Congress, Judges, and naval and military officers of the United States were assembled in the Capitol, listening to the Farewell Address of Washington, the miserable remnant of the Southern rebels were gathered in the principal square of Richmond, Virginia, listening to Mr. Jefferson Davis's last apology for his crimes.

Toward that square and to that speaker one can well imagine the ruined, heart-broken, panic-stricken, and despairing people of the South turning an eager ear, in search of consolation for the past and hope for the future.

Jefferson Davis gave them neither.

Beginning with a false statement of the causes which led to the rebellion, wholly omitting from view the chief cause, namely, the greed of the slave-owners, and the truculent ambition of the Southern aristocracy; failing likewise, for the best of reasons, to assign one single cause, or enumerate one single event which could justify the plunging of a continent into savage war; misrepresenting the history of the contest with diabolical perversity; confessing, as he could not well help doing, that "the tide of war is against" the rebels, and that the future is pregnant with more "trials and difficulties," this pretended President can find no consolation for the unhappy people whom he and his fellow-conspirators have ruined, except in the hope that the North may not be able to pay its armies much longer, and that eventually the Powers of Europe may be tempted by the proffer of Southern produce and Southern free trade to espouse the cause of the insurgents, and convert the "proud people" of the South into the bastard subjects of some foreign king!

Well may the South pronounce such a programme "a mockery," and such a government "a lamentable failure!"

There must have been many even among the ragged rabble of Richmond gathered round the orator who knew enough to tell him that if the South, in its poverty, can afford to carry on the war, the North, with its wealth, is not likely to fail from want of money; and that if, when the North was helpless and paralyzed, and the South flushed with victory, foreign nations abstained from meddling in the contest, they are not likely to do so now, when the gripe of a mighty government is clutched round the throat of the traitors, and their gurgling death-rattle is already audible.

There was an ominous fitness in the appearance, during the reading of "the inaugural," of that grim messenger who bore the news of the FALL OF NASHVILLE—Nashville, the prosperous city of the rebellion—Nashville, the safe place to which the trembling traitors proposed to fly from Richmond when that city was deemed insecure—Nashville, the centre of the vertebral artery of the rebellion. Did it not occur to Jefferson Davis that so appalling an event happening at such a moment was a warning and a judgment from that just God whose name this arch-rebel so audaciously blasphemes?

OUR GENERALS.

SOME of the leading journals are rendering a very doubtful service to the country by promoting a feeling of mutual jealousy among our generals, and instilling into the public mind distrust of the most distinguished among them. Two prominent newspapers in this city indulge in daily flings at General M'Clellan. Another is very sarcastic upon General Buell. Others have no patience with General Sherman. Others are furious with General Lane. General Halleck has survived the storm of abuse aroused by his famous Order No. 3, and enjoys a temporary respite from newspaper criticism.

Every one who has read history must at once perceive that this sort of thing can hardly fail to do mischief, and can not possibly do any good. Soldiers are naturally apt to be jealous of each other; and in this country especially, where every leading man may fairly be suspected of having his eye upon the Presidency, the danger that our chief generals may be as anxious to kill each other off as to defeat the enemy is obvious enough. Under the circumstances, it is clearly the duty of every honest and patriotic publicist to check rather than encourage envious rivalry among them. If the friends of General Frémont succeed in shaking the confidence of the army in General M'Clellan, they are much more likely to ruin the national cause than to help their patron. It is possible that General Sherman may be as incompetent as his newspaper critics say; but the reiterated publication of the fact can produce no other effect than to encourage the enemy under General Lee. General Buell may have failed in his duty in permitting the peaceful evacuation of Bowling Green. But he is intrusted with the command of the most important operation of the day, and it can not but dispirit his men, and give heart to his enemy, to publish him a fool.

Generals and politicians are only too prone, as we said, to disparage each other, and to suffer their personal spites to override their zeal for the public interest. People have read, not without regret, an order from General Halleck, in which General M'Clellan is quite needlessly excluded from any share of the glory resulting from the capture of Fort Donelson; and a letter from Secretary Stanton to the Tribune, making light of the plans formed by General M'Clellan when he assumed command of the army, which are now beginning to be carried out. Generals and Secretaries make a mistake if they suppose that this sort of thing injures the party against whom it is directed. The public see through it at once, and infer simply that General Halleck is envious, and that Secretary Stanton wants to be the hero of the war and President.

The American people have sense enough to understand that it is the interest of the President and the Cabinet to succeed in suppressing the rebellion as soon as possible; that their means of forming an opinion with regard to the generals are much superior to those enjoyed by the public or the newspapers; and that, whatever their wishes may be, they can not, for their own sake, afford to keep in responsible positions men who have proved themselves to be incompetent or untrustworthy.

Of General M'Clellan, against whom the bulk of these newspaper assaults are directed, the American people know nothing except that he has impressed every one who knows him—including President Lincoln and General Scott—with his capacity for the station he fills. He has said himself that he has done nothing yet to warrant the fame he enjoys. To hold him responsible for the slavering adulation which has been heaped upon him by ignorant flatterers is disgracefully unjust. And the least that can be said of the sneers and innuendoes which certain journals delight in printing in connection with his name is that Jefferson Davis could afford to pay handsomely for such effective endeavors to demoralize the army which M'Clellan will shortly lead to battle.

THE LOUNGER.

DAYBREAK.

IN his admirable amnesty proclamation the President assumes that the rebellion has culminated, and will henceforth steadily decline; and undoubtedly the general feeling is that the heart of the difficulty has been pierced, and that nothing now remains for it but to bleed to death. Nor can any reasonable man doubt that such is the fact. It is impossible, and will long be so, to determine exactly in what time the full result will be achieved; but the same force and skill which have prevailed in Kentucky and Tennessee, at Roanoke and Port Royal, must prevail at all other points.

Sir William Napier is reported to have said that a soldier is but a slave of chance. But there is undoubtedly a certain military science and exactly calculable laws of war. A much wiser speech was that attributed to Frederick the Great, that God is on the side of the strongest battalions. The rebel General Braxton Bragg repeated it substantially last spring as applied to our war, that the rebels would beat although the rebel section was numerically smaller, because their system of slavery would enable them to bring more fighting men into the field.

The plan of our campaign evidently contemplates the inevitable overwhelming of the rebellion by superior forces. The delay was equally inevitable, for those forces had to be collected and trained. The old figure of General Scott is recalled to the public memory by the result—that the traitors would be caught and crushed in the folds of the anaconda. The coiling has begun, and with it the end is visible. Victory is logically ours. We must organize it into peace.

But no man ought to be dismayed by one thing which is now equally inevitable; and that is the apparent postponement of certain great results which a few months since, in the dark hour of national peril, we all felt were virtually secured. It was supposed then, that to save the Government certain steps, called by Mr. Lincoln in his Message "extreme measures," would be necessary; but that necessity no longer appears. The war was, and is, waged solely for the maintenance of the Government. No other measures than those essential to that result have been or will be taken. And it is now evident that military force alone will suffice, without the full exercise of all military rights, such as general confiscation and the release of the slaves of rebels.

It must not be forgotten that for the last ten months we have been nationally lifted into the sphere of great principles. We have lived under the influence of pure emotions. But no nation can habitually hold to that height. We have been raised upon the tenth wave of a regenerating public sentiment, and it has made its prophetic mark. It has touched the point which the waters of national conviction will at last permanently and surely reach—and we must not be chagrined if the following waves are lower, knowing, as we now do, that the tide is rising.

The question of slavery will not be directly settled by the military power—and it remains to be seen whether some plan of territorial government, whereby every man upon our soil recovers his original rights as a man, will be adopted by Congress and accepted by the country.

If that also fails, those of us who are and have always been unswerving friends of the Government, because under the peaceful operations of the Constitution every question is soluble, have only to gird ourselves for the political debate which will follow the military, and in which all happy omens point to the calm and speedy triumph of Justice and of actual, not of nominal, Peace.

THE WAY OF PEACE.

To suppress a rebellion is not like settling a war with a foreign power. In the latter case, after a series of decisive blows, there is an appeal for negotiation, an armistice, a consultation, a treaty, and the withdrawal of troops. But in quelling a rebellion the way of victory is not necessarily that of peace. You may drive a riot out of the street—you may restore order—quiet may reign in Warsaw; but is quiet peace?

If we follow our success—if we drive the rebels from Nashville as we have from Bowling Green—if Columbus surrenders as Fort Donelson and Fort Henry have yielded—if Memphis, and Savannah, and New Orleans fall into our hands—if Richmond is evacuated by that ghostly Congress of traitors—if the lines of the rebellion recede before our lines—even then the work is not done.

We are said to hold Kentucky and even Tennessee and Missouri; but so we have held Maryland for several months. Is that a success—is that a secure and permanent peace? If our army should leave Maryland even now, who would feel sure of her position for a month? The secret of the loyalty of Baltimore is Fort M'Henry. No, no; when we have suppressed rebellion we are to organize peace. How is that to be done?

Of course it can be done only by destroying, if possible, the occasion of rebellion. The rule in statecraft is the same as in agriculture. You must not knock off the leaves of the weeds; you must dig up their roots. If this rebellion has a root, it is our business to find it and wrench it up.

Is, then, the root slavery, or the agitation of slavery? Of course it is one of the two. The whole energy of the country must therefore be directed first to discover which it is, then to destroy it. If the difficulty be the agitation, then suppress that if you can. If the slavery, then end that.

But what does the agitation spring from? Simply from our humanity, from the fact that we are men. So long as we are human, so long we shall protest against what seems to us to be wrong. To suppress that protest requires a despotism of the sternest kind. The effectual suppression of the agitation of the question could be accomplished only by the destruction of every principle of our Government and every right of man—in other words, only at the price of an endless and ferocious civil war.

But to put an end to slavery requires only thought, care, the preservation of every principle of the Government, and the vindication of every human right; and it results in permanent peace and an actual, not a nominal, Union of the people.

It is not even necessary to invoke the question of right or wrong. We have only to see that in the nature of things so long as slavery lasts so long the agitation will continue. If, then, you can not destroy that, and since the object is peace, why not destroy the other? So long as the right of free discussion lasts the question will be debated. So long as it is debated we shall be slipping into war, because slavery can have no effective argument but brute force. The way of peace, therefore, is inevitably the final settlement of the question.

It is not an occasion for losing temper, for calling names, and for questioning motives, but for the most resolute and effective action. We have seen and are seeing what comes of the question when left to itself. Is it not nearly time we took it in hand, or shall we wait until the difficulty settles itself and us into another war?

THE WISDOM OF WAITING.

THE great victories which appear to indicate the approaching triumph of the Government, also vindicate the sagacity of the General-in-Chief. For nearly seven months General M'Clellan has been waiting, directly and indirectly attacked for delay, for incompetency, and almost, by insinuation, for disaffection. He has been patiently maturing his plans. He had already said, upon receiving the sword from Philadelphia, that the war would be short and sharp. But he had his army to collect and discipline, he had to take care that every plan was made proof against failure, and when all was ready, the word was given and the advance began.

Unquestionably he has taken a purely military view of the question; but he is a military man, and his political views doubtless remain unchanged. His duty as a general-in-chief is to achieve victories. To secure the permanence of the result is the duty of statesmen.

Nor is it any injury to Foote, to Burnside, to Grant, to Goldsborough, to Buell, to Halleck, to all the brave and accomplished leaders of the actual movements, that General M'Clellan is credited with the plan of the campaign. To execute the plan is a duty of gallantry, skill, and heroism of which the glory is all theirs. In truth, in these early days of the victories all along our line, there is no point of it from the Chesapeake to Kansas that does not challenge our admiration; and one of the singular felicities of the war is that the great advance, crowned with entire success, was made both by the army and the navy, upon the sea-board and at the West; so that every part of the loyal section and each branch of the service divide the honors of the triumph. This was all happily expressed in the congratulatory order of the day addressed to the officers, and soldiers, and sailors at the West and at the East, signed by the President as Commander-in-Chief of the army and the navy, and countersigned by the Secretaries of both Departments.

The result, thus far, in every way vindicates the wisdom of the long delay. Impatience is a national fault, and our cause has been imperiled by it. It was desirable for all reasons that our success should not be too sudden or too easy. Had we been victors at Bull Run, we should hardly have rightly estimated the strength and desperation of the rebellion. But we have learned, and learned well, the lesson of defeat; and the victories of Roanoke, of the Tennessee, and the Cumberland have altogether another significance than a victory at Bull Run could have had.

AN OLD FOE VANQUISHED.

THE year is vindicating not only the strength of our domestic Government, but the justice of our foreign system. Among our most signal victories let us not forget to remember that over Great Britain. For, without a blow struck by us, she has surrendered, and totally renounces her traditional and monstrous system of contempt of neutral rights.

In his final dispatch upon the Trent question Earl Russell writes to Lord Lyons: "Your own territory, or ships of your own country, are places of which you are yourself the master. The enemy's territory, or the enemy's ships, are places in which you have the right to exercise acts of hostility. Neutral vessels, guilty of no violation of the laws of neutrality, are places where you have no right to exercise acts of hostility."

Now if forcibly detaining a neutral ship and forcibly removing from her deck persons against whom nothing is alleged, but whom the captain of the compelling ship chooses to call subjects of the power he serves, is not an act of hostility, words have no meaning. Mr. Sumner, indeed, quotes the declaration of George Fourth, of January 9, 1813, that he can not admit such an act to be a hostile measure; but in the face of this last dispatch that declaration falls to the ground. No English statesman would claim that the captain of an English ship could seize in Broadway a person whom he asserted to be a British subject. It would be a most flagrant act of war. But by the terms of the dispatch he makes them equal. "Your own territory, or ships of your own country."

Fifty years ago Great Britain fought us for three years rather than concede this principle. Henceforth she must stand by her bond. The more she concedes to neutral rights the more we shall be satisfied. Mr. Marcy's theory is the only practicable one for the future. Neutral rights must be the same on water as on land. If a neutral is caught directly helping the enemy he does so at his peril. But constructive assistance must be abolished.

"THE DEGRADED MOB."

THE people of the United States, who were represented by Russell and by the London papers as a degraded mob who would force the Government to hold Mason and Slidell at any cost, have shown the essential quality of our system in nothing more than in the results of that affair.

We might have remembered, and yet it was generally forgotten, that the seventy years of our universal popular education would tell in just such an emergency as this. In reasoning upon the rebellion, in its relation to the people of the Free States, we have been naturally, but wrongly, in the habit of considering them as we should consider the people of England, or France, or Germany, forgetting the essential differences of our popular training, and the necessary differences of the results.

If in this country every body who has a right, and who is bound by his duty to take a practical part in public affairs, does not do it, yet there is a universal knowledge of them, and a general sense of responsibility. Hence a clear appeal to that general intelligence will not often fail, if the occasion be truly commanding. And it is this which confirms the faith of every thoughtful American in the practical wisdom of our system.

We have recently had two most signal instances of this flexibility arising from the general intelligence. The first was the surrender of the two traitors. Of course a person like Mr. Russell, who had seen only the working of monarchical or modified feudal systems of society, and who had the traditional prejudices of an Englishman, or, more properly, a Briton, against America, could not understand that a whole people would forego the gratification of their just indignation upon the simple presentation of a principle. It was not surprising that a man who had misunderstood every thing in the country from the moment he landed should prove an utterly false prophet.

For although the public feeling of satisfaction was almost greater at the capture of the men-stealing traitors than at any other event of the war which had then occurred, and although the thinly-masked enmity of Great Britain had alienated evtirely the good feeling that existed in the country toward that Power, and although paper after paper was put forth by able and cautious men to show that England had always done the same thing, and therefore could not complain of our doing it—yet when the nation was reminded, what in its exultation and excitement it had forgotten, that it had a traditional policy founded in natural justice, and that it was bound in honor to abide by that policy, the whole nation willingly released its hold upon the traitors and let them go.

To say that it was only making the best of a bad situation, and that if one of our hands had not been tied we would have welcomed a war with England, is to say that Great Britain was right in 1812, to insult the memory of Perry, and to go backward fifty years from international equity. No, the people of this country know what their principle in the matter is—they know it is right, and they have character and intelligence enough as a people to do the right, when they are reminded of it, even in a moment of deep excitement. It was not the Government against the people, it was the Government quietly reminding the people of their own honor, and justly presuming their loyalty to it. Mr. Russell will not do justice to the fact, of course, for he has a theory to sustain and his own prescience to justify.

The other instance of the strength of our system is the order of the President releasing all political prisoners. It is no longer necessary to hold them, not because the rebellion is suppressed, but because the cause of the people is safe in their own hands. Public opinion can now deal with treasonable sympathy.

It is easy to see that the year which ends on May day will be the brightest in our annals.

PRO AND CON.

As the various party conventions of the States meet and pass resolutions, it would be well for them to avoid the part of Dogberry. The residents of glass-houses are warned by the proverb to be cautious. Democrats are not rebels, and Republicans are not secessionists. Let that be understood at the beginning; and then the Democratic Conventions will not virtually resolve that the Republicans are the authors of the war, nor will the Republican Conventions resolve that the Democrats are secret traitors.

The Democratic meetings lay peculiar stress upon the constitutional guarantees of the rights of States, and of the rights of property, and, in general, of all constitutional rights. They are very excellent things to lay stress upon. We are all fighting as hard as we can for that very Constitution. But why such remarkable zeal of talk, as if somebody or some party, except rebels, had ever called those rights in question?

There are two points of which Republican Conventions should beware: first, of supposing the rebellion to be a Democratic Party movement; and, second, of supposing Bright, Powell, Bayard, Vallandigham, and the Hon. B. Wood to be typical representatives of the Democratic Party.

And there are two points of which Democratic meetings should be equally careful: first, of covertly calling the rebellion a consequence of any unconstitutional Republican action; and second, of supposing that the Democratic party is exclusively national and constitutional. For the enlightened members will not forget that all those who are trying to ruin the nation and destroy the Constitution were politically known as Democrats.

The Democratic and Republican parties have each their theory of the Constitution. If either assumes to be its especial guardian, it will expose itself to great ridicule. Recrimination is as useless as it is endless. For instance, a Democrat taunts a Republican by saying—"If you had not made such a row about Slavery there would have been no rebellion." And the Republican replies—"If you had not openly supported by votes and money the faction which threatens to break up the Government, if it did not succeed, there would have been no rebellion."

When the war is over and the Government restored to its supremacy parties will instantly be formed. But they will be formed under the Constitution; and they will differ upon questions of its meaning and of the policy of administration, not of the existence of the Government itself.

"SIMON (BUCKNER) SAYS."

Simon says, Show your Hand.—"Nashville, Tenn., Feb. 10. A private dispatch says Fort Donelson is safe, and can not be taken."

Simon says, Up.—"Nashville, Feb. 13. We have repulsed the enemy at every point, and driven off the gun-boats. We have whipped them by land and water."

Simon says, Wiggle-waggle.—"Fort Donelson, Feb. 13. In consideration of all the circumstances governing the present situation of affairs at this station, I propose to the commanding officer of the Federal forces the appointment of commissioners to argue upon terms of capitulation of the forces at this post under my command. In that view I suggest an armistice until 12 o'clock to-day."

Simon says, Down.—"The distribution of the forces under my command, incident to an unexpected change of commanders, and the overwhelming force under your command, compel me, notwithstanding the brilliant success of the Confederate arms, to accept the ungenerous and unchivalrous terms which you propose."

The late storms which have prevailed hereabout, and caused such unprecedented delays on the different railroads, have given occasion to some good "sayings" on the part of the impatient but generally good-natured passengers. One of these, and not the worst, is the following, which is said to have occurred on the Hudson River Railroad, whose usual time of five hours from New York to Albany had, through the obstructions caused by the storm, been extended to nearly forty hours. A lady, accompanied by her son—a well-grown lad of about 12 or 14 years of age—was called upon by the conductor for her tickets, as they were approaching the terminus of the route, when she produced a full ticket for herself, and a half-ticket for the boy. Whereupon the following colloquy ensued:

Conductor. "Madam, is not that lad rather large to pass on a half-ticket?"

Lady. "He is large, I confess. I can see he has grown since we left New York."

The conductor passed. Those of the passengers who had the means smiled.

A Sure Cure for Hysterics.—Dr. March says the best cure for hysterics is to discharge the servant-girl. In his opinion, there is nothing like flying "around" to keep the nervous system from becoming unstrung. Some women think they want a physician, he says, when they only need a scrubbing-brush.

Marriage Portions.—At the wedding of the Count d'Artois the city of Paris agreed to distribute marriage portions. A smart girl of sixteen, named Louise Noisin, having presented herself to inscribe her name on the list, was asked who was her lover. "Oh," said she, with great simplicity, "I have no lover; I thought the city was to furnish every thing!" The answer created great mirth, and a husband was soon found for her.

Mrs. Partington wants to know if the Pope sent any of his bulls to the cattle-show?

In a lesson in parsing, the sentence, "Man courting in capacity of bliss," etc., the word courting comes to a young miss of fourteen to parse. She commenced hesitatingly, but got along well enough until she was to tell what it agreed with. Here she stopped short. But as the teacher said, "Very well, what does courting agree with?" Ellen blushed, and held down her head. "Ellen, don't you know what courting agrees with?" "Ye-ye-yes, Sir." "Well, Ellen, why don't you parse that word? What does it agree with?" Blushing still more, and stammering, Ellen at last says, "It—agrees with all the girls, Sir."

"How," said a county-court judge to a witness, "do you know the plaintiff was intoxicated on the evening referred to?" "Because I saw him, a few minutes after supper, trying to pull off his trowsers with a bootjack." Verdict for the defendant.

A Welsh editor says, "If we have offended any man in the short but brilliant course of our career, let him send us a new hat and say nothing about it."

"I have millions of money," said a dashing gent to a girl about to run away with him, "but you might as well scrape up all the jewels and spare change you have got."

"Are you not alarmed at the approach of the King of Terrors?" said a clergyman to an invalid. "Oh no!" was the reply; "I have been living six-and-thirty years with the Queen of Terrors: the King can not be much worse!"

"I know well enough," said a youngster, "where fresh fish come from; but where these salt ones are catched, I'll be hanged if I can tell."

A gentleman lately heard a laborer gravely inform two comrades that a 74-pounder is a cannon that sends a pound ball exactly seventy-four miles.

Almost every young lady is public-spirited enough to be willing to have her father's house used as a court-house.

Wordsworth cautions a studious friend against "growing double," but the girls think it is the best thing a nice young man can do.

"Jim, does your mother ever whip you?" "No; but she does a precious sight worse, though." "What is that?" "Why she washes me every morning."

At a wedding the other day, one of the guests, who is often a little absent, observed, gravely, "I have remarked that there have been more women than men married this year."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, February 18, in the Senate, resolutions of the Wisconsin Legislature in favor of furnishing relief to the famine-stricken people of Ireland were presented and referred. The House joint resolution, directing the illumination of the public buildings on Saturday evening, Washington's birthday, in honor of the recent victories, was adopted. The case of Senator Starke, the new member from Oregon, whose loyalty is in question, was then taken up, and a long debate ensued, but, without taking action on the subject, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Treasury Note bill, with the Senate's amendments and some modifications, was reported back by the Ways and Means Committee, and made the special order for Wednesday, at 1 o'clock. The Senate's joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Dupont, and the officers and men under his command, for the decisive victory at Port Royal in November last, and the Senate's resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to the Army and Navy for the series of brilliant victories over the enemy, were both adopted. The Senate's amendment to the Fortification Appropriation bill was concurred in. A joint resolution directing that the public buildings be illuminated on Saturday evening, the anniversary of Washington's birthday, in honor of the recent victories, was unanimously adopted. A resolution, that, as a mark of respect for the memory of the killed, and sympathy for the wounded in the recent battles, and as a testimonial of admiration for the undaunted courage of the soldiers, sailors, and marines engaged, the House do now adjourn, was unanimously adopted, and the House accordingly adjourned.

On Wednesday, February 19, in the Senate, the bill increasing the number of naval cadets, and the resolution of thanks to Captain Wilkes, were indefinitely postponed. A joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of War to confer the brevet rank of Lieutenant-General for eminent services, was introduced. A joint resolution, authorizing the President to present prizes and medals to enlisted soldiers, marines, and sailors who may have distinguished themselves in the war, was adopted. A petition from citizens of New York was presented, asking that the name of South Carolina be expunged from the list of States, and the territory divided between North Carolina and Georgia.——In the House, Mr. Hickman offered a preamble and resolution, the first embodying a paragraph from a Baltimore paper, which stated in effect that, upon searching the office of a journal called the South, in that city, letters were found impugning the loyalty of Senators Bayard and Saulsbury, of Delaware, and Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio; and the second directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the truth of the allegations against Mr. Vallandigham, with power to send for persons and papers, and to make report thereon. Mr. Vallandigham vehemently denied the accusations, asserting that he had not written a syllable to any person south of Mason and Dixon's line since the outbreak of the rebellion. He furthermore stoutly proclaimed his undying loyalty to the Union and the flag of the republic. The discussion which ensued was quite lively. Finally, Mr. Hickman, taking into consideration the fresh protestations of loyalty on the part of Mr. Vallandigham, withdrew the resolution. The House in committee discussed the Treasury Note bill, and considered the Senate's amendments, and reported progress. Pending the question on concurring with the Senate, the House adjourned.

On Thursday, February 20, in the Senate, resolutions in favor of the expulsion of Senator Powell, of Kentucky, who is charged with disloyalty, were referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill providing for the establishment of a National Armory at Rock Island was discussed, and the Army Appropriation bill passed. The Treasury Note bill was received from the House, and a Committee of Conference appointed on the amendments disagreed to.——In the House, the Treasury Note bill was taken up. Several of the Senate's amendments were rejected, and the bill is now in the hands of a joint committee of conference.

On Friday, February 21, both Houses of Congress adjourned after very short sessions, out of respect to President Lincoln and his family, in their recent affliction. The Homestead bill was briefly considered in the House, and Speaker Grow made a speech in favor of its passage. No further action was taken upon it.

On Saturday, February 22, in the Senate, a little routine business was done, when a message was received from the House that the ceremonies incident to the day were about to commence, and the members proceeded in a body to the Hall of Representatives.——In the House, the galleries set apart for the public were densely crowded. Many persons were unable even to gain admission to the Capitol. After the House was organized, Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, in consideration of the fact that the presentation of flags was not contemplated in the joint resolution providing for the celebration, moved that the ceremony be omitted. This gave rise to a long debate as to the propriety of the proposed presentation, which ended in the adoption of Mr. Crittenden's motion, 70 to 61. At this juncture the members of the Senate, headed by the Vice-President, entered, with the heads of Departments, the Judges of the Supreme Court, and the representatives of foreign Governments—officers of the Army and Navy, including General M'Clellan, coming last. The ceremonies then commenced with a prayer by Rev. Mr. Stockton, after which Colonel Forney read the Farewell Address, which was listened to with profound attention. The House then adjourned.

On Monday, February 24, in the Senate, Senator Wilmot urged speedy action on the bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. The joint resolution respecting compensating railroad companies that have received grants of land for the transportation of troops was taken up.——In the House, Mr. Roscoe L. Conkling, of New York, offered a resolution declaring the thanks of Congress due to Major-Generals Halleck and Grant for "planning" the recent movements of their respective divisions. Messrs. Cox, of Ohio, and Washburne and Kellogg, of Illinois, objected to assaulting the reputation of General M'Clellan, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Post-office Appropriation bill was passed. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation bill, and Mr. Shellabarger made a speech on the subject of emancipating slaves.

THE FALL OF NASHVILLE.

We are in possession of positive intelligence that Nashville is in our hands. A dispatch from Cairo states that General Buell occupies that city; and if this statement requires any confirmation, we have it in the fact that the Richmond Enquirer, in an extra published on Saturday evening, publishes telegrams from Augusta and Savannah announcing the evacuation of Nashville. Colonel Lee, who has just been released from durance at Richmond, also states that he was confidentially informed by an official of the rebel government that Nashville had fallen into the hands of the Union army.

THE SURRENDER OF CLARKSVILLE.

The details of the surrender of Clarksville, Tennessee, by the rebels, are furnished in the official dispatches of Commodore Foote to the Navy Department. It appears that on the approach of our forces two-thirds of the citizens fled in alarm. At the request of the Mayor of the city, and the Hon. Cave Johnson, formerly Postmaster-General of the United States, Commodore Foote issued a proclamation assuring all peaceable citizens that they may pursue their avocations without interruption. Commodore Foote represents that a strong Union sentiment prevails at all the points on the river which he has touched upon. The rebel armed forces retreated from Clarksville to Nashville, and destroyed the fine railroad bridge across the Cumberland River, against the remonstrances of the citizens, whose devotion to the Union is thus more strongly verified. An iron rolling mill, belonging to the Hon. John Bell, was totally destroyed by one of our gun-boats. Commodore Foote announces his intention of proceeding further up the Cumberland River with his gun-boats and six or eight mortar boats.

FALL OF RUSSELLVILLE AND CUMBERLAND GAP.

Dispatches from Louisville announce that Cumberland Gap and Russellville are in possession of our troops. At the former point the rebels at one time hoped to make a formidable stand, but the accumulation of our victories have demolished their expectations in that respect.

BURNSIDE'S OPERATIONS.

The Richmond Dispatch of Saturday publishes intelligence of the Burnside and Goldsborough expedition, from Suffolk, Virginia, and Norfolk, to the effect that our gun-boats had ascended the Chowan River, on the 20th ult., as far as Winton, North Carolina, landed the troops there, and reduced the town to ashes.

OUR PROGRESS IN MISSOURI.

General Curtis has driven the flying rebel army from Springfield clear into Arkansas, sixty-five miles south of Springfield, and on Sunday night the Stars and Stripes were fluttering over the soil of Arkansas. General Halleck telegraphed to Washington on 18th that Brigadier-General Price, brother of the rebel chief, and several officers of his staff, were captured.

General Price, whose career has been like that of a fox before the hounds, was again overtaken across the Arkansas border by our troops on 19th, at Sugar Creek, where he made a feeble stand, in combination with Ben M'Culloch's command, and was again put to flight. Several of his men and a large quantity of their arms—thrown away in the confusion—were captured by our troops. General Halleck telegraphs that General Curtis had also taken possession of Bentonville, Arkansas.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN ACROSS THE RIVER.

General M'Clellan rode across the river on 20th, for the first time in a long interval, visiting the head-quarters of the different commanders of divisions and brigades. The camps are represented to be in splendid order, both as regards health and discipline. All that the men now require is a fair chance to relieve the quietude of camp life by the activity of the battle-field.

MEETING OF THE REBEL CONGRESS.

The "permanent" rebel Congress was inaugurated at Richmond on the 18th ult. Vice-President Stephens formally opened the session of the Senate. R. M. T. Hunter was elected President pro tem. of that body. In the House, Thomas S. Bocock was elected Speaker. In his speech on entering on the duties of his office he said: "The gaze of the world is fixed upon us. Nations look on, curious to see how this new system of government will move off, and what manner of men have been chosen to guide its earliest movements." In excusing the acts of himself and co-rebels Mr. Bocock alludes to the Federal Government in the following terms: "When ambition and interest seized upon it and destroyed its integrity they were not allowed to appropriate the rule altogether to themselves. Fanaticism came forward and demanded to be received as a participant of power with them, and it claimed not in vain. Beneath the sway of this unholy triumvirate justice was forgotten, intolerance was established, private morals were ruined, and public virtue perished. All feeling of constitutional restraint passed away, and all sense of the obligation of an oath was forever lost. The whole machinery of government degenerated into the absolute rule of a corrupt numerical majority. Already the weaker section was marked out for destruction by the stronger, and then came disruption and overthrow. Since then tyranny the most absolute, and perjury the most vile, have destroyed the last vestige of soundness in the whole system."

DAVIS'S INAUGURATION.

The inauguration of Mr. Davis was not attended with any enthusiasm whatever, according to statements of parties who witnessed it, nor is the installment to office of the "permanent" government received with much favor, if we can judge from such language as the following, from the Richmond Whig of the 21st, the day before the ceremony took place. That journal says: "Judging by results so far, it (the government) is the most lamentable failure in history, and suggests to the reflecting mind that the most signal service which that government can now render to the country is the surrender of the helm to abler and better hands. In view of the past, the present, and probable future, the pageant of to-morrow is a bitter mockery and a miserable compensation for the ruin of a free people. A child with a bauble, an old man with a young wife, are partial illustrations of the deplorable folly."

MORE BRIDGES BROKEN IN ALABAMA.

Dispatches from St. Louis inform us that a most important point has been gained by the destruction of the railroad bridges at Decatur, Alabama, and at Bridgeport, seventy miles below, by the Unionists in Northern Alabama, emboldened, no doubt, by the appearance of the Union gun-boats under Lieutenant Phelps, who recently proceeded as far as Florence, Alabama.

REBEL PRISONERS IN INDIANA.

The papers announce the arrival at Indianapolis of 5000 of the rebel prisoners from Fort Donelson. They present a miserable appearance, being dressed in multi-colored rags, and using pieces of carpet for blankets. They state that they have been wretchedly fed and cared for during the last six months, and say that the rebellion is pretty well used up, as far as they can judge. The captive officers do not wear any uniform, and in appearance, it is said, do not seem much superior in social position to the mass of the privates.

THE BRIDGE-BURNERS NOT TO BE HUNG.

General Halleck has issued an order remitting the sentence of death upon the bridge-burners to imprisonment in the military prison at Altona, in consideration of the victories recently won and the increasing demonstrations of loyalty among the citizens of Missouri; but he declares that if the rebel spies shall again attempt to destroy the railroads the original sentences shall be carried out.

GENERAL SCOTT TO GO TO MEXICO.

On Saturday General Scott was nominated to the Senate as Minister Extraordinary to Mexico, with functions such as he exercised in the pacification of the Northwestern Boundary question. A project of a treaty, substantially assuming the Mexican debt due to England, France, and Spain, the interest on which amounts to three millions a year, was also sent to the Senate. The treaty guarantees our payment of it for five years.

A LETTER FROM SECRETARY STANTON.

The following letter is published in the New York Tribune:

"Sir,—I can not suffer undue merit to be ascribed to my official action. The glory of our recent victories belongs to the gallant officers and soldiers that fought the battles. No share of it belongs to me.

"Much has recently been said of military combinations and organizing victory. I hear such phrases with apprehension. They commenced in infidel France with the Italian campaign, and resulted in Waterloo. Who can organize victory? Who can combine the elements of success on the battle-field? We owe our recent victories to the Spirit of the Lord, that moved our soldiers to rush into battle, and filled the hearts of our enemies with terror and dismay. The inspiration that conquered in battle was in the hearts of the soldiers and from on high; and wherever there is the same inspiration there will be the same results. Patriotic spirit, with resolute courage in officers and men, is a military combination that never failed.

"We may well rejoice at the recent victories, for they teach us that battles are to be won now and by us in the same and only manner that they were ever won by any people, or in any age, since the days of Joshua, by boldly pursuing and striking the foe. What, under the blessing of Providence, I conceive to be the true organization of victory and military combination to end this war, was declared in a few words by General Grant's message to General Buckner—'I propose to move immediately on your works!' Yours truly, Edwin M. Stanton."

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT'S SON.

The President's son, William, ten years of age, was relieved of his painful illness, after a delirium of 90 hours, by death, at five o'clock on 20th ult. Mr. Lincoln feels his loss very deeply.

THE BRITISH SMUGGLERS SENT SOUTH.

The British Consul at Charleston has had the assurance to send the crew of the British steamer Fingal, which ran the blockade, to Fortress Monroe, in order that they might come North. General Wool very properly sent them back the way they came.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

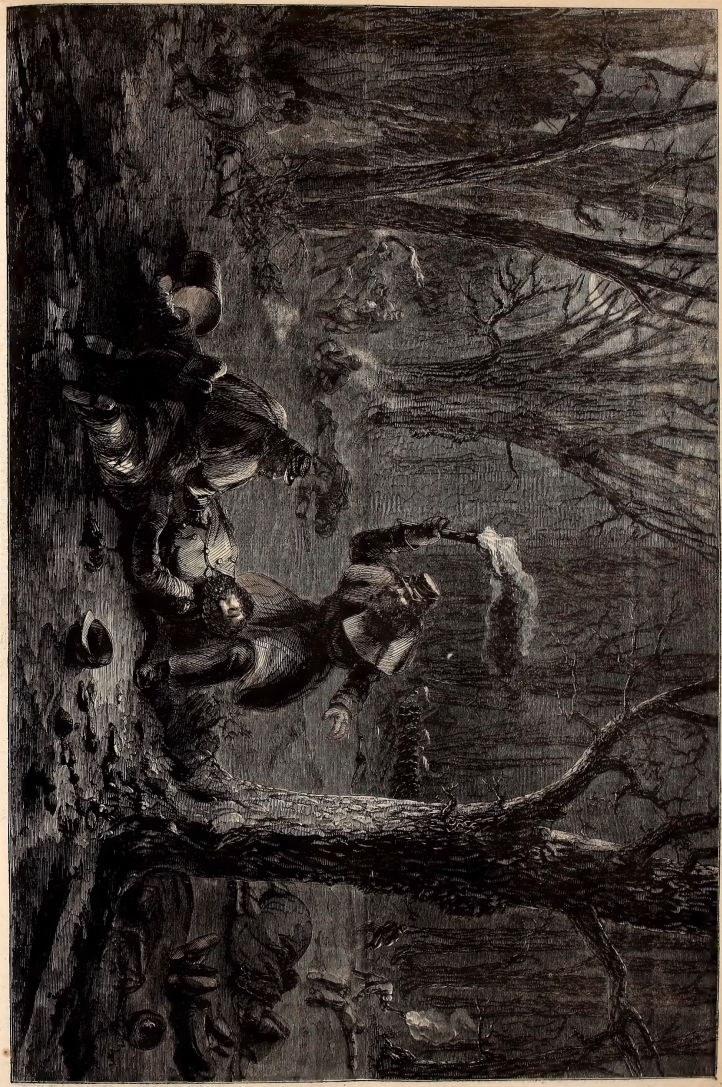
THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The British Parliament met in session on the 6th of February. The Queen's speech was read by royal commission, her Majesty being absent in consequence of the death of Prince Albert. The reference to the American question, in this State paper, must be considered as friendly. Ministers make the Queen say, "That question has been satisfactorily settled by the restoration of the passengers to British protection, and by the disavowal by the United States Government of the act of violence committed by their naval officer. The friendly relations between her Majesty and the President of the United States are therefore unimpaired." The Queen—or rather, her speech—also sets forth that the general condition of Great Britain is "sound," although "some branches of industry" have endured "pressure and privation."

THE STATE PAPERS ON RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

The Palmerston Cabinet have submitted to Parliament voluminous State papers on the subject of England's diplomatic course, down to December last, during the American war crisis. Judging from the portions of these documents now printed, we must arrive at the conclusion that the Government had all the time a salutary dread of being involved in war with the United States, in consequence of the commission of some act—underhand or overt—of active sympathy with the Southern rebels, and that the English ministers had determined to wheedle, to prevaricate, and even endeavor to intimidate, Mr. Lincoln from time to time, hoping that eventually the "fortune of arms" would be with the rebels, and then the Queen could and would recognize them. Indeed, Earl Russell used the above very remarkable words in a conversation which he had with Messrs. Yancey, Mann, and Rost on the subject.

MEXICO TO BE MADE A MONARCHY.



The news relative to the intentions of the allied European governments toward Mexico is very significant. The Archduke Maximilian, of Austria, having accepted the offer of a throne, it was immediately announced in London and Paris that the provisions of the first tripartite treaty—for the collection of debts—do not satisfy the attesting Powers, and the London Post proclaims that the armies of France and Spain, with the consent of England, are to immediately march into the city of Mexico, extinguish the republican executive in substance and form, and then present Mexico to the world as a "constitutional monarchy." England is to garrison Vera Cruz and guard the Gulf of Mexico in the mean time.

THE "TUSCARORA" AND THE "NASHVILLE."

The Tuscarora left Cowes on the 6th ultimo, and held to the westward. The Nashville had forty hours' start of her. The crew of the Nashville made a great many declarations of their determination to resist capture by a Union vessel, even to the extent of blowing up their ship.

THE HAND-TO-HAND FIGHT OVER SCHWARTZ'S BATTERY AT FORT DONELSON.—[SEE PAGE 150.]

SEEKING FOR THE WOUNDED, BY TORCH-LIGHT, AFTER THE BATTLE.

MAP OF FORT DONELSON AND VICINITY.

THE CAPTURE OF FORT DONELSON.

We publish on page 148 a picture of the Fight over Schwartz's Battery (Union) on the last day of the siege of Fort Donelson. The contest began, as our readers will remember, on Thursday, 13th, and the fort was surrendered on Sunday morning, 16th. On Saturday the enemy made a successful sortie, and succeeded for a time in seizing one or two of our batteries. The event which our artist commemorates is thus described in the correspondence of the World:

THE HAND-TO-HAND FIGHT.

Early in the morning a large rebel force, admitted to be twelve thousand strong by themselves, which had lain in the trenches all night, were ordered outside of the rifle-pits. The men, it appears, were uncertain whether it was a retreat, and resolved to fight with desperation.

The rebel force was, as nearly as can be ascertained, composed of

First Mississippi, Third Mississippi, Fourth Mississippi, Fourteenth Mississippi, and Twentieth Mississippi, under General Johnson.

Forty-first Tennessee, Forty-first Virginia, Fifteenth Arkansas, Second Texas, and an Alabama regiment, under General J. B. Floyd.

Forrest's Cavalry, 1200 strong.

They had posted their batteries inside of the breast-works, ready to open fire so soon as our troops advanced to meet them. At six o'clock a shot was sent over to the rebel ranks just leaving their lines. In a few minutes the whole column was in motion. Col. Oglesby, who held the position menaced by the enemy, got his troops in line as rapidly as possible, and had Schwartz's Battery of four pieces in readiness to receive them. The announcement had hardly been made that the enemy was upon us than they were fairly engaged with our troops. The position of our troops during the first assault may be expressed as follows:

OGLESBY'S BRIGADE.

Ninth, Eighth, and Thirtieth Illinois. † † † † Schwartz's Battery. Thirty-first Illinois.

ENEMY'S POSITION.

Fourteenth Mississippi.
Second Mississippi.
Twentieth Mississippi.
Third Mississippi
Fifty-first Virginia.
† † † † † † † † †
Batteries in Intrenchments.

In this order was the fight—which proved to be a very severe one—begun. Col. Oglesby, being hardly pressed, sent back for reinforcements. Col. W. H. L. Wallace was sent forward with his brigade, consisting of the Eleventh, Twentieth, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Illinois regiments, who came up to find the Mississippi regiments heavily engaged with the Illinoisians of Col. Oglesby. After several desperate volleys our men were flanked by an overpowering force of the rebels, and were driven back, and for a few minutes overpowered. The timely arrival of Col. Wallace turned the day. One of his regiments was cut off from the rest by the cavalry force and a regiment of rebel infantry. They gallantly cut their way through, and drove the enemy back from the hill.

The firing was excessive and well sustained. The Eighth Illinois sustained the brunt of the charge, as did also the Fourteenth Mississippi. The men on both sides behaved with characteristic intrepidity. The Southerners, rash, impetuous, daring, and soon spent, fought bravely for a short time. The Western men, stubborn, resolute, daring, and full of fortitude, standing almost unmoved amidst the storm of buck and ball which poured from the rifles and muskets of the rebels, only breaking after they had seen their comrades falling by their sides.

A SECOND REPULSE OF THE REBELS.

By dint of rapid firing from the two batteries of Taylor and Schwartz, the enemy was driven back. The regiments of our line which had suffered so much were withdrawn. The enemy had by this time concentrated their broken troops for another attack. General M'Clernand had already prepared for the emergency. Anticipating that an attempt would be made to force a passage through, he ordered a brigade to the rear and extreme right to form behind the regiments then in front.

Possibly an hour had elapsed when the enemy returned in a dense mass to the attack. The battery of Captain Schwartz seemed to be the object of their attack. On they came pell-mell, with deafening volleys of fire. Our batteries, well-nigh exhausted of canister, poured shell into them with all possible dispatch. Ammunition caissons were sent back in haste to get a fresh supply of canister. The Ninth, Eighteenth, Thirtieth, and Forty-first were the next regiments to be brought up. The crest of the hill was contested with variable success for a full hour, when the enemy was finally driven back. The line of battle was so much confused that no connected account of the movements can be detailed. The utmost bravery was displayed on both sides until the struggle degenerated into a larger sort of skirmish, in which a great deal of powder and lead was expended without much effect. The rebels finally retired a third time.

Our men had by this time expended their quantum of ammunition (forty rounds). It was during this lull, and before our men could realize the fact that they had driven the enemy before them, that the fourth and last attempt was made to seize the battery. The horses being shot, the enemy succeeded in gaining possession of the battery of Captain Schwartz, and were on the point of turning them upon our troops, when Captain Willett's Chicago battery, which had just toiled up fresh from Fort Henry, arrived on the ground and poured in a perfect storm of canister just in time to save the day. The rebels fell back in disorder, pulling the guns of Schwartz with them down the hill, and gained entrance to the fort before our troops could overtake them. Our regiments followed them to the embankments, some of them climbing over, and were driven back for want of support.

We publish on this page a Plan of Fort Donelson. The following very good description of the fort is from the correspondent of the Times:

The first thing that strikes one upon entering Fort Donelson is its immense strength. Fort Henry was thought to be almost a Gibraltar, but its strength is weakness when compared to that of Donelson. Along Dover the Cumberland River runs nearly north. A half mile or so below it makes a short bend to the west for some hundred yards or so, and then turns again and pursues its natural course due north. Right in this bend, on the left bank of the river, and commanding it to the north, are two water batteries, side by side, and nearly down to the water's edge.

The main battery has nine guns, all looking straight down the river. The left-hand gun is a 10-inch Columbiad—the rest are 32-pounders. The other battery has three guns—the middle one a formidable rifled 64-pound Columbiad—the others 64-pound howitzers. All these guns are protected by breast-works of immense thickness, the tops of which are composed of coffee-sacks filled with earth. Back of these batteries the shore rises with a pretty steep ascent till it forms a hill, whose top is nearly or quite 100 feet above the water. On the top of this hill is Fort Donelson—an irregular work, which incloses about 100 acres. The only guns in the fort are four light siege guns, a 12-pound howitzer, two 24-pound guns, and one 64-pound howitzer. West of the fort, in the direction of the place occupied by General Grant, and south towards General M'Clernand's position, the country is a succession of hills. For several hundred yards around the fort the timber has all been cut down so as to afford a fair sweep for the Confederate guns. Surrounding the whole fort and town, and distant from the former about a mile, is a trench for riflemen, which runs completely around from the river bank above Dover almost to a point near the river some distance below the water batteries. Directly west of the fort, and within the rifle-pit, are formidable abattis, which would render an advance from that direction almost an impossibility.

THE EXECUTION OF GORDON, THE SLAVE-TRADER.

Not the least important among the changes which are taking place in the current of national policy and public opinion is evidenced by the fact that on Friday, 21st February, in this city, Nathaniel Gordon was hung for being engaged in the slave-trade. For forty years the slave-trade has been pronounced piracy by law, and to engage in it has been a capital offense. But the sympathy of the Government and its officials has been so often on the side of the criminal, and it seemed so absurd to hang a man for doing at sea that which, in half the Union, is done daily without censure on land, that no one has ever been punished under the Act. The Administration of Mr. Lincoln has turned over a new leaf in this respect. Henceforth the slave-trade will be abandoned to the British and their friends. The hanging of Gordon is an event in the history of our country.

He was probably the most successful and one of the worst of the individuals engaged in the trade. A native of Maine, he had engaged in the business many years since, and had always eluded justice. The particular voyage which proved fatal to him was undertaken in 1860. The following summary of the case we take from the Times:

It was in evidence (given by Lieutenant Henry D. Todd, U.S.N.) that the ship Erie was first discovered by the United States steamer Mohican, on the morning of the 8th day of August, 1860; that she was then about fifty miles outside of the River Congo, on the West Coast of Africa, standing to the northward, with all sail set; that she was flying the American flag, and that a gun from the Mohican brought her to.

It was shown by Lieutenant Todd that he went on board himself about noon, and took command of the prize. He found on board of the Erie, which our readers will remember was but 500 tons burden, eight hundred and ninety-seven (897) negroes, men, women, and children, ranging from the age of six months to forty years. They were half children, one-fourth men, and one-fourth women, and so crowded when on the main deck that one could scarcely put his foot down without stepping on them. The stench from the hold was fearful, and the filth and dirt upon their persons indescribably offensive.

At first he of course knew nothing about them, and until Gordon showed him, he was unable to stow them or feed them—finally he learned how, but they were stowed so closely that during the entire voyage they appeared to be in great agony. The details are sickening, but as fair exponents of the result of this close stowing, we will but mention that running sores and cutaneous diseases of the most painful as well as contagious character infected the entire load. Decency was unthought of; privacy was simply impossible—nastiness and wretchedness reigned supreme. From such a state of affairs we are not surprised to learn that, during the passage of fifteen days, twenty-nine of the sufferers died, and were thrown overboard.

It was proved by one of the seamen that he, with others, shipped on the Erie, believing her to be bound upon a legitimate voyage, and that, when at sea they suspected, from the nature of the cargo, that all was not right, which suspicion they mentioned to the Captain (Gordon), who satisfied them by saying that he was on a lawful voyage, that they had shipped as sailors, and would do better to return to their duties than to talk to him.

Subsequently they were told that they had shipped on a slaver, and that for every negro safely landed they should receive a dollar.

The negroes were taken on board the ship on the 7th day of August, 1860, and the entire operation of launching and unloading nearly nine hundred negroes, occupied but three quarters of an hour, or less time than a sensible man would require for his dinner. As the poor creatures came over the side Gordon would take them by the arm, and shove them here or there, as the case might be, and if by chance their persons were covered from entire exposure by a strip of rag, he would, with his knife, cut it off, fling it overboard, and send the wretch naked with his fellows.

Several of the crew testified, all agreeing that Gordon acted as Captain; that he engaged them; that he ordered them; that he promised them the $1 per capita; that he superintended the bringing on board the negroes; and that he was, in fact, the master-spirit of the entire enterprise.

For this crime Gordon was arrested, tried, and, mainly through the energy of District-Attorney Smith, convicted, and sentenced to death. Immense exertions were made by his friends and the slave-trading interest to procure a pardon, or at least a commutation of his sentence, from President Lincoln, but without avail. He was sentenced to die on 21st. We abridge the following account of his last hours and execution [which we illustrate on page 157] from the Herald and Times:

THE ATTEMPT TO COMMIT SUICIDE.

Nothing worthy of note occurred until about three o'clock A.M. on Friday morning, when the keepers were alarmed by the prisoner being suddenly seized with convulsions. At first it was supposed that he was trying to strangle himself; but on a close examination it was evident that he was suffering from the effects of poison. Dr. Simmons, the prison physician, was immediately sent for, and stimulants were freely administered for the purpose of producing a reaction. For the first half hour or so the efforts of the physician appeared to have but little effect. The patient became quite rigid under the influence of the poison, his pulse could scarcely be felt, and it was thought that after all the gallows would be cheated of its victim. Drs. James R. Wood and Hodgman, who were also in attendance upon the prisoner, labored hard to resuscitate the dying man, and finally, by means of the stomach-pump and the use of brandy, the patient was sufficiently recovered to be able to articulate. It was not until eight o'clock, however, that the physicians had any hope of saving Gordon's life. From that hour, however, the prisoner gradually recovered, although he was subject to fainting fits for hours afterward. When sensible he begged of the doctors to let him alone, preferring, he said, to die by his own hand rather than suffer the ignominy of a public execution.

It has not been satisfactorily ascertained how or in what manner the unfortunate man procured the poison with which he contemplated self-destruction. The symptoms were evidently those of strychnine, and the only way in which the keepers can account for the presence of the poison is its introduction in the cigars which Gordon had smoked so freely the night before. On Thursday the prisoner was compelled to undergo a rigid search, his clothing was changed entirely, and he was placed in a new cell, so that it would seem impossible almost for him to have procured the poison in any other way than that suggested by his keepers.

A few minutes after eleven o'clock, when it was apparent to Gordon that the execution would certainly take place, notwithstanding his attempt at suicide, he sent for Marshal Murray, and said he had something of a private nature to communicate. The Marshal repaired to the bedside of the culprit and asked if any thing could be done to alleviate his sufferings. Gordon raised himself slowly from his cot, and with much difficulty, said: "Cut a lock of hair from my head and give it to my wife." Then taking a ring from his finger, he requested that that also should be sent to his wife in remembrance of her husband. The request was cheerfully complied with, and the official, quite overcome with emotion, left the unhappy man to his fate.

THE EXECUTION.

At 12 o'clock, Marshal Murray notified Gordon, through Mr. Draper, that the hour had arrived. At this he expressed great surprise, and said he thought he had two hours more in which to live. The clergyman entered the cell and prayed with him, or rather for him. Deputy Marshal Borst aided him in dressing and gave him a large drink of clear whisky, when his arms were tied, the black cap was put carelessly on one side of his head, and he was carried on the deputy's shoulders to a chair in the corridor. The sight was simply shocking.

The man was not sober—that is, so powerful had been the effect of the poison that, in order to keep him alive till the necessary moment, they had been obliged to give him whisky enough to make an ordinary man drunk three times over. He sat lollingly in the chair, gazing listlessly around, while the Marshal, with unaffected emotion, read the former reprieve to him. That done, he was helped to his feet, and held there while the Marshal read to him the death-warrant.

After this he looked around with a senseless smile, asked for some more whisky, which was kindly given him. The procession was then formed, Gordon stalking with a bravadoish air, upheld by the Marshals, toward the scaffold.

To a casual spectator it would appear that, exhausted by mental or physical suffering, Gordon was making a great effort to walk manfully to his fate. As it was, however, he had just sense enough left to endeavor to follow out the suggestion of the well-meaning deputy, who told him to die like a man, and to walk to the rope, so that no one could accuse him of fear. When he reached the scaffold, he said, "Well, a man can't die but once; I'm not afraid." The cap was drawn over the whitened, meaningless features, the noose-knot was carefully adjusted under his ear, and he stood, an unthinking, careless, besotted wretch waiting for he knew not what, when with a jerk he went high in air, and fell to the length of the rope, still senseless, still unfeeling, still regardless of pain or pleasure.

The body swayed hither and thither for a few moments, and all was quiet. No twitchings, no convulsions, no throes, no agonies. His legs opened once, but closed again, and he hung a lump of dishonored clay.

THE BATTLE OF MILL SPRING.

We publish herewith a plan of the Battle of Mill Spring, Kentucky, fought on 19th January, and won by Generals Thomas and Schoepff. The following interesting letter explains the plan:

Head-quarters Tenth Regiment Indiana Foot Volunteers, Mill Spring, Feb. 7, 1862.

Dear Sir,—We left Lebanon on the 31st day of December, and marched to Campbellsville; from there we made a forced march to Greensburg, twelve miles, in less than four hours, and returned the next day in about the same time. The expedition turned out to be a goose chase. On or about the 7th we started for Columbia, where we arrived in two days. After resting three or four days we struck tents and started for Zollicoffer's intrenchments. After some six or eight days' hard traveling we arrived at Logan's Cross Roads, where the fun commenced. Friday afternoon we sent out as pickets Company A, Captain Hamilton; at night Company E, Captain Carroll, and Company G, Captain Hogiland. About twelve o'clock that night the enemy's pickets and Company E met and exchanged shots; the regiment was in less than five minutes in line of battle, but as the enemy retreated we retired to bed again. The next morning Company C, Captain Boyl, and Company D, Captain Joseph F. Taylor, were sent out to relieve Companies E and G. During Saturday nothing of importance occurred. At night Company I, Captain Perkins, and Company K, Captain Shortle, relieved Companies C and D. During the night, which was very stormy, every thing was quiet. At six o'clock Sunday morning Captain Perkins came in and reported every thing quiet. Hardly had he got away from the tent when one of Wolford's cavalry rode up and said our pickets were firing. The long roll was instantly beat, and the boys started at double-quick: the regiment took the position marked (2), which they held until the enemy had completely outflanked us. We fought over 3000 for over half an hour. We then retreated to (3). In the mean time the Fourth Kentucky came up. We then pushed forward to (4), with the Fourth Kentucky at our right (8). We fought here for nearly an hour, when finding the enemy's cavalry trying a flanking movement on us, we moved, by General Thomas's orders, to (5), where we fought desperately at least an hour. At this time Colonel Manson saw that the enemy were again trying a flank movement to our right; ordered that M'Cook should bring his men to our relief. The Second Minnesota (9) moved forward and took position at (10), from thence forward to (11), driving the left flank of the enemy in. The Ninth Ohio (12) came up and drove the right flank in. Our regiment then went forward to (6), when Colonel Kise ordered "Charge bayonets!" which was done with a will, and every thing went before us. Our next position was at (7); it was here that the old Tenth did the best execution with the guns they received while in your town. At the little house you see marked at the left of (7) Company E, Captain Carroll, killed twenty-one men. We fairly mowed them down in that open field. The Ninth Ohio (13) was carrying on the same kind of business on the other side of the road. The order was again given to charge bayonets, which was done by the Tenth Indiana and Ninth Ohio in splendid style. Secesh was now completely played out, and they all struck for their den. The double-quick we practiced so much at Bardstown was no comparison to theirs; in that respect they are much better drilled than we. We followed them, occasionally giving them a shell to hurry them up a little. At about 4 o'clock we arrived within shelling distance of their intrenchments, and commenced giving them a few; but night coming on we decided to rest. We had started off in the morning before breakfast, and had eaten nothing all day. We received a few crackers, and the boys laid themselves down on the damp ground (it having rained all day). In the morning Whitmore's battery was ordered up to shell a steamboat which we saw crossing the river. We shot with two Parrot guns a distance of about two miles. We however had shot but a few times when we noticed the steamer on fire. Our regiment, together with the Tenth Kentucky, Fourteenth Ohio, and Fourth Kentucky (Manson's Brigade), were then ordered by General Thomas to take possession of the intrenchments. The Tenth Kentucky, Colonel Harlan, was the first to enter, the Fourteenth Ohio next, and then came ours. We found every thing left. Horses stood saddled and bridled; teams were hitched up; the horses were standing attached to the cannons; officers' trunks were found strewn on the bank of the river. We took about 2000 head of horses and mules, 250 wagons, 14 cannon, two of which were captured by them at Bull Run, some 4000 or 5000 stand of arms, and any number of flags. Company E, Captain Carroll, captured three silk flags; Company H, Captain Marsh B. Taylor, one silk flag. You have seen it reported in the papers that Colonel Fry and Zollicoffer had some conversation, and that Fry shot Z. This is a great hoax. Zollicoffer was shot three times; the ball that killed him was from an Enfield rifle, and entered his heart. The shot was fired by Corporal James Swan, of Company H, who is a dead shot, and the same person who shot the man one night in the shoulder while in your town. I am, Judge, very proud to be in the Tenth Regiment, and also very proud of the officers. They are all very brave. Colonel Kise and Major Miller can't be beat any where. Colonel Manson was the hero of the day, and managed every thing in splendid style. We lost but one officer, Lieutenant M'Adams, who was shot in the forehead and killed instantly. Lieutenant Johnson was wounded in the left arm slightly. Some of the men were wounded, and after having their wounds bound up went into the field again. At one time we were so close to the enemy that we bayoneted them through the fence. The Mississippians were armed with immense knives, which they intended using on us, but our bayonets outreached their knives.

MAJOR-GENERAL GRANT.

WE publish on page 145 a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL GRANT, the hero of Fort Donelson. The following sketch of his life we take from the Herald:

Major-General Ulysses S. Grant was born at Point Pleasant, Clairmont County, Ohio, April 27, 1822, and entered West Point Military Academy from Ohio in 1839, where he graduated with honors in 1843, and was attached as brevet Second Lieutenant to the Fourth Infantry. He was promoted Second Lieutenant at Corpus Christi, in September, 1845, and served as such through Mexico, under General Taylor, at Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and Monterey, and under General Scott from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, and was twice promoted for his bravery. He was regimental Quarter-master from April 1, 1847; and when he resigned the service, on the 31st of July, 1854, he was a full captain in the Fourth Infantry of regulars. After his resignation he settled in St. Louis County, Missouri, and moved from there to Galena, Illinois, in 1860. Upon the breaking out of the present war he offered his services to Governor Yates, and was appointed Colonel of the 21st Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and served with his regiment until promoted a Brigadier-General, with commission and rank from the 17th of May, 1861. He was engaged as Colonel and acting Brigadier-General in several of the contests in Southeastern Missouri; and his course as commander of the southeast district of Missouri has been thoroughly scrutinized, and among his most praiseworthy acts was the occupation of Paducah, and stoppage of communication and supplies to the rebels via the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. The manner in which he conducted the battle of Belmont is still fresh in our readers' minds. The rest of his course as commander there is too well known to be repeated here, and certain it is that this action in every instance has been applauded both by his superior officers and the people. After the capture of Fort Henry a new district was created, under the denomination of the District of West Tennessee, and General Grant was assigned by General Halleck to the command of it.

General Grant's performance at Fort Henry, and especially his correspondence with the rebel General Buckner, are fresh in our readers' memories. He was at once appointed a Major-General by the President, and was unanimously confirmed by Congress.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GARFIELD.

On page 157 we publish a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL GARFIELD, who defeated and scattered Humphrey Marshall's rebel army shortly after New-Year. General Garfield's exploit is thus described in his own official orders:

PAINTVILLE, Jan. 8, 1862.

Captain J. B. Fry, Assistant Adjutant-General;

I entered this place yesterday, with the Forty-second Ohio regiment, Fourteenth Kentucky regiment, and three hundred of the Second Virginia cavalry. On hearing of my approach the main rebel force left their strongly intrenched camp and fled. I sent my cavalry to the mouth of Jennis Creek, where they attacked and drove the rebel cavalry, which had been left as a van-guard, a distance of five miles, killing three and wounding a considerable number. Marshall's whole army is now flying in utter confusion. He had abandoned and burned a large quantity of stores. We have taken fifteen prisoners. Our loss was two killed and one wounded. I start in pursuit to-morrow morning.

J. A. GARFIELD, commanding Brigade.

BRIGADE, PRESTONBURG, KY., Jan. 11, 1862.

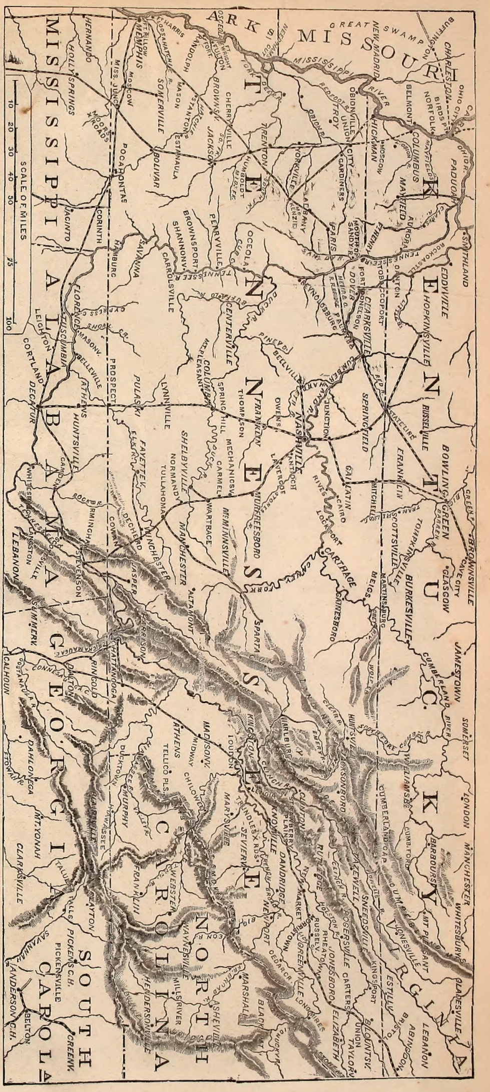
Captain J. B. Fry, Assistant Adjutant-General:

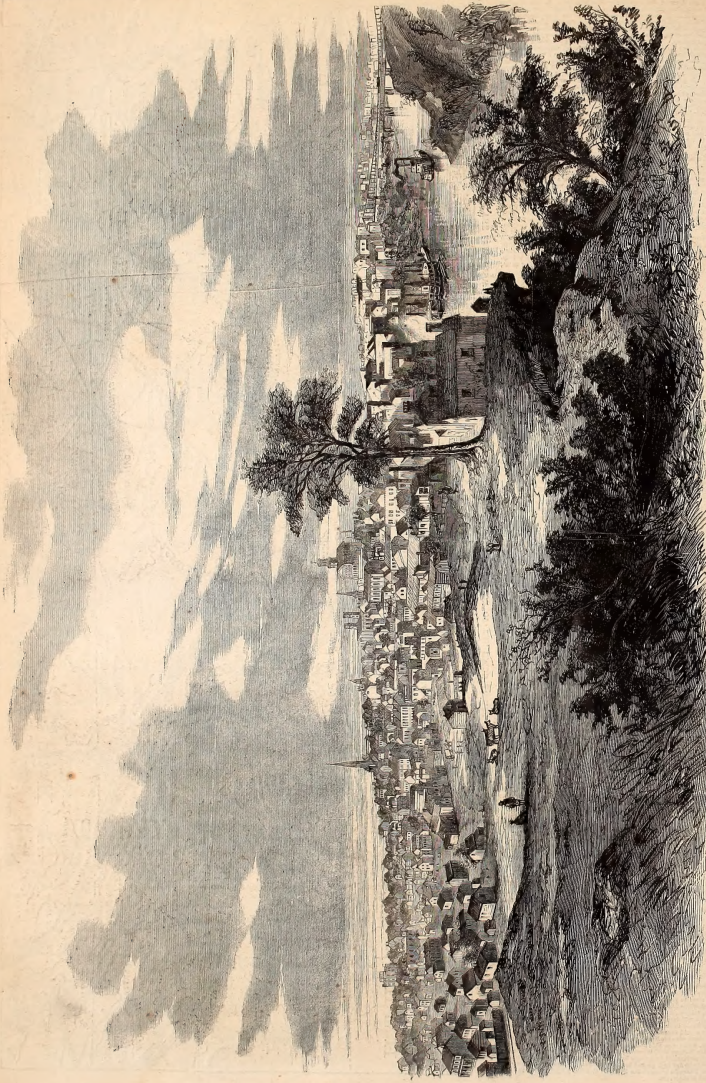
I left Paintville on Thursday noon with 1100 men, and drove in the enemy's pickets two miles below Prestonburg. The men slept on their arms. At four o'clock yesterday morning we moved toward the main body of the enemy, at the forks of Middle Creek, under the command of Marshall. Skirmishing with his outposts began at eight o'clock, and at one o'clock P.M. we engaged his force of 2500, with three cannon posted on the hill. We fought them until dark, having been reinforced by about 700 men from Paintville, and drove the enemy from all his positions. He carried off the majority of his dead and all his wounded. This morning we found twenty-seven of his dead on the field. His killed can not be less than sixty. We have taken twenty-five prisoners, ten horses, and a quantity of stores. The enemy burned most of his stores, and fled precipitately in the night. To-day I have crossed the river, and am now occupying Prestonburg. Our loss is two killed and twenty-five wounded.

J. A. GARFIELD, Colonel commanding Brigade.

All is quiet down the road.



WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY AT WASHINGTON.



WE illustrate on page 156 the REBEL FLAGS in the old House of Representatives at Washington, on the occasion of the celebration of Washington's Birthday. The Senate had adjourned, and Senators had taken seats in the House, and at one o'clock the Heads of Departments, Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, Foreign Ministers, and the principal Officers of the Army and Navy in full uniform, appeared at the door, and were admitted to the floor of the House. The galleries were densely crowded with well-dressed ladies and men. The ceremonies began with a prayer by Chaplain Stockton, and the Clerk then read Washington's Farewell Address in a clear, loud voice.

The day was celebrated with éclat in all the large cities of the North. The correspondent of the Evening Post gives the following account of the gathering in the Hall of Representatives:

Mr. Seward was there, impassible as ever, with a sandy and tough face, on which the sharp contests of a long life of New York a-d national politics would seem to have made no impression. Beside him was the Attorney-General, whose office in these times is somewhat lessened in the light of the maxim, "leges silent inter arma." Mr. Blair, with his tall lithe figure, sharp eye, and intelligent face, sat next Mr. Caleb Smith, whose very countenance would indicate that the toils of the Interior Department are alleviated by a good digestion and a mind at ease. The new Secretary of War was present, with his broad, massive head, and lines that spoke decision on his face, which was pale to-day. And Welles, of the Navy, who, in spite of all the Morgan talk, is esteemed an upright and able man, was there, with his patriarchal long white locks, and a face which seemingly belongs as little to to-day as if he had been the sculptor employed by the kings before the Pharaohs to carve the Sphinx. General M'Clellan was the most observed of observers.

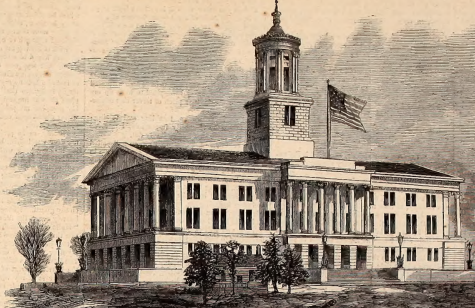
GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE.

On page 152 we give a view of the CITY OF NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, from a sketch kindly placed at our disposal by Mr. R. J. Meigs, a loyal citizen of Nashville, now resident in New York. It is, as every body knows, the capital of Tennessee, and is a fine city of about 20,000 inhabitants, situated on the Cumberland River. — Two bridges, a railroad bridge (M'Callum truss), and an iron suspension bridge, span the river opposite to the city. Nashville stands on a bluff on the south side of the river. It is surrounded by hills, which command it, and render its defenses extremely difficult against an army approaching from various points. The large building of which we give a picture herewith is the CAPITOL OF TENNESSEE, a new and handsome structure. Governor Harris lives in a little shanty opposite the Capitol, which was used by the architects during its construction. He is too mean to take lodgings at a hotel.

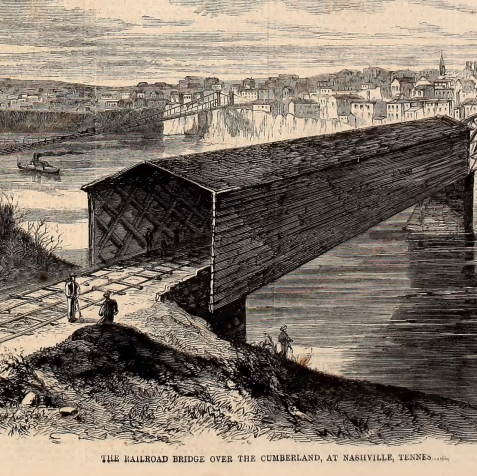
We likewise append a view of the fine RAILROAD BRIDGE over the Cumberland, which report stated the rebels had destroyed. The following account of Nashville we take from the New York Herald:

Nashville is the capital of Tennessee, and seat of justice of Davidson County. It is a city and port of entry, and is situated on the Cumberland River, two hundred miles above its junction with the Ohio. The population of Nashville before the rebellion was about 34,000, but has since much decreased. The city is chiefly built on the south side of the river, on the slope and on the foot of a hill rising about two hundred feet above the water. The Cumberland is navigable for steamboats for fifty miles above the city, and by smaller boats to the falls, five hundred miles from the mouth. There are five railroads radiating from Nashville—viz., the Tennessee and Alabama, Louisville and Nashville, Memphis and Ohio, Hickman and Nashville Branch, Nashville and Chattanooga, and Nashville and Northwestern. The city is generally well built, and there are numerous imposing public and private buildings. One of the finest of the former is the new Capitol, situated on an eminence one hundred and seventy-five feet above the river, and constructed, inside and out, of a beautiful variety of fossiliferous limestone. It is three stories high, including the basement. At either end of the building there is an Ionic portico of eight columns, each four feet and a half in diameter, and over thirty-three feet high, and at the sides there are also porticoes of six columns each. A tower or cupola rises above the centre of the roof to the height of two hundred and six feet from the ground. It has a quadrangular perforated base, forty-two feet high, surmounted by a circular cell, thirty-seven feet high and twenty-six feet in diameter, with eight slender Corinthian columns, designed from the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens. The dimensions of the whole building are one hundred and thirty-eight by two hundred and thirty-eight feet, and the construction cost over one million of dollars. It is approached by four avenues, which rise from terrace to terrace by broad marble steps. The edifice is considered the handsomest State Capitol in the Union.



The new Court House is a large building, on the public square, with an eight-columned Corinthian portico at each end, and a four-columned portico at each side. The State Bank is a handsome Doric building. Among the other permanent edifices are the jail, the penitentiary, theatres, Odd Fellows' and Masonic halls, City Hospital, university, and school-houses.

There are two fine bridges over the Cumberland River—one a railroad bridge, of wood, with an immense draw two hundred and eighty feet, and two stationary spans, each one hundred feet. This bridge was finished in 1860, at a cost of $200,000. The other is a wire suspension bridge, of more than seven hundred feet span, and one hundred and ten feet above the water. It was begun in 1850, and cost about $150,000. The city water-works were constructed in 1854, and the total expense up to 1861 has been about $1,000,000. The water is raised from the river to four reservoirs, which have an aggregate capacity of one million six hundred thousand gallons. Gas was introduced into the city in February, 1856.



The commerce of Nashville is very large, being carried on by river and railroads, and by numerous roads, to the construction of which the city has devoted a great deal of attention. The value of the trade amounts to about $40,000 per annum; but the Government has not yet erected a Custom-house in the city. The average annual shipments are—50,000 bales of cotton, 8,000 hogsheads of tobacco, 2,000,000 bushels of wheat, 4,000,000 bushels of Indian corn, 10,000 casks of whisky, 10,000 kegs, and 1500 barrels of lard.

The neighborhood of Nashville is a famous stock-raising country, and has a high reputation for blooded horses, Jacksboro mules, cattle, sheep, hogs, and Cashmere goats. The leading business of the city is in dry goods, hardware, drugs, and groceries. Book publishing is carried on more extensively than in any other Western city. Some of the publishing houses of the Southern Methodist Conference is one of the largest book manufactories in the United States. The manufactures are less important than the commercial interests. There are three flouring mills, eight or ten planing mills, and eight or ten cotton factories, employing about 1000 hands. The value of the taxable property here is $18,000,000. Seven miles from the city is the State Lunatic Asylum, and twelve miles east is the Hermitage, the celebrated residence of Andrew Jackson. The municipal government is vested in a mayor, eight aldermen, and sixteen councilmen. The first permanent settlement was made in 1778-79; the town was incorporated in 1784, received its charter in 1806, and was made the State capital in 1817. Nashville is 198 miles northeast of Memphis, 206 miles southwest of Lexington in Kentucky, and 684 miles from Washington city.

At the hour we close this record the telegraph reports that the gun-boats and General Buell reached Nashville late last week, and that the city surrendered.

THE CAPITOL AT NASHVILLE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

THE RAILROAD BRIDGE OVER THE CUMBERLAND, AT NASHVILLE, TENNES...

WHAT BEFELL ME AT THE ASSIZES.

IT is now about fifteen years since I was compelled to attend the assizes at our county town as the junior member of a highly respectable legal firm. Knowing that there would be several important causes entered on, and two or three cases on the criminal side, which excited much public attention, and that thus the small county town would be overwhelmed with visitors, I took the precaution of writing—the night before my journey—to secure a bed for myself, and, as the principal inn, where I was, of course, well known.

The next day I took my journey, arriving at my destination early in the day.

I found, as I had expected, the town crowded with people; and, on going into the inn, the landlord informed me that he had received my letter, but that to retain a bedroom for me in his house had been absolutely impossible, the hotel being filled to overflowing by other persons who had bespoken rooms before me. He had generously, with a small bedroom in a respectable public-house, which would suit my clerk; but as to myself, if I would confide my sleeping arrangements to his care, he would insure me a handsome apartment and comfortable bedroom out of the house, and would convey me there in one of his carriages.

Being somewhat particular in the matter of furnished apartments, I thought it inadvisable to inquire more particularly where he proposed to send me; but as he was busily engaged at the moment in making further acquaint me that the room intended for my use was in a large, unoccupied house standing rather on the outskirts of the town, and that the owner had been a man of fortune, which he had spent neither well nor wisely, and had left, in consequence, unsettled in his large livelood.

The mansion itself, which had two or three hotel furnished apartments, had been placed by him at the disposal of the landlord of the hotel on this occasion, for the accommodation of such gentlemen as he might find himself unable to receive at his own house. There being no remedy, I was compelled to submit to this arrangement, and in a few minutes the attendance on witnesses, consultations with counsel, and the usual preparations for going into court, put the matter entirely out of my head.

My cause was the third on the list. The first was understood to be a short cause, and was to be soon be disposed of; the second was a case relating to a water-course, which every body knows to be one of the most tedious and lengthy of all the possible cases; this, it was expected, would be arranged out of court, in which case my services would be called on early in the course of the day. Contrary, however, to expectation, neither of these probabilities occurred, and although I continued to stay in court all day my cause remained untried.

About six o'clock, therefore, fatigued and mentally worry, I repaired to the hotel, where, after a good dinner and a consultation with our leading counsel, I found a comfortable fire and a cup of tea to my quarters at about ten o'clock. It is scarcely needful to add that my mind was completely occupied with the coming trial, the result of which, from various circumstances, was of more than ordinary importance to our firm.

It struck me, however, that the fly was longer than I had expected in conveying me to the place of abode for the night, and this circumstance at length roused me from my preoccupation; and, looking out of the window, I perceived that we had left the town, and was proceeding along a dark lane which appeared to have diverged from the main turnpike-road. In a few minutes the carriage stopped at a garden-door, which was opened by the driver, who then proceeded to let me out of the fly, intimating that this was the house where I was to sleep, and that he had brought the key in his pocket.

On getting out of the fly with my small portmanteau, which contained, among other things, a considerable sum of money, I found myself in front of a large old-fashioned house, standing in the midst of a desolate, neglected lawn. In a window on the first-floor a light was burning; that room, the driver informed me, was my bedroom; the door was locked, and he had instructions to deliver the key into my hands, and to assure me that I should find every thing very comfortable; and that in the morning he would bring the fly for me at an early hour to take me to my breakfast at the inn. Bidding the man "good-night," I went toward the mansion, key in hand, prepared to forget all troubles in a sound night's rest.

The night was starlight—there was no moon—and but for the little light shining through the first window, the position of the house and its characteer would have been scarcely traceable from the distance at which I entered by the garden-door. As I advanced it became more defined, and the overgrown wilderness in which it stood gave a decided character of desolation.

Opening the door with my key, and again carefully locking it inside, and securing it with one or two rusty bolts, I went up stairs, the light from a small lamp fixed against the wall in the hall being my only guide.

As I ascended the staircase a monotonous feeling of solitude flashed across me; but my mind was too much preoccupied, and my brain too weary, to allow the feeling to develop itself as it might have done under other circumstances.

At the head of the staircase was a long corridor containing three doors; the middle door was that I tried as I went along, and found both fastened.

The third, which, being open, was of my apartment.

I dwell on these details because, trivial as they may appear, it was precisely these slight observations which, I make no doubt, furnished the link of association by which a strange and old-fashioned story was suddenly drawn forth from oblivion, and to this I probably owe the preservation of my life.

The old neglected house, the dark staircase with its heavy oak balustrade, the lofty corridor with its dark panding, the long passage with its closed-up rooms, suddenly arrayed themselves in my imagination as the actual scene of the childish tale of terror; and, in my absence of all I could do, it clung made me hide my head shudderingly under the bed-clothes, and which had hidden itself, unrecalled, in some unknown recess of the mind for upward of thirty years.

The room prepared for me was a large and comfortable one; two wax-lights were burning on the table, and the materials for a fire had been left beside the grate.

One—only one precaution I took before I got into bed—namely, to look for the pistols, which I carefully glad to lie down to sleep. To sleep! did I say, nay, lost in the unsubstantial world of dreams.

The story I have alluded to repeated itself in its most minute details to my quickened memory, and kept me in the most wakeful of all my wakefulness.

This story, with all its puerility, I must now, without further preface, relate:

"Once upon a time"—(this, of course, is the unvarying formula for the commencement of every story ever been introduced from time immemorial)—once upon a time there was a clergyman who was, on the occasion of his marriage, living at a considerable distance from home, through a wild and mountainous country, in the days of the border-laws. A man. He was quite a stranger in the parish to which this duty called him. Besides preaching a sermon, he had to administer the sacrament, immediately after which he set out on foot to return homeward, accompanied only by a guide and one whose house lay in the same direction as his own.

It was winter time, and a snow-storm coming on suddenly, the clergyman and his friends lost their way.

They were weakened from his sleep by what sounded like a fashionable double knock at the house-door. This was opened from within, and, to his considerable amazement, the clergyman found himself of a large party, ascending the broad staircase, and passing along the lofty corridor assembled in the great room, where supper-tables were laid out in splendor and merriment of a boisterous description.

In the midst of all this revelry sat the host, no fear.

Startled and surprised as he had at first been, he was yet more so when he heard the door of the room, from which the sounds proceeded, thrown open and a footstep approach his own.

Stepping aside, he saw that the visitor knocked, and a voice said, "John Armstrong, open the door!"

This was repeated three times, and the startled clergyman not replying, the voice said, "John Armstrong!" Open the door, else it will be the worse for thee!"

Now, as it will be recollected that the clergyman was a stranger in the neighborhood, and that his name entirely unknown, the circumstance of the latter fact was the only circumstance which could enabled him at once to determine upon the supernatural character of his visitant.

Hastily throwing open and taking his Bible in his hand, he opened the door, and perceived a tall, stern, and gloomy figure, of appearance most weary, who said he had been desired by his master to invite the Reverend John Armstrong to join the party.

The clergyman, on hearing this invitation, made no low bow in response, nor made, in fact, any way of courtesy or gratitude for the invitation, as to enable him the more accurately to ascertain the peculiar nature of the host. He answered that he said that, on perceiving the cloven feet, which appeared in the place of ordinary feet, he knew that their doubt remained on his mind as to the quarter whence the invitation proceeded: he therefore besought himself of prayer, and retired to the farther ground of ill-health, but the servant urging his request, and threatening the anger of his master if the refusal was persisted in, the clergyman took the alternative but compliance, and followed his guide along the corridor to the apartment where the feast was held, still grasping his Bible.

On entering the room, what was his astonishment at the splendid sight which now greeted him! A vast apartment, superbly lighted up and filled with people attired in the most splendid style, and at a table which was covered with all imaginable dainties!

But the entrance of the clergyman the gentleman at the head of the table rose and came forward to meet him, placing him in the seat of honor at his right hand.

There was one small circumstance, however, at which the master of the feast took no notice, and it was nothing less than the entire uselessness, at such a time, of the little book which the clergyman held in his hand, and with which he resolutely refused to part.

On this Mr. Armstrong, rising with great solemnity, and holding the Bible in his outstretched hand, amidst the cries, imprecations, and threatening gestures of the entire assembly, said: "Lord! I have this day preached in Thy house, and have administered the bread and wine of Thy salvation, and am I come this night to eat with devils?"

While he said these startling words the lights faded away into darkness, and, amidst shrieks and howlings, the walls fell in with a crash, and the clergyman found himself among his friends of the morning congregation, no sign remaining of the feast or of the fiendish assembly.

This was the curious story, which would, in spite of all my efforts, now force itself upon my recollection; and, in my absence of all I could do, it clung to me like Nessus's shirt!

Unless you know what it is to have been a victim in the solitude of night to the horrors of a perturbed imagination, you can have but a slight idea of the suffering I underwent. My position, as it seemed, from all human kind—my perfect ignorance of the locality—and worse than all, the similarity of my sleeping-room and its approaches to the picture which my excited imagination had so vividly drawn of the scene of the story of these diabolical revelries supposed to have been witnessed by John Armstrong, all conspired to fill me with the feelings to the highest pitch of terror and excitement.

And so I lay awake, tumbling and tossing; until, finding sleep totally impossible, I resolved on getting up, and dressing myself.

The act of dressing in a great measure dispelled the nightmare-like feelings which clung to me in bed; but still I felt the necessity of exertion to my couch. The lights were yet burning, as I had instructed they should be, throughout the night; and I sat down, having taken out my writing materials, and determined to shake off the influence which had been laboring on me, by writing down the story which my reason assured me must be mere fiction, and could have had no existence in reality.

This, you will say, was a strange mode of endeavoring to pass away the night pleasantly; but, somehow, I determined to do it, and I could put it on paper, and shut it by in my pet-folio, I should make a clean breast of it, and the harassing spirit in his full-bottomed wig would be banished for ever altogether from my mind.

I had reached the point in my ghostly narrative at which Armstrong is startled by hearing a knock at the outer door, when—imagine my amazement!—I heard the very knock, at the very door, which the guest of the house!—a succession of taps, as it seemed, alleged with the knuckles of a man.

So strongly was my mind imbued with the details of the strange story which I was writing down, that my first impression was that I had unconsciously hear the tramp of the diabolical visitant on his staircase, followed by the three taps at my door, announcing me to a ghastly festival prepared below!

I sat listening, while my blood froze in my veins.

A moment's attention convinced me that there was no footsteps on the stone walk outside the house; and now I heard for the first time, in the dead of the night, that peculiar sound which those who have lived in the country will remember as never forget—the whirling, crackling, crunching sound of a centre-bit, apparently conducted by a tall and skilful hand.

It was curious to feel how instantaneously the mind vanishes from the actual. I was immediately what I should now have to encounter, and my nerves were at once braced to meet the encounter.

Most gratefully did I acknowledge the Providence by which I had been kept awake, and instead of being in that deep sleep which would have rendered me an easy prey to the burglar now about to attack me.

My first consideration was as to my means of defence, and to that end I laid down the pen for completing them. I remembered with some degree of comfort that there were three heavy fastenings upon the street door, and although I knew too well that each must yield in its turn to the irresistible agency of the centre-bit, I was yet pleased that some minutes must elapse before he could succeed in gaining an entrance.

Suddenly the knocking sound ceased; and for a few seconds there was a dead silence, during which my vivid imagination represented to me, undoubtedly as if I had been an actual spectator, the brawny arm of the burglar stealthily introduced, and the hand in the passage, busily engaged in turning the key. For a moment I thought of imitating a clever and successful experiment said to have been performed by a person similarly attacked, who quietly awaited the introduction of the housebreaker's hand through the door, and then suddenly and violently provided with a powerful cord, in which he had prepared a running noose, slipped it dexterously over the hand, tightened it about at the wrist, and fastened it securely at the other end to the leg of the heavy kitchen table, leaving his visitor secure to enjoy the dawn and early morning air, while he quietly returned to bed to finish securely his night's repose. But a few moments' reflection convinced me that in my best means of resistance were rather passive than active, and that I might more safely rely on them.

In the first place, I quickly ascertained that my arm had very powerful bolts on the heavy lock.

I had contented myself on going to bed with turning the key in the lock, but I had not observed to shoot the upper and lower bolts; these I found very much rusted, but with the aid of a little Macassar oil I succeeded in overcome that resistance.

While I was thus employed the work of the centre-bit was suddenly arrested, and every movement of the housebreaker was again before me.

I now looked round me for some weapon that might serve me in case of need, and found a tolerably heavy poker, which satisfied me that I had something tangible to rely on.

My preparations for attack and defense being now completed, I coolly awaited the next step of the housebreaking gang, standing with the poker in his shell, or like Robinson Crusoe in his lonely citadel. A slight lowering of the flame of the candle from a current of air which rushed up the staircase and beneath my door, showed me that the burglar had effected his entrance: in another moment his footstep was on the broad staircase. He stepped with the caution of one proceeding on tiptoe, with the least possible noise, but having asserted three or four steps, there was an apparent halt.

I knew perfectly well what he was doing, and the measured creak of the staircase thenceforward alone gave notice of his approach with shoeless feet in spite of my precautions, it is impossible to deny that my heart beat violently. I relied however upon this, namely, that the burglar being apparently alone, he would hesitate to attack a man whom he found awake and vigilant, and who, for aught he knew, might be provided with firearms, or prove more than a match for himself in point of personal strength or courage; only upon the supposition that I was unprepared for resistance could he have hoped to succeed in his attack.

The footsteps of the burglar—and could be marked advancing along the passage. They came at last to a halt by my door, and, despite of my internal assurances that I was prepared to stand upon pw was impossible, I found myself irresistibly grasping the poker, and with the first cross which the burglar cautiously made upon the handle of my door.

Finding, as he probably had anticipated, that my door was locked, he lost no time in commencing his operations, with a view of introducing his jemmy into my room. The peculiar noise of the centre-bit recommenced, and the burglar no doubt thought all was going on prosperously for the execution of his nefarious project. I, however, felt that I could stand this no longer, and thought it high time to let him know that I was upon the watch on my guard. Rising from my seat, and stepping heavily across the floor, I shouted, in a gruff voice, "Hallos, you scoundrel! do you wish me to shoot you through the head? Be off! for, by Heaven, if last bolt of this door is drawn, I will come inside my door you shall carry away a bloody stump!" The immediate effect of this was a withdrawing of the hurried retreat of my enemy, satisfied me of the success of my threat; and having heard the house-door closed, I locked and bolted everything through the garden, I betook myself to bed (when, indeed, I had not been before), with the full conviction that I need apprehend no further attempt; and I slept soundly during the few hours still left me.

The hostler came to rouse me in the morning, bringing a fly with him to convey me to the inn.

When he found the entrance door unbolted, and the panels cut through in three places, he expected, I believe, to find me lying dead on the staircase aquitter; and was infinitely surprised as well as relieved to see me up and dressed, and in excellent health and spirits. I told him briefly how I had frustrated the burglar's attempt; and as he appeared much interested in the matter, I accompanied him to the front door, where he examined with much attention the marks of the centre-bit with something like a professional admiration a beautiful picture or piece of sculpture.

"Ay, ay, sir," said he at length, speaking to himself, "the man that cut them holes knew'd how to handle the tool."

So strongly did this sentiment of admiration appear to operate upon his mind, that at the conclusion of our inspection, during which I observed that he was driving very abstractedly, getting twice locked with passing carts, and narrowly evading the manners of the fly with the turnpike-gate) he informed me that he had invented two lines of poetry on the occasion, which ran as follows:

"Whosoever handles that there tool
Nobody oughtn't to call he a fool."

He was evidently extremely proud of this effusion, and much gratified at my commendation of it, which I felt a very remarkable piece of poetry.

The court opened at nine A.M., and previous to its opening I had an interview with the witnesses on both sides had come up during the night—these on our own side it was necessary I should see before going into court, in order to consult with our counsel at eight. Altogether my head and hands were full that day, and I had no time to communicate the narrate to him my adventure.

Contrary to all expectation, the Water case could not be disposed of, and was ordered to be heard before mine; but as it might still be settled at any moment, we were kept in attendance. However, one pelled to remain in court in case of such an event occurring, which indeed it did about mid-day, and until eight o'clock in the evening. We very thought absorbed in the conduct and consideration of the cause in which it was engaged and which was now before the court.

At half past eight the court rose, leaving nearly the half of the witnesses unexamined, the result of which was that I should be compelled to spend another night in the town.

Having some misgivings as to passing the night again within the lonely house, I required at once to be taken to the hotel. To this I was refused in him my adventure of the previous night, and expressed my unwillingness to spend the night apart from my brother lawyers.

He had heard the story from the hostler, and repeated almost word for word. The landlord he requested me to venture there again, accompanied by himself and the superintendent of the county police, who had at that time staying at his hotel, who had heard the story, and thought he had a clew to the offender. To this I readily agreed, and in ten minutes the landlord, superintendent, and myself, with a variety of creature comforts supplied from the hotel, were on our way toward the solitary habitation.

As we passed through the streets of the town the superintendent caught sight of a policeman, to whom he beckoned, and who, after a few words had been exchanged with the latter, was admitted to fill the vacancy in our carriage. Arrived at the house, which, with the exception of the superintendent, in company with myself and B 55—who by-the-way, struck me as having an appearance of great sagacity—proceeded to reconnoitre the premises on the ground-floor. We found that the hostler had very judiciously employed a carpenter to repair in a rough way the damaged door.

The landlord, who was well acquainted with the premises, made the shrewd observation that the attempt must have been made by some one perfectly conversant with the interior of the house, other wrist, instead of effecting an entrance by the front door, he would have tried it at the back, which was of much less substantial material and was more privately situated; the fact being that from long disuse the bolts of the back door were so completely rusted in as to be immovable.

All was quiet within the dwelling, and having made all secure below stairs, we ascended to my bedroom, where we intended to make a night of it.

It was chilly—we lighted a fire; the contents of the basket supplied by the landlord included, as we found, most luxurious means of gastronomic enjoyment, to say nothing of two large sealed bottles, which were apparently much admired by the policemen, who proved to be great adepts at drawing corks.

Our occupation in this way having at length come to an end, discourse began to flag; we sat round the fire in silence, a single remark from time to time alone proving that some of us were awake. As for me, in consequence of my previous night's disturbance and the day's fatigue, I could scarcely keep my eyes open.

Hour after hour of the night thus passed, and it was evident that we had all given up every idea of the attack upon me being renewed. The candles had burned out, but the policeman's lantern gave us sufficient light, added to the slight glimmering in the grate.

Suddenly, and indeed in the midst of a good story of his own—with which he was endeavoring to keep us awake, the policeman stopped, like a hound who has struck a scent, and dropping on his knees, listened with his ear to the keyhole for a few seconds.

The superintendent watched him in silence; I did the same; and it was now that it struck me how strangely I had erred in applying in my own mind the epithet of stupidity to him, as he undoubtedly flashed into his own element, the personification of keenness and intelligence.

"I'll tell you what, Sir," said the policeman, rising from the ground, "our man's in this room, or not far off; I can hear his breathing, and if I don't mistake, he has a dog with him."

Drawing a pistol from an inward pocket, the superintendent very quietly examined the cap, which he took off, and replaced by one which he fished up from his waistcoat pocket. The handcuffs, who was a resolute and powerful man, also drew forth a similar weapon, while I availed myself of my host night's resource, the poker, threw a handful of wood on the fire to create a blaze, and now, wide awake, stood still with much curiosity, and some anxiety, what would follow. The policeman's bludgeon completed our defense.

It must here be observed that the room was papered with a representation of leaves and flowers in a strongly marked pattern. The handcuffs, when in his hand, the policeman proceeded to make a close examination of the wall, which, by the application of his bull's-eye, he immediately manifested to be hollow.

"We have a closet behind this, and must find the door," said he.

A rigid inspection shortly enabled us to do this, although it was concealed with extraordinary neither lock nor handle appearing; and the pattern of leaves and flowers being so contrived as to preclude the idea of any opening existing.

Aided by a knife from the supper-table, the superintendent threw open the door of the closet, which, as far as we could perceive, was untenanted.

A deep, dark, hollow space, however, existed on both sides of the door, in the interior of the wall, and we felt that it was in one of these that we must now look for the object of our search. The superintendent was much excited, and disregarding a warning from B 45, stepped boldly within the door, lifting the lantern high above his head so as to enable him to gaze into the dark interior.

At the same moment a shadow was discharged from the recess, and the superintendent fell heavily to the ground.

I was nearest to him, and rushed to his succor: he was bleeding copiously from a wound in the thigh, and my efforts to bandage it were not observed in dragging him beyond the reach of his assailant, and afterward in endeavoring to stanch the blood by binding a handkerchief tightly round him, that I was unable to take any further part in endeavoring to capture the person who now emerged from the closet, followed by a large white bull-dog. This dog was shot at once by our brave landlord, who, as a powerful, active and truculent-looking fellow, made directly for the door, fighting his way through his enemies with great vigor and determination.

At length B 45, with a blow from his bludgeon, laid him prostrate. He was then secured and handcuffed, and subsequently marched off to the county jail. On searching the premises, Howard and a large clasp-knife were found on his person, and he was recognized as a criminal of a most atrocious character, who had been transported for years before for complicity in a heavy burglary, accompanied with murder, and rendered with circumstances of great cruelty and atrocity.

He was known to have escaped, and suspected to be in the neighborhood, where he had friends and connections; and as he had in his boyhood lived as groom in the very house where we captured him, we were, at once satisfied as to the reason by which he obtained so minute an acquaintance with the premises. A reward was also offered by Government for his apprehension. It was eventually discovered that he had for some time been lurking concealed in one of the cellars of this house, where he had been supplied at night with the necessaries of life by his friends, and that he had been locked out of his lair on my arrival; and he was doubtless the perpetrator of many mysterious robberies, which from time to time had been fatally committed in the vicinity. He would probably have both robbed and murdered me on the previous night, had I been sound asleep, instead of recollecting, providentially, as I must always consider it, the school-boy story of Jackson Howard, and his invitation to the diabolical entertainment.

The wounded superintendent happily recovered, and received from Government the reward promised by the Crown for the apprehension of the thief. And as so frequently meet in the course of our professional avocations, we seldom fail to felicitate each other on the fortunate termination of our last acquaintance with the burglar, from whom I had been thus twice strangely and providentially rescued.

TAKING THINGS COOLLY.

SOME MEN are never in a hurry. Nothing seems to flurry them—nothing disturbs their composure or ruffles their composure. Though danger threatens and imminent death is near, they calmly go their course with a degree of tranquil deliberation that almost amounts to sublimity. Whether they are rallying forth to catch the express train, or have not a minute to spare, or are waiting for change for a dollar, or at the Delmonico Hotel, and hear the melodious bell of the Boulogne steamer just beginning to ring—whether they have been privately warned to escape by the secret police, or Joint-stock bank that intends to stop payment in three-quarters of an hour, or have accidentally swallowed an overdose of opium, and are deprived by sympathizing friends to run full speed to the nearest surgeon for the stomach-pump—in all matters not, they are in no way hurried. They take the thing coolly, and encourage every other, as it ways in time. The fact that they are always in time vindicates them from the charge of apathy, of stupidity, even of insensibility to danger, or of dignity which ordinary mortals look up to and admire, but can not imitate. Such men often catch express trains and keep special appointments, and, when stimulated by self-interest, seize time emphatically by the horns. But then, they are amazing hurry they are in! What a bustle they make, and what anxieties they are to long-suffering friends and neighbors!

The attitude and bearing of an average Paterfamilias attending the departure of his wife upon pleasure or business illustrates this slow deliberation. Watch the man as he pays up the cabman, now giving superfluous instructions to a bewildered foot-boy, who is striving with perseverance worthy of a better cause to get the box on to the foot too short for the purpose—now, in a voice of querulous despair, shouting exhortations to "make haste" to the family at home—now kicking a favorite dog or cat into infinite space. Now, with a look of anxious inquiry, he counts the number of some unfortunate tradesman who had been promised payment a month ago, but, having been entirely forgotten, ventured to intrude on the moment of Paterfamilias ere it was too late—now he tumbles bodily over the dog, and, with the agility of an unsuccessful acrobat, and an expression of countenance alarming to witness—and finally he seats himself in the carriage, and, with a red and portmanteaus, like Marius musing over the ruins of Carthage. Such is the usual line of behavior of an average Paterfamilias going a journey. He is in a prodigious hustle—he is in every body's way—he worries his servants, and drives his daughters into a state of temporary frenzy—he runs to and fro in the hall, and in the dining-room table, and all his keys in his dressing-room drawer, and just has time to rush home again and fetch them.

The case of a man always in a hurry, but generally too late—always in a bustle—always just actually coming to grief—always in a whirlwind of haste, but commonly collapsing in an ignominious blunder—is the more distressing when it occurs to a partakes of the ludicrous. The cool, methodical, self-possessed man, who is always ready at the end of the street, tells his servant to wake him when the fusees reach No. 20 (three doors off), and turns round to resume his nap, is a fine object for story. As a contrast, take the anecdote of the fussy nervous gentleman in "Lothair" (Disraeli's novel), who kept a fire-escape—a kind of sack in which he could lower himself from his window in case of fire—always ready. He would awake every night only by the sound, as he thought, of the wheels of a fire-engine, followed by the prompt application of the door, he descended in his sack in great haste, and reached the street just in time to hand his wife, who had been all the while in the room, a shawl.

For business-like coolers, commend us to that wonderful Irishman, Napper Tandy, who was once attacked, admitted his assailants—only a few dozen or so—one by one through the partially opened door, and calmly killed each of them with a kitchen-knife the moment the threshold was passed. Again, there is the well-known anecdote of Sydney Heath. "I have you now, my lord," cries a highwayman, clapping a pistol to his lordship's breast, "either all your bonds or your life, whichever you choose!" "Nor should he now, but for that other fellow peeping over your shoulder," says Mr. highwayman turns, and his lordship blows his brains out. We were always sorry for that highwayman, and are not sure that he would not have been the greater loss to society. But let that pass. Turn now to another contrast on the part of the highwayman. It was one night's evening, hears a tap at the window-shutter, and, exulted by the recollection of a similar adventure, fires away, seizes a pistol, rushes to the front door, opens it wildly, shuts his eyes, fires into the darkness, locks and bolts the door, rushes back to the bosom of his family, little thinking that, instead of frightening a burglar, he has killed his housemaid's sweet-heart. Or take the case of the agitated old bachelor in a retired country residence, who, hearing a noise in the garden, sallies forth, taking one pistol himself, and giving another to the parlor-maid, with these emphatic instructions: "Mary, I go this way, you go that; and mind you shoot the first man you meet!" which man very naturally happens to be Mr. Jackson the bachelor's friend.

An English tourist, taking an evening stroll near Naples, was hastily pulled by a stranger in a narrow path. Robberies were rife, and immediately afterward, on putting his hand to his pocket, he missed his watch. The watch is precious, the stranger an insignificant-looking man, why should he not complain, accept so impudent a robbery? Off he starts, overtakes the supposed thief, knocks him down, shouts "Watch! watch!" in very imperfect Italian, and severely bastinadoes him. The prostrate culprit hurriedly hands out the article demanded, and the Englishman stalks away, rejoicing to have recovered his property, and grasping the pluck he has displayed. On reaching his hotel, however, he finds, and behold, there is his watch in watch quietly ticking on the chimney-piece! He has the Englishman accept so impudent a robbery? Off he starts, overtakes the supposed thief, knocks him down, shouts "Watch! watch!" in very imperfect Italian, and severely bastinadoes him. The prostrate culprit hurriedly hands out the article demanded, and the Englishman stalks away, rejoicing to have recovered his property, and grasping the pluck he has displayed. On reaching his hotel, however, he finds, and behold, there is his watch in watch quietly ticking on the chimney-piece! He has the Englishman, all unconscious, made a flagrant highway robbery, and makes a precipitate flight from Naples to escape the clutches of the police. Some such, in all probability, circumstances exercise passion self-possession curiously blended with utter distraction of mind. This may perhaps be explained by the supposition that the self-possession is mechanical, the mere result of habit, and not an act of the will in the usual sense of the word. Or, a form of fictitious presence of mind may operate though courage be extinguished, and even reason suspended, by the shock of a sudden peril. The following is an authentic instance: A passenger fell overboard from a sailing-boat in deep water with a fresh breeze blowing. The boat was instantly put about, and the man swam toward it. He was nearly within reach of the outstretched hands of the crew when his hat blew off and floated away. The man coolly turned and swam after it, reached it with difficulty, fixed it firmly on his head, and once more breasted the waves in the direction of the boat. In a few minutes he was laid hold of, and safely hoisted on board. No sooner was he on deck than he thrust his hands into his pockets, and flung, first his purse, then his keys, into the sea, and was going to fling his watch when the sailors seized his hands. He was in the momentary irresponsible lunatic, and the calm determination not to lose his hat was probably a mere mechanical instinct.

Women often evince abundance of self-possession in America passengers by railway or steamboat on metal checks, or counters, for each article of luggage, failing to produce which they would on no account be returned to them. An English lady traveling in America with a quantity of luggage, felt that she could not afford to lose a single item. A gentlemanly stranger had seen. We like much the anecdote of the Irishman sketching on the sea-shore. "A monster in human form," to use newspaper phraseology, invaded the locality, and, stripping the lady's person, commenced depositing the whole of the water exactly in front of the rock where they were sitting. The gentleman never screamed nor ran away, but tranquilly put up their drawing materials, and as soon as the intruder had swum out a sufficient distance, seized the "monster's" clothing apparel, and carrying it off, left it at a farmhouse two miles distant from the shore. But perhaps a good an instance of presence mind as could be wished is that of the late Mrs. Burdock, being for murdering an old lady at Bristol for the sake of her money. Mrs. Burdock, followed by the usual procession of clergyman, sheriff, and officials, was slowly proceeding to the place of execution outside the jail where she had been imprisoned. Suddenly the procession came to a full stop. What is the matter? A slight drizzling rain is falling, and Mrs. Burdock declines to move an inch without an umbrella. There is no help for it; clergyman and officials, hangman and mob, must wait while the prisoner waits out of the carpety lustres to the governor's house to borrow the required article, and shield Mrs. Burdock from the rain on the brief remainder of her existence. We remember an aborative case of presence of mind which, however provoked amusement, was a fearful lady of strong mind, living in a picturesque but lonely cottage over on the outskirts of the New Forest, and in her horror three shipwrecked sailors, with the usual paraphernalia of rags, ghastly countenances, and formidable bludgeons, gesticulatively through her drawing-room window. "John —William—James!" exclaims the strong-minded lady, raising the bell violently, and addressing the sonorous argument of able-bodied butlers and footmen. "Ah, you needn't trouble yourself," interrupted the spokesman of the agreeable little party on the lawn—"we've been round to the back, and found the door open, so a thing as a man to help us. It would be unjust not to add that the visitors proceeded to refreshment with a half-crown and a basketful of broken victuals.

"The more haste the worse speed." "Slow and sure wins the race." These are proverbs containing valuable truth—the wisdom of many and the will of one—former more than the latter. But after all, however, much depends on the physical temperament. Of two men, one shall be cool and self-collected, the other a prey to nervous flurry—the other in a hopeless state of fluster. Yet for the latter there is perhaps no remedy but the will of the pilgrim with boiled pease to scoff at the limping gait of his less fortunate companion. The two are unequally matched. It is often a mere affair of the pulse. So many beats, more or less, make a man a fidgety ne'er-do-well or a tranquil hero. No doubt the mental power and the earnest will are not to be ignored. They come distinctly into play, and modify or override man's natural tendencies and infirmities. No one is justified in resigning himself to a fussy temperament without a struggle. Self-respect and a due regard for the comfort of society should stimulate resistance and invite perseverance. Much can be done by foreseeing and preparation—by carefully realizing what you have undertaken to do, or what is likely to happen to you under given circumstances, and by laboring to acquire a habit of reasonable abstraction from matters unconnected with the business in hand. Yet the man who has not naturally a cool head, stolid nerves, and a pulse beating with the dogged equanimity of a kitchen clock, is heavily weighted for the race of life, and may claim generous consideration from the world at large. More especially may he claim it from those to whom kind nature has imparted the useful faculty of taking things coolly, in cloud or sunshine, in tempest or in calm.

ON THE SHORES OF TENNESSEE.

"MOVE my arm-chair, faithful Pompey,
In the sunshine bright and strong,
For this world is fading, Pompey—
Massa wish to sing a song;
And I fain would hear the south wind
Bring once more the sound to me,
Of the wavelets softly breaking
On the shores of Tennessee.

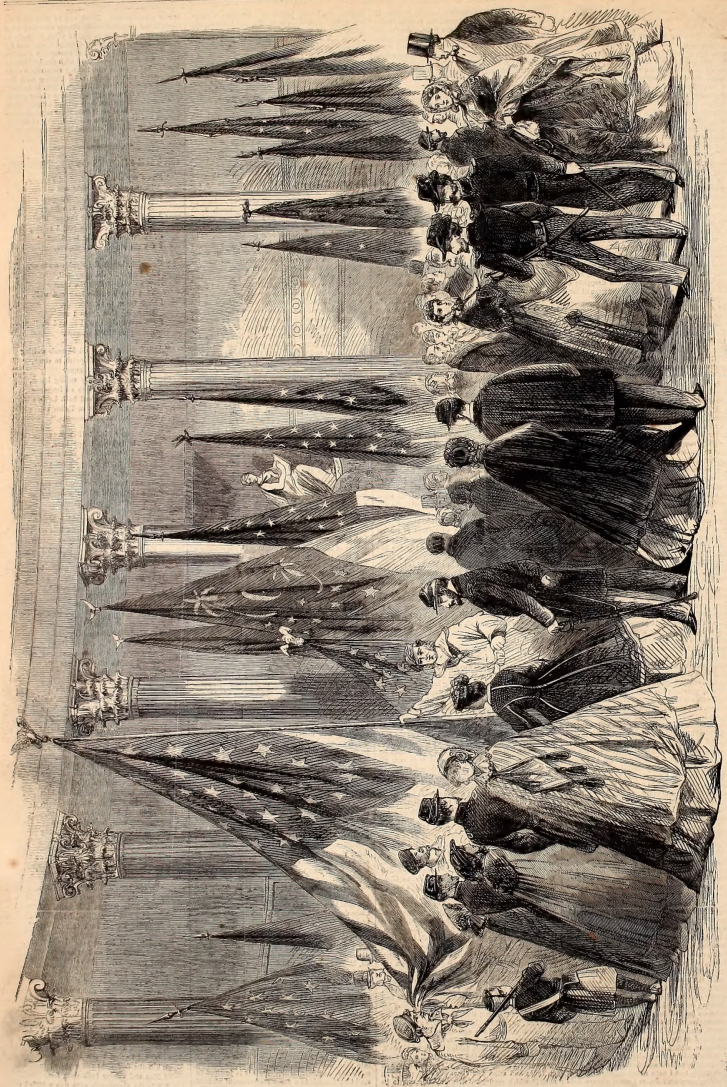
"Mournful though the ripples murmur,
As they still the story tell,
How no vessels float the banner
That I've borne so true and well.
I shall listen to their music,
Dreaming that again I see
Stars and Stripes forever floating
Sailing up the Tennessee.

"And, Pompey, while old Massa's waiting
For Death's last dispatch to come,
It that exiled starry banner
Should come proudly floating home,
You shall greet it, slave no longer—
Voice and hand shall both be free
That shout and sing Union colors
On the waves of Tennessee."

"Massa's berry kind to Pompey;
But ole darkey's happy here,
Where he's tended corn and cotton
For dese many, many year.
Yonder Missis' sleeping—
No one tends her grave like me:
Massa, he would miss the flowers
Dis same hand is here to see.

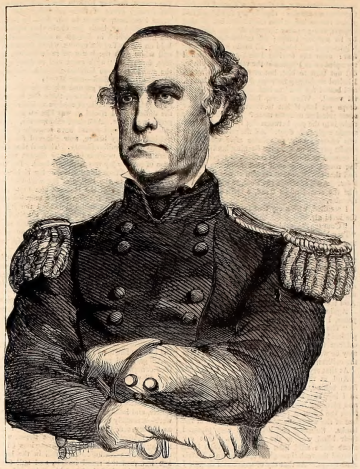
"Years like she was watching Massa—
If Pompey should beside him stay,
Mebbe she'd remember better
How he loved him used to pray.
Telling him that way up yonder
White as snow his soul would be,
If he served the Lord of Heaven
While he lived in Tennessee."

Silently the tears were rolling
Down the poor old dusky face,
As he stepped behind his master,
In his long-accustomed place.
Then a silence fell around them,
As they gazed on rock and tree
Pictured in the placid waters
Of the rolling Tennessee.



Master, dreaming of the battle
Where he fought by Marion's side,
When he bid the haughty Tarleton
Stoop his lordly crest of pride.
Man, remembering how the sapper
Once he held upon his knee,
Ere she loved the gallant soldier,
Ralph Vervair, of Kentucky.

Still the south wind fondly lingers
'Mid the veteran's silver hair;
Still the bondman close beside him
Stands behind the old arm-chair.
With his dark head bowed in reverence
Shading eyes, he bends to see
Where the woodland boldly jutting
Turns aside the Tennessee.



Thus he watches cloud-born shadows
Glide from tree to mountain-crest,
Softly creeping, aye and ever
To the river's yielding breast.
Ha! above the lofty summit,
Something flutters wild and free!
"Massa! Massa! Hallelujah!
The flag comes back to Tennessee!"

"Pompey, hold me on your shoulder,
Help me stand on foot once more,
That I may salute the colors
As they pass my cabin door.
Here's the paper signed that frees you,
Give a freeman's shout with me—
'God and Union!' be our watchword
Evermore in Tennessee."

Then the trembling voice grew fainter,
And the limbs refused to stand;
One prayer to Jesus—and the soldier
Glided to that better land.
When the flag went down the river
Man and master both were free,
While the ring-dove's note was mingled
With the rippling Tennessee.

REBEL FLAGS IN THE OLD HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AT WASHINGTON.—[See Page 165.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL CURTIS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY ANTHONY.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GARFIELD.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY RISER, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO.—[SEE PAGE 151.]

GENERAL CURTIS.

WE publish herewith a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL SAMUEL R. CURTIS, of Iowa, who has just defeated Price and M'Culloch on the ARKANSAS border.

General Curtis was born February 3, 1807, in Ohio; his family were from Connecticut. He was educated at West Point, and graduated there in 1831, entering the infantry. In 1832 he resigned his commission, studied law, and practiced for a while. In the course of a year or two he turned his attention to engineering, and became chief engineer of the Muskingum Works. At the outbreak of the Mexican War he volunteered, and accompanied General Taylor on his campaign, with the rank of Colonel. He was for a time Governor of Monterey, and of other places occupied by our troops, and developed in this rank remarkable administrative ability. On his return home he again divided his time between law and engineering, and took an active part in the construction of the railroads which have aided so prodigiously in the development of our Western States. He settled at Keokuk, Iowa, and was elected from thence to Congress in 1858, and again in 1860. He resigned his seat in the House to enter the army, and has for some time commanded a column in Missouri, under the orders of Gen. Halleck. He is now in chase of General Price's band of rebels, whom we learn he defeated on 19th ult. at Sugar Creek, on the Arkansas border.

EXECUTION OF GORDON THE SLAVE-TRADER, NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 21, 1862.—[SEE PAGE 150.]

ENGLISH PATRIOTISM.

I have thought Johnny Bull a clever old soul,
Sensible, jolly, good-natured, and kind,
Quite crusty at times, but urbane on the whole,
In a word a hall-fellow much to my mind;
And I've thought, when I looked on his ponderous chest,
"My eyes! what a heart to fill out such a breast!"

But my notions of John are now sadly changed;
That pledge of love is eaten he's forgotten;
In my heart how I've fed him! I fed him encouraged,
His vast, I perceive, is but puddid with cotton!
His fine-looking home has, like a wisp in the straw,
And sunk in his heart in the depths of his pocket!

He still remains grumpy, and pastor of his rights,
Of privileges to his commerce and trade;
That the civilized world never witnessed such slights
As that humbling of ours—we call a blockade.
Aha! he is artfully playing his part,
But I know that colossus is almost his heart.

With him, to a nation of dollars and cents,
Allurements of trade have upset his reason;
Yet he may gather more pounds than half-pence
In wasting the blows intended for treason.
The venture in which he's so dizzily whirling,
May cost him far more than four millions sterling.

A SOUTH SIDE COLLOQUY.

DICK.

Count, ole Julo, if dis nigger was to die,
He sabe saw de like how de women folks do cry!
When de cotton's all done pick'd,
An' de corn in all done pack'd,
Dere's a power o' bitter tears in your eye,
An' for why?

JULO.

Go 'way, Dick, you is silver picking fun,
De very hardest nigger 'way 'mong de common run;
An' ye hasn't no more sense
Than to come down de fence
When dis tressed done ole Soul is so proud,
Lor' be breed!

DICK.

Ha-ha, Julo! 'tis de glory's comin' on,
An' de lickins for massa Linkum is all done gone;
An' de sincerse'll cry,
An' de massi'll wipe 'is eye,
But ole Dick'll be a limbing, ne'e see,
Dat 'ere free!

JULO.

Shut up, Dick! Yare, what heape de niggers know,
What spec'late to perwade or de pryin' hate to go;
Where de Yankees is de talk,
How de makes de brack folks walk,
An' de cells 'em to de Bahia de ole,
Dat kills me!

DICK.

Lor' sakes, Julo! can comprehen' dat ere,
How de white brethren makes in dere stockings wid de fear
But in right little time
Dose niggers da will climb
Right up de tree o' freedom dat's so thick,
De'll all stick

Come now, Julo, bring de banjo to my han',
His nigger fee'l so sher'ful like 'en was a man;
For de calaboose shall fall,
An' hell not get up at all,
An' de children, Julo, an' you an' me
Shall be free!

A STRANGE STORY.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

The fifth hour had passed away, when Ayesha said to me, "Lo! the circle is fading; the lamps grow dim. Let us watch together until the space beyond; the eyes that appalled thee are again lost in air, as lightnings that fleet back into cloud."

I looked up, and the specters had vanished. The skies were tinged with lightsomer hues, red and the black intermixed. I replenished the lamps and the ring in front, thriftily, heedfully; but what I saw was to the circle lamp, not a drop in the vessel that fed them was left. In a vague distance I more beheld than the half of the wide circle in rear of the two bended figures intent on the cadron. All along that disk the light was already broader, here and there flickering up, here and there dying down; the six lamps in that part of the circle still twinkled, but faintly, as stars shrinking fast from the noon of day. But it was not the fading shine in that half of the magical ring which attracted my eye and quickened with terror the pulse of my heart; the Bush-land beyond was on fire. From the back-ground of the forest rose the dusky red of smoke; the smoke there still half-smothering the flame. But along the width of those grasses and herbage, between the verge of the forest and the bed of the water creek just below the raised platform from which I beheld the mystic constellation, the fire was advancing; wave upon wave, clear and red against the volume of vapor behind, as the ruth of a flood through the mists of some ill-ey crossed with lightnings.

Roused from my awe at the first sight of a danger not foreseen by the mind I had steeled against that rarer portent—the unseen, I turned more for the lamps and the circle. Hurrying back to Ayesha, I exclaimed, "The phantoms have gone from the spaces in front; but what incantation or spell can arrest the red march of the fire spreading on in the rear? While we gazed on the Caldron of Life, behind us, unheeded, beheld the Destroyer!"

Ayesha looked and made no reply, but, as by involuntary instinct, bowed her majestic head, then reared it erect, placed herself yet more immediately before the watered form of the young magician (he still bending over the caldron, and hearing me not in the absorption and hope of his watch); placed herself before him, as the first whose first care is her fledgeling.

As we two there stood, fronting the deluge of fire, we heard Margrave behind us, murmuring low, "See the bubbles of light, how they sparkle and dance—I shall live, I shall live!" And his young serenity died on our ears before, crash upon crash, came the fall of the age-long trees in the forest; and nearer, all near us, through the blazing grasses, the fire flew with the wind, the scream of the birds, and the bellow and tramp of the herds, plunging wild through the hillow red of their pastures.

Ayesha now wound her arms around Margrave, and wrenched him, reluctant and struggling, from his watch over the seething caldron. In rebuke of his angry entreaty she then pointed to the march of the fire, spoke in sorrowful tones a few words in her own language, and then, appealing to me, said plaintively,

"I tell him that here the Spirits who oppose us have summoned a foe that is deaf to my voice and—"

"And," exclaimed Margrave, no longer with grasp and effort, but with the swell of a voice which drowned all the discords of terror and of agony sent forth from the Phlegethon burning below—"and I, which, when I have lived, a lifevile sheve and impotent, more desiring my death than my life, do think that I am born to be the scorn and forsake her, that in death I should die in her arms! Sorceress, avaunt! Art thou useless and powerless to save? Then shall thou most? Go! Let the world be one funereal pyre! What is it to the wrath of life's pride? My world is my life. Thou knowest that my last hope is here, that all the strength left me this night shall be given, by the charm in the circle, unless the elixir restore it. Bold friend, drive that sorceress away! Let her own time flames can assail us! A few minutes more, and life to your Lilian shall me!"

Thus having spoken, Margrave turned from us and cast into the caldron the last essence yet left to the bed of the creek.

Ayesha silently drew her black veil over her face, and turned, with the being she loved, from the terror he saw still, of which the hope that he cherished.

Then left alone, with my reason dissevered and disenchanted, I surveyed more calmly the extent of the actual peril with which we were threatened, and the means within our reach to survive it.

It is true all the Bush-land behind, almost up to the bed of the creek, was on fire; but the grasses through which, against the wind, it so rapidly ceased at the opposite margin of the creek. Watery pools still, at short distances, in the bed of the creek, shining tremulous, like waves of fire, in the glare reflected from the burning land; and even where the water failed, the steep course of the exhausted rivulet was a barrier against the march of the conflagration. Then, unless the wind, now still, should rise, and waft some sparks to the parched combustible herbage immediately around us, we were safe from the fire, and our work might yet be achieved.

I whispered to Ayesha the conclusion to which I came.

"Thinkest thou," she answered, without raising her mournful head, "that the agencies of Nature are the movements of chance. The Spirits I invoked to his aid are leagued with the hosts that assail. A Mightier than I am has doomed him!"

Scarcely had she uttered these words before Margrave exclaimed, "Behold how the Rose of the alchemist's dream enlarges its bloom from the folds of the caldron! I shall live! I shall live!"

I looked, and the liquid which glowed in the caldron had taken a splendid hue from blended all comparisons borrowed from the tints of gems. In its prevalent color it had, indeed, the lustre and flush of the ruby; but from the mass of the molten red broke coruscations of all primal hues, spangling the whole. The play that made the vessels themselves seem living things, sensible of their joy. No longer was there scum or film upon the surface; over and above a light rosy vapor floating up, and quick lost in the hanging, like a transparent veil, with the conflagration, rushing toward us from behind. And these coruscations formed on the surface of the molten ruby literally the shape of a rose, as its leaves made distinct in their outlines by sparks of emerald, sapphire, and sapphire.

Even while gazing on this amazing liquid fire—a buoyant delight seemed infused into my senses; all fear, all memory, even of the past, annulled; the phantoms, whose armies had filled the wide spaces in front, were forgotten; the crash of the forest behind was unheard. In the reflection of that glory Margrave's was cheek seemed already to gain radiance and bloom, when I saw it first in the frame-work of bloom.

As I gazed, thus enchanted, a cold hand touched my own.

"Hush!" whispered Ayesha, from the black veil, against which the last rays of the bride's diadem fell blunt, and absorbed into dark. "Behold us the light of the circle is extinct, but there we are guarded from the fire by the brand and soulless destroyers. But before!—but before!—see! see!" and she pointed toward the one blank of the gap in the ring! Guard that breach—before the demons will enter!"

"Not a drop is there left in the vessel by which to replenish the lamps on the ring."

"Advance; then; thou hast still the light of the soul, and the demons may recoil before a soul that is dauntless and guiltless. If not, There are lost!—as it is, One is doomed."

Thus adjured, silently, involuntarily, I passed from the Veiled Woman's side into the same lines on the turf which had been traced by the triangles of light long since extinguished, and toward the gap in the ring. As I advanced, overhead rushed a dark cloud of wings, bird dislodged from the forest on fire, and screaming, in dissonant terror, as they flew toward the furthermost mountains: close by my feet fluted and glided the snakes, driven forth from their blazing covers, and glancing through the ring, uncaured by its waning lamps; all undulating by me, bright-eyed and hissing; all made innocuous by fear: even the terrible Death-adder, which I trampled on as I halted at the verge of the circle, did not turn to bite, but crept harmless away. In the blazing grasses, the fire-fly sported gayly, and bowed my head to look again into the crystal vessel. There, indeed, the fiery coruscations drops yet left, if but to recruit the lamps for some priceless minutes more? As I thus stood, with but a single step between the two dead lamps, strode a gigantic Foot. All the rest of the form was invisible; only, as volume after volume of smoke poured on from the burning land behind, it seemed as if one great column of vapor, eddying round and round in itself, gave birth to that Foot, and that out from that column strode the giant Foot. And, as strode the Foot, so with it came, like the wind, a hand, a wild hand, a shattered thunder.

It recoiled, with a cry that rang loud through the lurid air.

"Courage!" said the voice of Ayesha. "Thinking soul, yield not an inch to the demon!"

And the charm, the wonderful charm, in the tone of the Veiled Woman's voice, my will seemed to take a force more sublime than its own. I felt the pressure on my temples, and knew as if rooted upon the spot, confronting the colossus of smoke and the stride of the giant Foot. And the Foot halted, mute.

Again, in the momentary hush of that suspense, I heard the voice of Margrave—

"The last hour expires—the work is accomplished! I drink the Nectar—and now I pour the caldron from the fire—and, quick! or a drop may be wasted in vapor, the Elixir of Life, from the caldron!"

At that cry I receded, and the Foot advanced.

And at that moment, suddenly, unawares, from behind, I was stricken down. Over me, as I lay, swept a whirlwind of trampling hoofs and glancing horns. The herds, in their flight from the burning pastures, had rushed over the bed of the water-course—scaled the slopes of the banks. Those, following, had swept from their blind way to the mountains. One cry alone rose—the cry from their own savage blare pierced the reek through which the Brute Hurricane swept. At that cry of wrath and despair I began dimly to rise, upon dashed to the earth by the hoofs and the horns. But was it the dreamlike dread of my own agonies, or did I see that the giant Foot stride past through the close-serried ranks of the maddening herds? Did I hear, distinct, above the roar, the bellow, the neigh, the terror, the roll of low thunder which followed the stride of that Foot?

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

When my senses had recovered its shock, and my eyes had dimly round, the charge of the beasts had swept by—and all the wild terror which had invaded the magical circle, the only lingerer was Ayesha's Death-adder, which lay close by the spot where my head had rested. Beside the extinguished lamps which the hoofs had confounded and dimmed, the fire, arrested by the water-course, had consumed the grasses that fed it, and there the flames formed a black arch desert as the Phlegraan fields of the Foet's Hell. But the fire still raged in the forest beyond—and the flames, driven by from the ranks of the tallest trees, and forming, through the sullen dark of the smoke-cloud, innumerable pillars of fire, like the halls in the City of Fiends.

Gathering myself up, I turned my eyes from the confusion of the lurid forest, and looked fearfully down on the hoof-trampled sward for my two companions.

I saw the dark image of Ayesha still seated, still bending, as I had seen it, over the caldron; but the veil was torn from the rim of that vessel, or drop, which, lay, hurled down from its tripod by the rush of the herds, yards away from the dim fading embers of the scattered lamps. And I saw the faint writhings of a frail, wasted frame, of a face which the Veiled Woman was bending to, saw, as I moved with bruised limbs to the place, close by the lips of the dying magician, the flash of the ruby-like liquor spilled on the sward, and, meteor-like, sparkling up from the torn folds of Ayesha's robe.

I now reached his side, bending over him, too, as the Veiled Woman bent; and as I sought with my hand to raise him, I was turned face, faltering out, "Touch me not, rob me not. You share with me—" Then, suddenly, the convulsive drops are all mine! Die all else! I will live—I will live!" Writhing himself from my pitying arms, he flung from him the empty cup of crystal and, meteor-like, sparkling up from the torn folds of Ayesha's robe.

I now reached his side, bending over him, too, as the Veiled Woman bent; and as I sought with my hand to raise him, I was turned face, faltering out, "Touch me not, rob me not. You share with me—" Then, suddenly, the convulsive drops are all mine! Die all else! I will live—I will live!" Writhing himself from my pitying arms, he flung from him the empty cup of crystal and, meteor-like, sparkling up from the torn folds of Ayesha's robe.

Then Ayesha tenderly, silently drew the young head to her breast, and it vanished from my sight behind her black veil.

I knelt beside her, murmuring some trite words of consolation which reached me not, rocking herself to and fro as the mother who cradles a child to sleep. Soon the fast flickering sparkles of the lost elixir died out on the grass, and with their last sportive diamond-like tremble of light, up, in all the suddenness of Australian day, rose the sun, lifting itself royally above the mountain-tops, and fronting the insane blaze of the forest as it now fronted its lurid glare. And as there, where the bush fires had ravaged, all was a desert, so there, where their feet had not spread, all was a garden. Afar, at the foot of the mountains, the fugitive herds were grazing; the cranes, flocking back to the pools, renewed their strange grace of their quadrille; and the great kingfisher, whose laugh, half in mirth, half in mockery, leads the choir that welcome the morn—which in Europe is night—alighted bold on the roof of the cavern, whose floors were still white with the bones of rarer extinct beings, formed to "walk erect and to gaze upon the stars," rose—so helpless through instinct, so powerful through reason! Lord of the Earth.

But there, on the ground where the dazzling elixir had wasted its virtue, lay the being already had a freshness of verdure which, amidst the duller sward round it, was like an oasis of green in a desert. And there still flowed, where shiid hass the eye would have scarcely distinguished it, that fair herbe, now glistened in blooms of unfamiliar beauty. Toward that spot were attracted myriads of happy insects, whose hum of festive joy was musical as bees. Was the form of the life-seeking sorcerer lay rigid and stark; that form to the sheets of the emptied caldron, and the fire still had not reached the verge of the ring of the moon. The armed men with crimson and golden lace, their weapons gayly gleaming with holiday silver. After them, with Black Lance at their head, came my place. Ayesha, not raising her head, spoke to them in their own language in tones low and solemn. The armed men bounded forward, and the bearers left the litter.

All gathered round the dead form with the face concealed under the black veil; all knelt, and all wept. Far in the distance, at the foot of the blue mountains, a crowd of the savage natives had risen up as if from the earth; they stood motionless, with their long bills and spears, and looking toward the spot on which we were—strangely thus brought into the landscape, as if they too had dwelled on the verge which Humanity guards from the Brute, were among the monsters for ever excluded. Child of mysterious Nature! And still in the herbage hummed the small insects, and still from tree to tree laughed the kingfisher. Last I said to Ayesha, "Farewell, your love mourns the dead, but your duty is to the living. All that are now with your own people; they may console you; say if I can assist."

"There is no consolation for me! What mourner can be consoled if the dead die forever? Nothing for him is left but a grave; that grave shall be in the land where he was born. Ayesha first lulled him to sleep! Thou assist me? Impossible! Nor was there in the past one ask assistance. What road wilt thou take to thy home?"

"There is but one road known to me through the maze of the solitude—that which we took to the upland."

"On that road Death lurks and awaits thee! Blind dupe, couldst thou think that if the grand secret of life be attainable, the wise would rests on my lap would have yielded thee one petty drop from the crystal vessel which held the last store of life but a moment? Me, who so loved and so cherished him—me, he would have doomed to the lifeless cord of mummy! Strangler, if my death could have lengthened a hairbreadth the span of his being. But what matters to me the crime or the madness? I loved him—I loved him!"

She bowed her veiled head lower and lower; perhaps, under the veil, her lips kissed the lips of the dead. Then she said, whisperingly,

"Stranger, Stranger, forgive! Ayesha was fatal ed to his master, whose prey never slipped from its tenure, would not step on the path of my home! but thy death can not now profit the dead, the beloved. And thou hast had pity for him who took but blow and no deadly destruction. His life is lost, thine is saved!"

She spoke now in the language that I could interpret. She spoke, in the language unknown, a few murmured words to her swarthy attendants; then she rose, still veiled, still weeping, and made a dumb sign to me to go with them. Understood by the sign that Ayesha had told them to guard me on my way; but she gave no reply to my parting thanks.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

I descended into the valley; the armed men followed. The path, on that side of the watershed, was not steep, but winding, through meadows still green, or amidst groves still unscathed. As I turning in the way brought to view of my sight where I had left behind, I beheld the bluish litter creeping down the declivities of the mountain close, and the Veiled Woman walking by its side. But soon the funereal procession was lost to my eyes, and the mountain-tops themselves sunken from the waves in man's brain are like those of the sea, rushing on, rushing over and over, and the vessels that rode on their surface to sink, after storm, in their deeps. One thought cast forth into the future now mastered all in the past. "War Lilian living still?" Absorbed in the gloom of that thought, harried on by the goad that my heart, in its tortured impatience, gave to my footstep, I outstripped the slow stride of the armed men, and, reaching the plain below, I had left and the horse which I sped to, came, in the place of my guards, with the bucked in which the bushmen had carried me up the mountains.

on the night that Lilian had watched for my coming. The earth on my feet was rife with creeping plants and many-colored flowers, the sky overhead was half hid by motionless pines. Suddenly, whether crawling out from the herbage or dropping down from the trees, by my side stood the white-robed and skeleton form—Ayesha's attendant, the Stranger.

I sprang from him in shuddering, then halted and faced him. The hideous creature crept toward me, cringing and fawning, making signs of humble good-will and servile obeisance. Again I shuddered—truthfully, for I could see that my face hoomered and fled on. I thought I had baffled his chase, when, just as I reached the thicket, he dropped from a bough in my path close behind me. Before I could turn, some dark mufflike substance fell between my sight and the sun, and I felt a fierce strain at my throat. Then the words of Ayesha's warning came on; with one rapid hand I seized the noose before it could tighten too closely, with the other I tore the bandage away from my eyes, and, wheeling round on the dastardly foe, struck him down with one sperm of my foot. His hand, as he fell, involved his hold on the noose; I freed my throat from the knot, and sprang from the cope into the broad sunlight. I was free to move of the armed men or the Stranger. Panting and breathless I paused at last before the fence, fragrant with blossoms, and divided my home from the solitude.

The windows of Lilian's room were darkened all within the house seemed still.

Darkened and silenced Home! with the light and sounds of the genial life all around it. Was there yet Hope in the Universe for me? All to which I had turned for Hope had shrunk down; the anchors I had forged for her hold in the beds of the ocean, her stay from the drifts of the storm. She had snapped like a reed the reliance she had taken on the bare of their points and candles in the starlight of my affection. No hope in the baffled resources of recognized knowledge! No hope in the daring adventures of Mind into regions unknown! Hope in the calm love of the practised physician and the magical arts of the Soul Enchantress! No hope from the commonplace teachings of Nature to explore in her Shadow-land marvels at variance with reason. Made Nature a deceiver? Nay, were I had opposed without quailing the stride of the Demon, and my hope, when fruition seemed wrested, had been realized into the very hoofs of the beast! And yet, all the while I had scorned, as a dream more wild than the word of a sorcerer, the hope that the soul man and child, the wise and the ignorant, took from their souls as inborn! Man and fiend had failed a Mind not ignoble, not skilless, not abjectly craven; alike failed a heart unselfish and selfish, not dead to the hero's devotion, willing to shed every drop of its blood for a something more dear than an animal's life for itself! What remained—what remained for man's hope? —man's mind and man's heart had been tried to their all within no other result but despair? What remained but the mystery of mysteries, so clear to the genius of childhood, so impenetrable, so only dimmed by the clouds which collect round the noon of our manhood? Where yet was Hope found? In the soul: in the soul which impels to supplicate comfort and light, from the lover of soul, wherever the heart is stricken the mind is obscured.

Then the words of Ayesha rushed over me: "What mourner can be consoled if the Dead die forever?" Through every pulse of my frame throbbed that dread question. My lips were around seemed to murmur it. And suddenly, as by a flash from Heaven, the ground truth in Faber's grand reasoning broke on me, and lighted up all within and without. Man alone, of all earthly creatures, asks: "Can the Dead die forever?" and the instinct that urges the question itself is God's answer to man! No instinct is given in vain.

And born with the instinct of soul is the instinct that leads the soul from earth to the unseen, from time to eternity, from the torrent that foams toward the Ocean of Death to the source of a stream, far fled from the Ocean of Life.

"Know thyself," said the Pythian of old, "That precept descended from Heaven." Know thyself! is that maxim wise? If so, know thy soul. But never yet did man come to the thorough conviction of self but he was impelled to feel the sovereign necessity of prayer. In my woe, in my rapture, all my thoughts seemed enlarged and illumined, and the whole mystery of my soul seemed one prayer. All my past, with its pride and presumption and self-will, was distinct as the form of a penitent kneeling for pardon before seeting forth on the pilgrimage vowed as a shrine. And never yet, in the deepest of soul first revealed to myself, that the Dead do not die forever, my prayer was uttered beyond its brief trial of terror and sorrow. During not to ask from Heaven's wisdom that Lilian, for my sake, might not yet pass away from the earth. I prayed that my soul might be fitted to bear with submission whatever my Maker might ordain. And, if surviving her, without whom no beam from you material sun could ever warm into joy my life's long, but my soul's short To-Morrow, to guide my steps that they might rejoin her at last, and, in rejoicing, regain forever!

As I raised my face from my clasped hands my eyes fell full upon a form standing in the open door-way. There, where on the night in which Lilian's long struggle for reason and life had begun, the Luminous Shadow had been beheld in the doubtful light of a dying moon and a hazy dawn—there, on the threshold, gathering round her bright locks the glories of the glorious sun, stood Ayesha, the blessed child! And as I gazed, drawing nearer and nearer with the silenced house, and that Image of Peace on its threshold, I felt that Hope met me at the door—Hope in the child's steadfast eyes—Hope in the child's welcoming smile!

"I was at watch for you," whispered Amy. "All is well!"

"She lives still—she lives! Thank God—thank God!"

"She lives—she will recover!" said another voice, as my head sunk on Faber's shoulder. "For some hours in the night her sleep was disturbed—convulsed. I then left the ward. Suddenly, just before the dawn, she called out aloud, still in sleep.

"I saw the dark shadow has passed away from me and from Allen—passed away from us both forever!"

"And from that moment the fever left her; the breathing became soft, the pulse steady, and the color stole gradually back to her cheek. The crisis is past. Nature's benign Dispeser has permitted Nature to work. Sleep, gentle partner, heart to heart, mind to mind—"

"And soul to soul!" I cried, in my solemn joy. "Above us below, and around us. There, at a sign from Faber, the Child took me by the hand and led me up the stairs into Lilian's room.

Again those dear arms closed round me in wife-like and holy love, and those true lips kissed away my tears—even as now, at the distance of years from that happy morn, while I write the last words of this Strange Story, the same faithful arms close around my, the same tender lips kiss away my tears.

TO THE NERVOUS AND DEBILITATED

LAURIE'S LIFE PILLS,
THE GREAT CHINESE REMEDY, DISCOVERED BY DR. ADAM LAURIE,
Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England; Licentiate of Apothecaries' Hall; and Graduate of the Ecole de Medicine, Paris, &c. For many years attached to the Imperial and British Embassies in Hong Kong.

This extraordinary remedy, which for a long time past has been successfully introduced in Europe, is now, for the first time, offered to the American public.

It was discovered by Dr. Laurie, during his residence in China, where it has been prescribed for many centuries, by celebrated physicians of that country, as an antidote to the irregularities of the various organs of life.

These pills are composed from the concentrated essence of the most valuable medicinal plant, indigenous to the growing districts of the Celestial empire. Their operation on the human system is wonderful, giving instant relief to dyspepsia, sickness, nervousness. They are a sovereign remedy, in both sexes, for Neuralgia, The Debourse, Sy. Vitus' Dance, Languor, Lassitude, Depression of Spirits, Headache, Irritability, Fear, Excitement, Disease and Indisposition for Business, Giddiness of the Head and Palpitations of the Heart, most of which diseases owe their origin to the irregularities of the nervous energy of the system.

They take no effect as a cathartic, but act superficially on the blood and nervous centres, and are guaranteed to be in perfectly harmless to the system, that the most delicate female may take them with perfect safety during any season of the year. They are particularly recommended to overcoming the impaired powers of life and giving renewed energy to the most shattered constitution. Their surprising efficacy has been manifested in thousands of sufferers, both male and female, who have fled gregariously been a benefit to themselves and their families.

If a single pill be accidentally taken after the principal meal of the day, there can be no danger of suffering from indigestion, and many of the would-be "gourmand," who has hitherto been only a sojourner at the dinner table, may now indulge his reasonable appetite with impunity.

For tourmenting he pull, as also for carrying in the pocket, they are done up in small boxes containing of each box shape, and sold at $1 per box; each box containing 50 pills. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of the money. Sent free, by mail, to any address, on receipt of a one or two dollar bill of any good bank, or can be obtained personally at the office of Messrs. Sawyer and Wiggins, 21 Street, New York, from GEO. DULEIN,
General Agent for the United States.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

We devote page 168 to illustration of MEMPHIS, Tennessee, from sketches taken before the war by our famous artist, Porte Crayon, of Virginia, now an officer in the army of the Union.

Memphis is now the only large city in Tennessee which is not in the hands of Union troops. It stands on an elevated bluff on the left bank of the Mississippi, at the head of ship navigation, 726 miles by the river from New Orleans, and 240 from Cairo. It is the termination of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, and is a place of considerable business activity, being the distributing point for the produce of West Tennessee. The population has probably ruined it. The following extract from a Cairo letter gives an idea of the state of affairs there at present:

The Memphis papers report the old catch-words about fighting till every man, woman, and child is killed, and the impossibility of subjugating the South; but abroad in the streets the people show their fellowship, and inquire to fly to some. They denounce with great bitterness this sense of Memphis, and refer to it as "cowardly Memphis," and at the same time paying a premium of 25 per cent. for "Lincoln Treasury notes," and one Treasury note = Wm. Wirt three men to make their peace with their Creator, for this city will never be stormed with bullets in it! Even a year of the reign of terror has not produced "assassinity" in Memphis.

☞ THE Publishers of Harper's Weekly congratulate their readers upon the appearance in the number of the first part of a new serial tale entitled "NO NAME," by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., author of "The Woman in White." In opening given promise of the same wonderful power and marvelous dramatic skill which illustrated the readers of "The Woman in White." It is seldom that a periodical is enabled to furnish its subscribers with such a series of attractive tales which appeared successfully for the past two years in Harper's Weekly, from the pens of DICKENS, READE, COLLINS, and Bulwer. The encouragement of this tale affords a good opportunity for publishing a new and attractive form cloths, and obtain Harper's Weekly at the reduced price of seven cents.

The crisis which the war has reached imports from interest to the WAR-QUESTION which are appearing in every number of Harper's Weekly. We keep our correspondents at the seat of war.

Mrs. A. B. WARD, with the army of the Potomac.

Mrs. ALEXANDER STEPHENS, with Gen. GRANT's army;

Mrs. HENRY MORFORD, with Gen. BANKS' army;

Mrs. THOS. B. DAVIS, with Gen. SHERMAN's army;

Mrs. ANDREW WARD, with Gen. BURNSIDE's army;

besides a large number of occasional and permanent correspondents in the Army and Navy at various points. These gentlemen will furnish us faithful sketches of every battle which takes place, and every other event of interest, which is to be reproduced in the most vivid and the best style. People who do not see Harper's Weekly will have but a limited comprehension of the enormous events which are occurring.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly being now over 120,000 copies each week, it is the best advertising medium in the country.

THE MISSISSIPPI.

THE evacuation of Columbus, and the rout of the force lately gathered in Tennessee, render it certain that before the month of March expires the flag of the Union will float triumphantly over the waters of the Mississippi from the Delta to Cairo.

There has been a great deal of blatant talk at the turbulent city of Memphis about burning down houses and "laying on great wires;" but when it comes to stern reality it turns out that each man wants to burn somebody else's house and to leave his own standing; and as the only parties who want to die, they are always the first to run away. There may be another fight at Memphis, and perhaps another skirmish in the river side; but the best and burden of the Mississippi campaign are over, and nothing can prevent our gun-boats descending the stream to the sea mouth whenever they are prepared for the voyage.

Government has already granted permits to trade along the Cumberland and the Tennessee. A similar relaxation of the rule of war will doubtless shortly be granted in reference to the banks of the Mississippi. A few cargoes of produce and goods will very quickly convince the rebels of the folly of further pernicious disloyalty.

THE BRITISH AND THEIR PRESS.

THE published correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and the speeches of the Prime Minister of England in Parliament, leave nothing to be desired by the people of this country. With the single exception of the precipitate recognition of the rebels as belligerents on the evening before Mr. Adams arrived in London, the British Government stands upon record nothing and to have said nothing to which loyal Britons can object or deem in this country. It would, perhaps, have been more consistent, as well as more politic, for the British to have pronounced at the outset of the contest against the recognition of a power based on the corner-stone of human slavery, and the essential principle of whose system was perpetual and indiscriminate disintegration. But we have no right to complain of this. We had no more right to expect England to denounce our rebels than she had to expect us to denounce the Irish insurgents of 1848. She has passed from the start a policy, which, however impolitic in our opinion, has been strictly fair toward the United States according to the law of nations.

How comes it, this being the case, that the tone of the British press has been so uniformly hostile toward this country, and so grossly unjust and malignant?

We must conclude, in the first place, that British journals are not as well informed as journals of this country usually suppose. It is evident that neither the Times, nor the Post, nor the Globe, nor the Herald have been in the secret of the party in power in Great Britain. They have falsified the purposes and intentions of their own Government as grossly as they have done ours. The most elaborate effort, the statement of a recent British writer, who says that, in England, newspapers are despised by the ruling class, and are only read by persons unqualified to gather the crumbs which fall from great men's tables, but are never permitted to take notice, or to have the slightest influence of their own.

How came it that, while the British Government was disposed to act fairly by us, and the interests and heart of the British people were obviously concerned on our side, the British press should have so unanimously taken the part of the rebels?

There are but two possible explanations of this phenomenon. One is, that British newspapers are managed upon the old Tory principles than leading journals here, and that the rebel envoys expended money freely in the purchase of British journalists. If there is any truth in possible to secure the favor of the leading journals by the use of money. It may be that the rebels in dividing the spoils of the Times, Post, Globe, Herald, Saturday Review, etc., etc., can all be retained by a judicious use of bank-notes.

The other explanation of the phenomenon is suggested by the normal misanthropy of the British. Englishmen, as a body in general, and almost always somebody in particular. Their favorite object of hatred and abuse for the past ten years has been the Emperor Napoleon the best friend England ever had: him they have vilified and misrepresented and traduced with a malignity and a malice scarcely credible. Since the rebellion broke out here, we have been suspended in Europe between the favor of the British, and it is possible that the English papers have abused us merely in order to render the national taste for vilifying something, and so maintaining the national habit.

Whatever be the secret of the wicked language used by the London journals in reference to this country for the past six or eight months, they have certainly achieved two results: first, they have utterly discredited themselves, and emancipated us from the prepossessions of the British opinion which was previously cherished here; and secondly, they have sown seeds of discord which will render it extremely difficult for the leading statesmen of this country to settle the next dispute with England without a war.

THE PORT ROYAL FACT.

On Monday last the steamer Atlantic sailed from New York for Port Royal with a cargo of clergymen, schoolmasters, and schoolmistresses, Bibles, school-books, agricultural tools, sewing machines, etc. The cargo was destined for the use of some 10,000 persons with black skins, male and female, who are now tenants of the inhabitants engaged in the United States on the coast of South Carolina and Georgia.

The use of it was chiefly borne by a charitable institution founded by citizens of Boston, with branches at New York, etc.; which, we believe, has ever yet been thousand persons with black skins, who are living under the protection of the United States flag, and whom we are trying to educate—the males to work and manage wood-island plantations of cotton on eccentric principles; the females to sew and comport themselves in a manner which, by rural, write, cipher, and attain moral and religious obligations. In a short time this colony of ten thousand persons with black skins will be twenty thousand, and by-and-by it will be two hundred thousand. Now it inhabits two or three extremely fertile and lovely islands; presently it will monopolize all the surrounding islands, and extensively encroach on the main land itself. For facts of this kind are of their nature progressive. Civilization and Christianity know no retrogression.

It strikes us that if some of our leading men would be so good as to forget for a while their own importance, and the necessity of keeping themselves constantly before the apple of the American eye, this Port Royal fact would, without their aid, achieve, quietly and noiselessly, without bloodshed, and without rapine or violence, some of the extremely desirable results for which they are so fatiguingly clamorous, and which it is the business of this great war to achieve. If we contribute a small share of our substance to impart to those unfortunate persons with black skins, who are thrown by the rebellion upon our tender mercy, some portion of the educational and moral advantages which our enlightened laws secure for the meanest of our own people, Providence will probably render them the instruments of effecting a revolution which will change the face of American destiny.

It has been proposed by some well-intentioned but weak-minded people to deport these persons with black skins to various islands or continents very far away indeed. And it has also been proposed by some evil-intentioned but strongminded people to deport—but the process was black skins, but other persons with white skins who are in arms against us, and have cost us already more than a thousand dear lives, to other continents or islands still further away. It is impossible to say to what straits this Government of ours may be hard put by-and-by. It may go into the transportation business for a living. When it does, these rival proposals will probably be fairly considered. Meanwhile, the GREAT FACT at Port Royal stares us in the face, and until some better thing can be suggested, we hope that every body who can spare a dollar will help to send Bibles, and spelling-books, and teachers, and sewing machines, and cotton gins, and other implements of civilization there, for the benefit of these poor persons with black skins whom this atrocious rebellion has thrown upon our hands.

THE LOUNGER.

CONDITIONAL LOYALTY.

We are sad of those enthusiasts who suppose that the rebellion will disappear in a night. Its roots are in all the strongest human passions—pride, ignorance, prejudice, and self-interest. The rebels are practically united; for there is doubtless much less Union feeling in the Cotton States than there was Tory opinion in the old colonies at the Revolution. There may not be much practical loyalty even in the rebel section, for there is no need of it. Indeed, the Union feeling of Tennessee and Kentucky is probably half conditional loyalty. In other words, it is not an unreserved acceptance of the Constitution, with the candid intention of abiding by it and of sustaining the Administration of abiding by it if it works agreeably to their wishes.

Now one thing is clearly essential to the final settlement of the war—that is, that the just principle of armed rebellion against the result of a state election must be most utterly annihilated. Any thing less than that is the absolute triumph of the revolution. If, while they are still in arms, the rebels should say that they will lay down their arms upon condition that they can have certain guarantees, and those guarantees are given—then, of course, they succeed, and the precedent will be established that a defeated party has only to appear in arms to secure what they want. Any offer or terms to rebellion than those offered by General Foster at Roanoke and General Grant at Fort Donelson—"unconditional and unlimited surrender"—are a betrayal of the Government and the end of civil liberty.

If when that surrender is made, and the leaders of the bloody and causeless revolt have been dealt with as the law directs, and the people have had an ordinary, peaceful operations of life are resumed, a convention should be constitutionally called, and changes in the fundamental law should be constitutionally made, there might be regret, but there could be no complaint. But if the changes should be made, and the convention dissolving, the people should acquiesce in the result, it would be clear that peace had been actually secured.

To say to the rebels that if they will lay down their arms there will be a convention, and to add that at that convention certain results shall be achieved, is to show to all mankind that our Government is not the people, and our organic law of country a lie. Such an act would be national suicide. The Government of a country, if he understands himself, is the worst of traitors; if he does not understand himself, he is a zany.

Conditional loyalty is a "pretty good" egg.

A REPRESENTATIVE MAN.

THE fact that the Secretary of War was reported by telegraph to have said something which he did not say, and which was evidently reported, and therefore misunderstood, to serve a purpose, naturally excited public concern. The same telegraph presently sent the name of Mr. S. L. M. Barlow, of New York, as the author of the report. Mr. Barlow denied it impudicitiy; and being accused by the friends of secret treasonable sympathies, he published a card in vindication of his loyalty. In that card he quotes from his correspondence with some of the rebel leaders and their advisers, during the winter of 1860-'61, and in that correspondence there is one most remarkable passage.

Mr. Barlow is known in the city as an active politician of the Douglas and Southern sympathy. He is known beyond the city as one of the few gentlemen who, at the time of the John Brown excitement, hastened to the more party and think knowledge, to implicate the great body of their political opponents in the direct responsibility for John Brown's enterprise. They sought especially to implicate Mr. Gerrit Smith in the matter, but upon his prompt summons to them to establish their charge in court they made an ample apology.

Mr. Barlow is further known as one of the gentlemen who, before the last Presidential election, and when the men who are now the rebel leaders openly and habitually warned the country that they would try to destroy the Government if they did not succeed at the polls, still supported those leaders in every way, and endeavored to carry the election without a threat of secession.

Mr. Barlow is also known as one of the gentlemen who entertained Mr. W. H. Russell, LL.D., upon his arrival in this country last winter, and who supplied him with that view of the public sentiment which he digested in his first letters to the London Times.

Upon the other hand, when it became clear to Mr. Barlow that his political friends at the South were about to do what they had frankly declared they meant to do—that what they had constantly never have attempted but for the position of open sympathy and support in their threats which Mr. Barlow and his friends recognized, and to express by the extracts of his correspondence now published, his timidity seems to have been his shame. He wrote to the South that armed resistance to the Government would result in a united North. The South would not be satisfied by that.

But the remarkable passage in this correspondence which has been suggested these remarks is as follows: In a letter of the 27th of November, 1860—three weeks after the election—Mr. Barlow wrote to a prominent Senator in the Senate, begging to be believed, great weight with the Southern leaders: "What will be agreed to in my judgment is this: a Convention to alter the Constitution, so that the just rights of the South shall be maintained by the Constitution itself, and forever removed from the arena of politics in Congress."

In other words, as the rebel leaders said, they desire the Government because they could not constitutionally get what they wanted, therefore the Constitution should be changed to give it to them. Peace was to be secured by the surrender of the Government to a threat of revolution.

Mr. Barlow now professes regret for his citizen then, and when opportunity offers he and they will again, of course, be found forever ready to make promise. The next question therefore is, whether the change of the Constitution, for the absolute immunity of slavery, which they were willing to yield to a threat of revolution, would be conceded for a year, and shown to be futile and hopeless by its very cry for compromise; or whether, in common with the great body of citizens, they believe that the Government shall be unconditionally maintained, and that the method of appealing from the ballot to the rifle shall be hopelessly and finally defeated?

GLOOM.

THE weakness, and sadness, and dispirited quarrelsomeness of Seward's congenial cronies will have struck every reader. By the side of the calm impudence and cool falsehood of Mr. Speaker Bocock the language of Mr. Seward is weak. It was not necessary to hear that the day was rainy and that there were no cheers, for the speech is all gloom, and has no sort of cheerful ring. "Cheerful man spoke more truly than he thought—" The day, the memory, and the purpose were fully overclouded." The day was dark; the memory was of perjury; the purpose was injustice.

The bold sayers will have already followed his poor equivocations, his spiritless misrepresentations, with scorching and scorching laughter. But there is one point at which every man will smile. It is he remark, that "This rule of voluntary association will not fail to be observed universally, by securing just and impartial government and by affording a faithful and the security of the obligations by which the Confederate States will be bound to foreign nations. In proof of this, it is to be remembered that at the first moment of asserting their right of secession, these States proposed a settlement on the basis of a common liability for the obligations of the General Government."

But if every State secedes from the confederacy, who pays the debts of the confederacy? And if being purely voluntary, you can not coerce a State to fulfill its joint obligations, what security has the creditor?

This ghastly delusion of secession at last stands in its naked deformity. It is simply a leap of assertion the right of every man to do as he chooses. There is no reason why the people of Berkshire County, beyond the Connecticut and among the hills, should not secede from Eastern Massachusetts because of high taxes, or for any other reason they choose to allege; and no reason why every town should not secede from every other, as fast as the humor takes it. Anarchy could be seriously entertained. It is the end of civil society, and the lapse into barbarism.

Let us not suppose ourselves to be less a dangerous disease than scarlet fever in the human system. Like that, it will linger and linger, but the patient will be slowly eradicated, and the patient will perish long and sadly. Because our arms are at length beginning to win the victory of which we have always been sure—because the anaconda begins now to contract its folds—we are not to suppose that all is over, and that peace will return with summer. When the sea has been heaved by a storm so fierce as this, the waters will long roar and roar. We have shown and are showing our patriotism by our valor; we have to show it also by our patience. To trust the enemy of our national peace finally and thoroughly, the nation has yet to wait longer than the army on the Potomac has waited.

HOPELESSNESS.

In his inaugural address, the saddest speech of the times, Jefferson Davis, with more circumlocution than Stephens, declares that the rebellion was undertaken to save slavery. Stephens says frankly its object is a system of government and society of which slavery shall be the corner-stone. Davis, more mealy-mouthed, says

"The people of the States now confederated * * * believed that to remain longer in the Union would subject them to the continuance of a disparaging discrimination, submission to which would inconsistent with their welfare and intolerable to a proud people."

And again:

"To save ourselves from a revolution which, in its silent but rapid progress was about to place us under the despotism of numbers, and to preserve in spirit, as well as in form, a system of government we believed to be peculiarly fitted to our condition, and full of promise for mankind, we determined to make a new association, composed of States homogeneous in interest, in policy, and in feeling."

Now what tyro in knowledge of human nature and of history does not see that, as a mere matter of self-defense, such an "association" could never be allowed by a neighboring nation separated by no natural boundaries? If the old Monroe doctrine is true, that the peace and security of this nation were threatened by the presence of any European power upon our borders, what is to be said of a huge slave-breeding and slave-working empire divided from us by invisible lines? The constant tendency of that empire would be to a gradual occupation by the servile race, and consequent barbarism.

Common sense and the instinct of self-preservation settle the question of "a new association of States" for the increase of the slave population.

"GENTLE WOMEN."

It is a curious inquiry whether Mrs. Greenhow, and the other utterly treacherous women who have done all they can to bring blood and ruin upon their countrymen—who have been the most faithful and zealous spies, working to betray the lives of loyal citizens and the liberties of all of us to the bald and remorseless tyranny of the rebellion—are "the gentle women incarcerated for opinion's sake," of which Davis speaks in his melancholy inaugural.

WHO IS WHO?

In reading the dreary debates of the spectral Congress at Richmond the eye occasionally falls upon a familiar name, which suggests instructive reflections.

During the Presidential campaign there was a gentleman from Tennessee who, not to speak it irreverently, was "hawked" about the Northern States as an orator, upon no other ground than that he was grandson, or grand-nephew, to the great Virginia orator of the revolution—or that at any rate his name was Henry. This gentleman was taken to public meetings to tell the people of the Northern States two things: one was, that his great ancestor talked nonsense when he spoke against the patriarchial system of living by the labor of other people whom you did not pay; and second, that we must all cling to the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws.

Now, as our minds were and had been for some years quite made up on the business of making people work without wages, and selling their children to pay our debts, it seemed unnecessary to enlarge upon that point. But he had his say, and departed when he was ready by rail indeed, but not exactly in the way that Northern orators, had they made corresponding speeches in his part of the country, would have left by rail. Then, in the second place, as no serious talk was heard and no threat uttered against the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws above the line of Mason and Dixon, it was impossible not to feel that the gentleman had brought his coals to Newcastle.

Of course the orator is now a secessionist, as John Bell is; and in the proceedings of the Richmond Congress you shall read the name of Mr. Henry, of Tennessee, as a Senator—the same gentleman, as we are informed, who came to harangue us upon our duty to the Union and the enforcement of the laws.

The moral is plain. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord! Lord!" It is not enough to cry aloud your own virtue. It is not enough to use the words that express devotion. There is many a man now who bawls, suspiciously loud, "Union, Union, and the enforcement of the laws!" Study him attentively when you hear him. You see what Henry meant. Wait and see what he means.

AN ENGLISH CRITIC.

The paper in Fraser upon the American question, by John Stuart Mill, is one of the ablest statements which our troubles have occasioned. Mr. Mill is well known to every scholar and reading man as one of the chief English thinkers of the time; and his clear perception of the causes and consequences of the struggle, with his curiously-accurate appreciation of all the delicate distinctions of our system, and the essential differences of our parties, show his peculiar fitness as a teacher of the English nation at this moment.

A cardinal value of his paper is the clearness with which he shows that the existence of this Government is the security of all the reforms for which patient and humane men wait. He says that while it is not a war for emancipation, its end is, inevitably, the end of slavery. But whether that end will be suddenly effected by the military hand, or left to the development of peaceful debate, he thinks, and thinks justly, is a question to be determined by the rapidity with which our arms advance. Should the war last a year longer, he says that in the sheerest self-defense the nation will strike frankly at its cause. But so long as the army is constantly successful, public opinion will not justify the "extreme measure."

The wisdom of the paper is the more remarkable from its exact agreement with the views of the wisest men among ourselves. That a fatal blow at the root of the rebellion is the true method of peace—that the right way is the best and the shortest way, no man who is free from party rancor doubts for a moment. But such men are few; and such men are also wise enough to see that great measures in this country must be the result of popular conviction. To be permanent and peaceful, all great changes must be justified by public sentiment. The ferocious party-spirit that seven years ago repealed the Missouri Compromise was too blind to see this. That was a trick sprung upon the nation, and the unanimous vote of the Free States for Mr. Lincoln was the logical and inevitable consequence.

Party leaders in this country are not despots. They lead only so long as they understand the general tendency of the party to which they belong. The force of drill and organization will of course carry any party beyond its convictions. But the change will have already commenced. Thus the old Democratic Party was really smitten with death in 1848; but it wore the semblance of a crown for twelve years afterward. And all the young men in the country who, led by the desire of political success rather than by true patriotism, have within that period allied themselves to that party, can now see plainly enough that it was not the vigor of life but the spasm of death that gave it an air of energy.

For if the democratic principle be indeed trustworthy, the constant tendency of an educated people like ours must be toward greater Justice and surer Liberty, and not toward Despotism and Slavery. Consequently, if democracy were true, the Democratic Party was doomed. Every faithful follower of the party cry must have constantly and wonderingly asked himself, "How is it that I am a Democrat, or friend of human rights, and yet am constantly and by party command voting for and with men who openly scorn those rights?" Such a man would very soon ask himself whether vinegar is sweet because it happens to be labeled molasses.

The lessons of many years and of human nature will not be lost upon us at a time when we are at once peculiarly honest and sagacious. Mr. Mill sees it clearly. All loyal Americans feel it. The statesman is the man who sees in what way, and how far, that which is desirable may be made practicable. The article will appear in Harper's Magazine for April.

"NO NAME."

The new novel of Wilkie Collins begins in this day's paper, illustrated by John M'Lenan, whose characteristic and admirable illustrations of "The Woman in White," especially that of Count Fosco, were themselves creations. Mr. M'Lenan has a peculiar appreciation of the genius of Mr. Collins, who has taken his place among the most popular and powerful of living English novelists. None of them has written a tale of more singular, absorbing, and powerful interest than his "Woman in White," and the opening of the present story has the same clear, calm, startling detail of narration. It has a Tenier's fidelity and healthy color. The picture of the country home and the quiet family circle is curiously distinct. Nor does the opening number end without plunging the reader full into the necessary mystery. Thus the beginning is like the commencement of a trial, in which we know that the developments will be both strange and fascinating. The power of the author has been proved by "The Woman in White," and all the readers of that story will want no exhortation to begin with the beginning of "No Name."

It is one of the remarkable illustrations of the opportunity of influence offered to a popular author at this day that if we allow seven readers to each copy of the issue of the present number of the Weekly, the opening chapters of Mr. Collins's story will be read by more than nine hundred thousand readers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, February 25, in the Senate, the bill providing for the occupation and cultivation of cotton lands in possession of the United States was reported back by the Committee on Territories, and an amendment limiting the appropriation to twenty thousand dollars adopted. The bill providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels was then taken up, discussed, and finally postponed. The bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of acknowledgment of debt to public creditors was passed.——In the House, the Senate bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness to public creditors was passed. A bill amendatory of the Articles of War, so as to provide that all officers in the military service are prohibited from employing any of the forces under their respective commands for the purpose of restoring fugitives from service or labor, escaping from those who claim such service or labor to be due to them; and any officer found guilty, by court-martial, of violating this article shall be dismissed from service, was reported from the Military Committee, and passed by a vote of 83 to 42. The Senate bill reorganizing the cavalry service was amended by reducing the number of regiments to fifty instead of forty, as provided by the Senate, and then passed. The bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to establish a postal money order system was also passed, and likewise a bill designed to allow the transportation of light articles through the mails, for the accommodation of soldiers, at the rates of book postage—one cent per ounce. A bill to tax the salaries of public officers was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. A resolution was adopted instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of levying a tax of three per cent. per pound on cotton, and making such a lien thereon; persons and corporations to be prohibited from carrying or transporting the same until the tax is paid.

On Wednesday, February 26, in the Senate, petitions in favor of a general bankrupt law, and for the emancipation of slaves, were presented and referred. A bill establishing a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean was reported from the Special Committee on that subject. The bill providing for the occupation and cultivation of certain cotton lands in the possession of the United States was taken up and discussed. The consideration of the question of admitting the new Senator from Oregon, Mr. Starke, whose loyalty is questioned, to a seat in the Senate, was then resumed, and Senators Sumner, Cowan, Davis, Wilmot, Carlile, and Sherman participated in the debate, but no definite action was taken on the subject. The bill fixing the number of members of the House of Representatives under the new apportionment was amended so as to make the number 249, and then passed.——In the House, Mr. Voorhies, of Indiana, asked leave to offer a resolution commending the sentiments and policy of General Halleck, as announced in his General Order of the 23d instant, already published, as eminently wise and patriotic, and in strict conformity with the Constitution, and that the war should be conducted in accordance with the same, and that the thanks of Congress are tendered to General Halleck for said order, and for his military achievement as commander of the Department of Missouri. Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, objected, and the resolution was consequently ruled out. Mr. Van Wyck announced his retirement from the chairmanship of the Government Contract and Revolutionary Pension Committees. The case of Mr. Upton, who claims a seat as representative from the Fairfax district of Virginia, was taken up, and discussed till the adjournment. The House concurred in the Senate bill fixing the number of Representatives, under the new apportionment, at 249.

On Thursday, February 27, in the Senate, Senator Davis introduced a substitute for the Confiscation bill, which was ordered to be printed. The bill to increase the efficiency of the medical department of the army was taken up and passed with amendments. The case of Senator Starke was resumed, and the resolution of the committee on the subject, declaring Senator Starke entitled to a seat, was adopted by a vote of 26 to 19. He thereupon was qualified and took his seat. The Confiscation bill was taken up, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the case of Mr. Upton, who claims to represent the Fairfax district of Virginia, was again discussed, and the claimant declared not entitled to a seat by a vote of seventy-three to fifty.

On Friday, February 28, in the Senate, a bill was reported to carry into effect the treaty with Hanover for the abolition of the Stadt dues. Senator Starke, the new member from Oregon, offered a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to investigate the charges of disloyalty that have been alleged against him. A debate ensued, which was continued till the expiration of the morning hour. The Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation bill was taken up, and passed with amendments. A bill to encourage enlistments in the regular army was introduced.——In the House, the special committee on the establishment of a national armory reported a resolution, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, providing for the appointment of a commission by the President to locate a national foundry east of the Alleghanies, and a foundry, armory, and manufacturing arsenal west of the Alleghanies, said commission to report within sixty days from their appointment to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary to report to Congress, with the necessary estimates of expense. The bill granting homesteads to actual settlers, and providing bounty for soldiers in lieu of lands, was amended so as to take effect on the 1st of January, 1863, and then passed—105 against 16. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, March 3, in the Senate, Senator Wright, the successor of Mr. Bright, of Indiana, was sworn, and entered upon his duties. The House bill requiring shipmasters trading to foreign ports to take an oath of allegiance was passed. A joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint as many staff officers as the service requires was adopted. The Confiscation bill was taken up, and Senator M'Dougall, of California, spoke in opposition to it. Before he had concluded the Senate went into executive session.——In the House the tax bill was ordered to be printed, and made the special order for the 11th instant. The Senate joint resolution, declaratory of the intention of the act of July, indemnifying the loyal States for expenses incurred in raising troops, so as not only to apply to debts contracted before, but since the passage of the act, was adopted; also the Senate joint resolution providing for the payment of the awards of the commission for claims growing out of military movements in the Department of the West. Mr. Holman offered a resolution declaring that the war should not be prosecuted for any other purpose than the restoration of the authority of the Constitution and the welfare of the whole people of the United States, who are permanently involved in the preservation of our present form of government, without modification or change. Mr. Lovejoy moved to lay it on the table, and the motion was adopted—60 to 58. A resolution, calling on the President for information relative to the present condition of Mexico, and the design of the European Powers to establish a monarchy there, was adopted. The Committee on Foreign Affairs presented an important joint resolution on the subject of maritime rights, thanking the Emperor of the French for his kindly offices touching the Trent affair, and declaring the present a favorable time for adjusting the question of maritime rights on the basis proposed by Mr. Marcy in 1856. The resolutions were recommitted and ordered to be printed. A resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the House the amount of the subscriptions to the National Loan, authorized by the act of the 17th of July, 1861, the amounts of money paid on such subscriptions, and the purposes to which they have been appropriated.

THE "NASHVILLE" AT HOME AGAIN.

The rebel steamer Nashville, which has been lying up so long in English ports, and was so keenly watched by the United States steamer Tuscarora, has succeeded in getting safe across the Atlantic, and, as we learn from Norfolk, arrived at Wilmington, North Carolina, on Saturday, having run the blockade at that place.

EVACUATION OF COLUMBUS.

Columbus is evacuated. An official dispatch from Commodore Foote, dated Cairo, March 1, leaves no doubt that the rebels are flying from their Western Sebastopol. Lieutenant-Commanding Phelps, who was sent on Saturday with a flag of truce to Columbus, returned reporting that he saw the rebels burning their winter-quarters, and removing their heavy guns on the bluffs. But the guns in the water batteries remained intact. He also saw a large force of cavalry drawn up ostentatiously on the bluffs, but no infantry was to be seen, as heretofore. The encampment seen in the armed reconnoissance a few days since had been removed. Large fires were visible in the town of Columbus and upon the river banks below, indicating the destruction of the town, military stores, and equipments.

GENERAL BANKS ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

The right wing of the grand army, in General Banks's division, on the Upper Potomac, has made an advance. Crossing the river from Sandy Hook on Monday night to Harper's Ferry, the advance-guard, consisting of the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania regiment, took possession of the town. Strong reinforcements went over on Tuesday and occupied the towns of Bolivar and Charlestown, and a considerable portion of the country on both banks of the Shenandoah. The rebels, with the exception of a few who were captured, retired on the approach of our army. The sentiment among the people is strongly in favor of the Union. General Banks has established his head-quarters on the road from Harper's Ferry to Bolivar. The rebels shelled the trains near Berlin, on their way to Baltimore, but the firing was so bad that they did no damage.

GENERAL CURTIS IN ARKANSAS.

General Halleck telegraphs to Washington that General Curtis has taken Fayetteville, Arkansas, with numerous prisoners and great quantities of stores, ammunition, baggage, and the like. The enemy retreated in disorderly haste over the Boston Mountains. The Union troops in that section are perfectly enraged at a dastardly, savage trick of the rebels: forty-two officers and men of the 5th Missouri Regiment were poisoned at Mudtown by eating of provisions left behind by the enemy, who had prepared the food for the purpose of causing a general murder.

TENNESSEE RETURNING TO THE UNION.

The War Department has received such encouraging intelligence of the restoration of Tennessee to the Union that it is contemplated to appoint Senator Andrew Johnson Military Governor of the State until the civil government can be reorganized. With this view the President has nominated him as Brigadier-General, and placed in his hands the pleasant duty of restoring his old State to its original position.

The rebels have retreated from Murfreesboro, and are falling back on the Tennessee River and Chattanooga.

TROOPS TO BE RAISED FOR THE UNION IN TENNESSEE.

The War Department has authorized the raising of volunteer troops in Tennessee, and it is decided to put the loyal citizens of the Southwest generally in a position to resist the rebels whenever any attempt is made to coerce the Union people back again into the thralls of rebellion.

ANOTHER VOYAGE UP THE TENNESSEE.

Official dispatches from Commodore Foote, relative to affairs on the Tennessee River, which were received at the Navy Department on 1st, give most satisfactory accounts of the Union feeling in Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, in which latter State Lieutenant Gwin had penetrated in the gun-boat Taylor as far as Eastport. The victories at Forts Henry and Donelson have impressed the Unionists with great faith in our army, and have given them courage to avow their sentiments more freely. Lieutenant Gwin says that upon learning that a large quantity of wheat and flour, intended for shipment to the South, was stored at Clifton, Tennessee, he landed there and took on board about one thousand sacks and one hundred barrels of flour, and some six thousand bushels of wheat, to prevent its being seized by the rebels or disposed of in the rebel country.

ANOTHER MESSAGE FROM JEFF DAVIS.

The Message of Jeff Davis to the new rebel Congress, like his recent inaugural, betrays great distress of mind as to the future fortunes of the Confederacy, and displays, at the same time, no little deviation from the strict line of truth in reference to the resources of the South and the conduct of our Government and our army. He admits that events have proved that the rebel Government attempted more than it could achieve; that the Southern people had no idea of the continuance of the war beyond a brief period, nor of the overwhelming force which has been brought against them. To this fact he attributes the unwillingness of the people to enlist for a long term; but he hopes that this "fruitful cause of disaster," short enlistments, will not again occur. In referring to the defeats at Roanoke Island and Fort Donelson, he speaks of the former as humiliating; and of the fall of Donelson he says that, in the absence of official information, he can form no judgment, but can not believe that an army of "our people" could have surrendered without an effort to cut their way through the enemy. The strength of the rebel army he puts down, somewhat indefinitely, at four hundred regiments of infantry, with proportionate cavalry and artillery. He relies greatly upon the new enlistments to make up the force of the army, and expresses a confident opinion that the war is going to last for several years to come.

DESPAIR OF THE REBELS.

A meeting of cotton and tobacco planters was held on Wednesday evening, at the City Hall, Richmond, to discuss the question of destroying the cotton and tobacco crops in the State; but the discussion, after a variety of speeches were delivered pro and con, resulted in transferring the matter to a committee for report at an adjourned meeting the next night, the business of which has not yet reached us. A resolution was offered in the rebel Congress on the same day providing for compensation by the government for all tobacco and cotton so burned to avoid its falling into the hands of the United States Government. The tone of the Southern press continues to be most doleful and despairing.

THEY ARE AT LOGGERHEADS.

The discussions in the rebel Congress at Richmond show a growing discontent with the Cabinet of Mr. Davis. Upon the proposal to admit the members of the Cabinet to defend their course on the floor of the House, Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, said that if the Cabinet, after a fair discussion upon a vital question, should be voted down, they should resign, after the manner of the British Ministry, and give place to others. A refusal so to do, he declared, would justify a civil revolution—a rebellion within a rebellion—and if Mr. Davis persisted in retaining the Cabinet after such an expression of popular sentiment, he would deserve to be brought to impeachment, and, if needs be, "to the block."

PERSONAL.

The rebel General Simon Bolivar Buckner, captured at Fort Donelson, is now on his way to Fort Warren, or is probably by this time safely ensconced within its walls.

The Indépendance Belge asserts positively that the Archduke Maximilian of Austria has accepted a throne in the distracted republic.

By an order from the War Department, we learn that Major-General Dix and the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, have been appointed Commissioners to examine the cases of the men still remaining in confinement in the custody of the United States, and to decide whether they should be released, retained, or turned over to the civil authority.

FOREIGN NEWS.

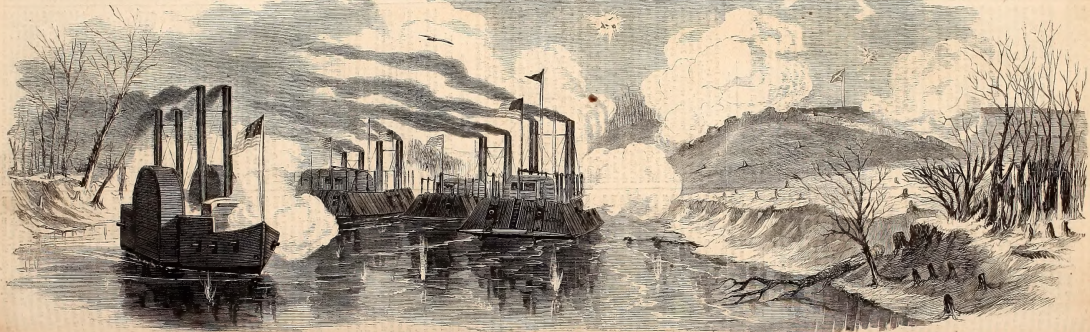
AMERICAN AFFAIRS IN PARLIAMENT.

The American question is being debated in the English Parliament. Earl Russell made an important declaration in the House of Lords, on the 10th instant, when he admitted that the peculiar circumstances of the United States justified "urgent measures"—such as arbitrary arrests—by the Government, and that even British subjects may be seized by order of the President, if "he believed that the parties were engaged in treasonable conspiracies." Parliament had given the same power to the British executive in times of difficulty, and it had been frequently exercised without the persons being brought to trial. The cases of the English subjects lately arrested in the United States would, however, be "earnestly watched" by the Cabinet.

On a subsequent day, Earl Russell, in reply to Lord Stanhope, stated that Government had protested against the permanent destruction of any harbors by the stone blockade, and the American Government had denied any such intention.

THE VALUE OF THE ELEPHANT.



The expense to England of the Mason and Slidell affair is understood to be £364,000 ($1,820,000).

The United States gun-boat Tuscarora is reported to be at Gibraltar watching the privateer Sumter, which still remains there without coal.

THE LATE GENERAL F. W. LANDER.—(PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.)

THE LATE GENERAL LANDER.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN has issued the following Order:

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, WASHINGTON, February 3, 1862.

"The Major-General Commanding, with deep regret, announces to the Army of the Potomac the loss of Brigadier-General Frederick W. Lander, the commander of one of its divisions, who died at Camp Chase, on the Upper Potomac, on the afternoon of the 1st instant, from the effects of a wound received in the affair with the rebels at Edwards' Ferry, on the 22d of October, 1861. The public services of the deceased, then known as Colonel Lander, in connection with the overland route to the Pacific, had made his name familiar to the American people.

At the commencement of that unhappy rebellion he was among the first who volunteered to support with his life the Constitution and laws of his country. From the beginning of military operations which have restored Western Virginia to the Union, he was actively employed upon Philippi, where his qualities as a leader of troops were strikingly displayed to the complete expulsion of the rebels from his department, in which he exhausted his fading energies; his conduct has elicited the admiration of his countrymen. His invaluable services at Bath Mountain were recognized by the Government in his appointment as a Brigadier-General, and his last efforts were rewarded by the official approval and thanks of the President.

Tall of stature, and of great strength and activity, with a countenance expressive of intelligence, courage, and sensibility, General Lander's presence was commanding and attractive. As a military leader, he combined a spirit of the most daring enterprise with clearness of judgment in the adaptation of means to results. As a man, his devotion to his country, his loyalty to affection and friendship, his sympathy with suffering, and his indignation at cruelty and wrong, constituted him a representative of true chivalry. He has died in the flower of his manly years, and in the full bloom of his heroic virtues; but he leaves a personal as well as record of his life and character, and of his death, which will be a source of pride, to his country, a nature to noble, and a career so gallant. While paying this public tribute of respect, the General Commanding feels most deeply that, in the death of this brave and distinguished soldier, he has personally lost one of the truest and ardent of friends.

The late BRIGADIER-GENERAL FREDERICK W. LANDER, above referred to, served, in 1859, as Mr. Potter's second in the duel with Pryor; and when the latter refused to fight with bowie-knives he took up the quarrel for his principal, and offered to fight Pryor with any weapon he chose. The chivalrous Virginian declined the invitation.

In March, 1860, he had an affray with one Maguire, who drew a revolver on him in the streets of Washington, and called on him to draw his weapon. Lander replied that he had too much respect for the laws of his State—Massachusetts—to carry concealed weapons, but he would fight Magraw without them. He denounced him as a liar and coward, and kicked him, revolver and all, down the street.

On the outbreak of the rebellion Lander was appointed Brigadier-General, and served under M'Clellan in Western Virginia. At the celebrated battle of Rich Mountain he distinguished himself by the most daring achievements and the most imperturbable coolness. One of the officers engaged on that day stated in his report that Lander was to be seen on horseback gallantly plunging up the side of a hill, and "leading the leaders." He is also reported to have ridden fifteen feet ahead of our forces, and, notwithstanding that a shower of bullets greeted his presence as soon as discovered by the enemy, he did not seem to be in the least alarmed, but stubbornly defied the dangers that surrounded him, while he cheered on his comrades to victory. It is unnecessary to say that he was idolized by the soldiers.

The deceased was also in the unfortunate engagement of Edward's Ferry or Ball's Bluff, where the gallant Baker met a soldier's death at the head of his column. In that disastrous affair Lander behaved with characteristic coolness and valor, receiving a wound in the calf of one of his legs, which at the time was not considered of a dangerous character.

But the most important feat performed by General Lander was his late opening of the railroad and telegraph to Hancock, Virginia, which he accomplished with two thousand men in two columns, marching thirty-two miles in a space of time never, perhaps, exceeded.

The services of the deceased, on this occasion, were so highly prized by the Government as to elicit the following exceedingly flattering and honorable letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR BULLETIN—THANKS TO GENERAL LANDER.

War Department, Washington, Feb. 17, 1862.

To Brigadier-General F. W. Lander:

The President directs me to say that he has observed with pleasure the activity and enterprise manifested by yourself and the officers and soldiers of your command. You have shown how much may be done, in the worst weather and worst roads, by a spirited officer at the head of a small force of brave men, unwilling to waste life in camp when the enemies of their country are within reach. Your brilliant success is a happy presage of what may be expected when the Army of the Potomac shall be led to the field by their gallant general.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

CAPTAIN MENDILL.

Captain Noah E. Mendill, Company I, Seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers, whose portrait will be found on page 165, was the first man of note, and one among the best men, who fell on the bloody field of Donelson.

A day or two before the attack on Fort Donelson, while encamped near Fort Henry, our young hero was severely hurt by a tree falling in the night on his tent. It struck him across the loins, injuring his kidneys to such an extent that he was unable to walk. He was carried to the hospital, where he was still confined when the order was given, "Forward to Fort Donelson!" He expressed a desire to go, but the surgeon forbade, alleging—as was the case—that he was unfit for service. Not to be balked by any thing, however, he evaded the notice of the surgeon, and by the aid of a crutch marched at the head of his company to the field of action. On the night preceding the battle, while encamped within a few miles of the enemy's lines, he requested his sergeant to awaken him several times during the night, that he might bathe and rub his back, so that he would be able to go into action the next morning unencumbered with a crutch. Morning came, and the troops were all early in motion—young Mendill at the head of his company, cheering his men by word and by action, until, by the time they had reached the field, he had become warmed up and excited so that he felt his inability no longer; and at the order to storm a position of the enemy's lines he led his company off at a "double-quick," declaring that he felt like going at that pace all day. They soon came to a sort of ravine, where they would be exposed to the fire of the enemy. Here was a slight hesitation on the part of the men (it being their first experience in facing bullets); but the gallant Captain led bravely and fearlessly through, gaining an eminence on the point of a hill beyond the ravine, and some fifteen or twenty paces in advance of his column, when he drew his sword (which, from his hurt in the loins, he had swung about his neck), and, with a smile of triumph on his countenance, called out, "Come on, my boys! we'll—" and with the sentence unfinished on his lips, a grape-shot from a masked battery only some seventy-five yards in advance of him, that till then was unknown of, entered his head, just beneath the right ear, coming out immediately through the centre of his left. His death was instantaneous, falling with his sword still elevated above his head, with his face still lighted up with the smile of triumph—a glorious death! and the death that all brave and patriotic spirits like his would wish to die—face to face with the enemies of his country!

Captain Mendill was born in Blairsville, Pennsylvania, November 9, 1837; killed at Fort Donelson, Tennessee, February 13, 1862, and was consequently in his twenty-fifth year. He was an unmarried man. Removed with his father, in the year 1858, to Springfield, Illinois, which has since been his home. He was the youngest and only living brother of Captain G. H. Mendill, of the United States Topographical Engineers, Professor at West Point. When the call was made for three months' volunteers, he was among the first to offer his services, together with a majority of Captain John Cook's (State Militia) Company of Springfield Zouave Grays, of which he was long a respected member (and which is now Company I, Seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers). Upon Captain Cook's promotion to Colonel, Mendill rose to Second Lieutenant, in which capacity he faithfully served during the campaign, at the close of which he was unanimously chosen Captain for the three years' service. His remains were brought home and interred, with military honors, at Oak Ridge Cemetery, Springfield, Illinois, on February 21, 1862. He leaves a loving father, brother, and sister, as well as an extended circle of admiring friends, to mourn his early death. Peace be to the ashes of the brave!

BOWLING GREEN, KENTUCKY.

On page 165 we illustrate Bowling Green, the evacuated stronghold of the rebels in Southern Kentucky, from a sketch by our correspondent, Mr. Henry Mosler. The following graphic account of the occupation of the place by General Mitchell, and its present appearance, is from the correspondence of the Herald:

On the evening of the 12th General Mitchell learned that the rebels were preparing to evacuate Bowling Green, and had already shipped their artillery to Nashville. He immediately determined to march upon them, and at an early hour on the morning of Friday, the 14th, he started—his men in fine spirits, and eager to avail themselves of the opportunity for which they had so long waited to show their mettle. The distance to be marched was twenty-nine miles, six of which were over such a road as only Kentucky can boast. But the march was easily made in nine hours, and at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of Friday General Mitchell appeared before the city, and met the flag of truce which the rebels had the impertinence to send him, requesting six hours in which to evacuate the place. General Mitchell replied that he would not give them six minutes; and, planting a rifled piece on the slope of Baker Hill, he threw a shell or two among the thousand rebels about embarking on the cars for Nashville. They hastily scrambled aboard the train, which was as hastily put in motion, and disappeared, Hardee and Hindman being left behind, and afterward escaping on horseback. Persons here assert that these generals were afraid to join their men aboard the cars, they having loudly declared their intention to have their revenge upon them for their harsh treatment. Many of Hindman's men have often before been heard to declare their intention to kill him at the first opportunity.

At the time of the shelling of the few troops remaining at the dépôt in Bowling Green the buildings of the railroad company were fired, and are now a mass of ruins. The dépôt and round house or machine-shop at this place were extensive and splendid buildings. The intention was doubtless to destroy the whole town; but the appearance of General Mitchell prevented this. The bridges across Barren River had been destroyed the day previous to the appearance of General Mitchell. He was compelled to wait until the day following, when he crossed and took possession of the city. The flag was raised over the Court-house of a deserted city. I use the term in its literal sense. The rebels had for months been the only inhabitants. Many still find a home within the city limits. The pits where they lie are seen on every hill-side. It is estimated by the inhabitants here that not less than five thousand rebel soldiers have died of disease during the six months of occupation.

Bowling Green is described by the gazetteers as a pleasant and beautiful city, lying in the valley of numerous hills which rise above its loftiest buildings. But the gazetteers are not of late dates. Let those of the future write it down as one whose beauty has departed. The houses look dingy and dirty, and the streets like those of a country village during the muddy season. It looks as if the shadow had settled upon it, never to be removed. From the hills around it in every direction the fortifications are frowning, and, as it were, withering with a frown. Once splendid residences graced Mount Airy and Underwood's Hill, a vineyard lay on the side of Baker's Hill, and the green wheat and yellow corn were once seen in the valley at the foot of Price's and Webb's. But Mount Airy has been despoiled of the handsome building that graced its brow, and in its place a lunette fort frowns upon the river that glides silently by. The vineyard has been trampled under foot, and the yellow corn has been gathered, and the wheat dares not spring up. It seems as if the rebel presence had blighted the country and the city. Inhabitants have fled and left their dwellings to be transformed into hospitals or stables. Ruin and devastation have had their full sway.

THE FIGHT AT FORT DONELSON.

We devote pages 161 and 164 to illustrations of the memorable Fight at Fort Donelson, the bloodiest and probably the most decisive battle ever fought on this continent.

On page 161 we reproduce a sketch of Fort Donelson, kindly sent us by Mr. A. L. Rawson, of Chicago; and on the same page a sketch, by our artist, Mr. Alexander Simplot, representing the Advance of the Second Iowa Regiment on the Enemy's Breast-works. The Second Iowa left St. Louis under a sort of cloud, in consequence of some theft having been committed at a building in that city while under their charge. They have since nobly redeemed their escutcheon. The following, from the St. Louis Democrat, will explain our picture:

THE SECOND IOWA.

By this time it was noon. General Grant had just returned from the landing, where he had a conference with Commodore Foote. That officer had informed the General that it was impossible for him to put his gun-boats in a condition to make another attack for several days at least. Notwithstanding this, upon being informed of the severe repulse our troops had met with in the morning, he saw that some immediate action on our part was necessary to retrieve the day.

He immediately gave order to his Generals of divisions to prepare for an immediate and general attack along the entire lines. The regiments which had suffered most severely in the morning were withdrawn. General Lew. Wallace was given a division composed of two regiments of his own brigade (the Eighth Missouri and Eleventh Indiana), and several other regiments whose loss in the action of the morning had been but slight, and was given the job of clearing the ground we had lost in the morning, while General Smith, commanding the left, received orders to storm the works under which his division was lying.

General Smith is, emphatically, a fighting man, and, as may be imagined, the events of the morning had tended to decrease in no measure his pugnacity. When he received his long-desired orders for an assault of the enemy's works, his eyes glistened with a fire which, could it have been seen by his maligners, would have left them in no doubt as to his private feelings in regard to the present contest. All the arrangements were complete by three o'clock, and his column was put in motion soon after. The force under his command was as follows:

Colonel Cook's Brigade—Seventh Illinois, Fifteenth Illinois, Twelfth Iowa, Thirteenth Missouri, Fifty-second Indiana.

Colonel Lauman's Brigade—Second Iowa, Seventh Iowa, Fourteenth Iowa, Twenty-fifth Indiana, Fifty-sixth Indiana.

Under cover of Captain Stone's Missouri battery this force began the assault. It was a formidable undertaking, which, under a less brave and skillful commander than General Smith, might have proved a disastrous failure.

The hills at this point are among the most precipitous of those upon which the enemy were posted. Selecting the Second and Seventh Iowa, and the Fifty-second Indiana for the storming party, General Smith deflected the main portion of his division to the right, and having succeeded in engaging the attention of the enemy at this point, himself headed the storming party, and advanced upon the works from his extreme left. It was a most magnificent sight. Unappalled by the perfect storm of bullets which rained about him, the General on horseback, and with his hat on the point of his sword, preceded his troops, and inspired them with a furore there was no withstanding.

Steadily, with unbroken line, the gallant Hawkeyes and Indianians advanced. The enemy's grape and canister came plowing through their ranks, but not a shot was fired in return. Closing up the ranks as one after another of the brave fellows dropped to the earth, and animated by the fearless example of their undaunted leader, they pressed steadily on. The works gained, one tremendous volley was poured into the astonished enemy, and, with fixed bayonets, a charge was made into their ranks which there was no withstanding. They fled in confusion over the hills, and at last we had penetrated the rebel Sebastopol, and the misfortunes of the morning were retrieved. Captain Stone's battery, which in the mean time had been doing tremendous execution in the rebel ranks, was promptly advanced to the position gained, and instantly, supported by the remainder of his division, the point was secured against any force the enemy could bring to bear against it.

THE GUN-BOAT ATTACK.

On page 164 we give a picture, from a sketch by Mr. Alexander Simplot, of the Gun-boat Attack on Fort Donelson. This was described as follows in the correspondence of a Cincinnati paper:

At two P.M. precisely the signal was given from the flag-ship to get under way, and in a few moments we were slowly steaming up the river. We had proceeded perhaps the fourth of a mile when a single report, emanating from the upper battery of the fort, greeted us, and notified us that the rebels were awaiting us in savage expectation. On we went, however, not a sound escaping from our crafts, except the slow puffing of the escape pipes and the cheery plashing of the paddle-wheels, while the enemy were busy awaking the dormant echoes with their cannonading, and agitating the swollen waters with their shot and shell, scattered in promiscuous profusion all around us. When we had sailed up to within a mile of the fort, the Flag-Officer let go his starboard bow rifle, and we followed him with ours, then the Pittsburg and Carondelet followed suit, and the ball was really opened in earnest. Our first shots fell short; but a little more elevation of the guns remedied the failing, and the next rounds saw our balls and shells dropped into uncomfortably close proximity to their batteries. From this time to the end of the action there was not a lull in the steady and constant firing from our boats, nor was there a moment when the whole of the enemy's front was not a steady stream of fire. In order to get the best view of the action, I stationed myself upon the upper deck, and just as near in the wake of the pilot-house as possible, taking my chances at getting a sight of what was going on in front by abbreviated peeps and squints around the corners, and hurried stares through the look-out holes which the considerate carpenter had left for the optical accommodation of the pilots. The flag-ship St. Louis took the advance, and was hugging the western shore; then came our own (the Louisville), then the Pittsburg and Carondelet, in order, as near side by side as was possible in a river scarcely wide enough for two boats to pass each other. In this order we formed a straight battery of twelve guns in front, while the two gun-boats, Conestoga and Lexington, followed in our wake, pouring in their quota of missiles from their bow Columbiads at a safe distance. We could see nearly every one of our shots take effect within or near the rebel batteries, the more deadly and certain as we slowly steamed up toward them.

Thus we proceeded side by side, our fire never slackening or our determination faltering until we arrived within three hundred yards of the lower battery. At this time the firing on both sides was truly terrific. The enemy's shot and shells were screaming through the air or ravaging our sides and decks without cessation, while ours were divesting them of their more exposed batteries, plowing up their hill-sides and decimating their camps in terrible haste. I saw one large shell from the Louisville fall and explode directly under one of their guns, sending a score of rebel soldiers to their long homes, demolishing the battery and scattering those not killed or wounded in indecent haste to the nearest covers. When we had attained the last-named position, viz., within three hundred yards of their works, we stopped our headway, and when the boats were motionless we poured in our last and most destructive fire. It really seemed at this time that the quintessence of destruction was contained in those twelve great iron thunderers. With each discharge a rebel gun was silenced, at each broadside a host of frightened rebels would scud up the hill to a place of safety behind the upper earth-works, and all but two of the lower guns had ceased to deal us their destruction. Now a new battery of 120-pound guns opened upon us from the left and rear of the first works. We were within point-blank range, and the destruction to our fleet was really terrible. One huge solid shot struck our boat just at the angle of the upper deck and pilot-house, perforated the iron plating, passed through the heavy timbers and buried itself in a pile of hammocks just in front and in a direct line with the boilers. Another, a shell, raked us from bow to stern, passed through the wheel-house, emerged, dropped and exploded in the river just at our stern. Then a 10-inch solid shot entered our starboard bow port, demolished a gun carriage, killed three men and wounded four others, traversed the entire length of the boat, and sunk into the river in our wake. Then a shell came shrieking through the air, striking fair into our forward starboard port, killing another man and wounding two more, passed aft, sundering our rudder chains, and rendering the boat unmanageable. Now we were compelled to drop astern, and leave the scene of action; but our gunners sent their respects to the rebels as long as their fire could be the least effective; and, so far as we were concerned, the battle was over.

This last battery was the one that put the finishing stroke to the fleet. One of the enemy's shells entered and exploded directly in the pilot-house of the St. Louis, killing the pilot and wounding Flag-Officer Foote severely in the leg. Two of the shots entered the Pittsburg below the guards, causing her to leak badly, and it is probable that she will sink before morning. Another entered the Carondelet, killing four men and injuring eight others. By this time three of the boats were disabled, and then the signal was given to back out and return to our anchorage. The enemy's lower battery was silenced, however, and only the two 120-pounders on the hill were playing upon us, and it is universally conceded that if we had had ten minutes' more time Fort Donelson would have fared the fate of Fort Henry, and the Cumberland River been opened and divested of its rebel embargo.

TAYLOR'S AND M'ALLISTER'S BATTERIES.

On the same page we reproduce another sketch by Mr. Simplot, which shows the position of Taylor's and M'Allister's Batteries during the fight. The correspondent of the New York Times thus described their performance:

Early on the morning of Friday—almost before it was fairly light—the enemy poured forth in a mass of not less than 3000 men, and hurled themselves with tremendous force against the Forty-fifth and Twelfth Illinois regiments, that were nearly on the extreme right. Accompanying them were twelve batteries of artillery. The Forty-fifth and Twelfth sustained the shock manfully for a short time, and then withdrew. The Eighteenth and Ninth Illinois soon after came to their support, and for a short time held the enemy in check. Soon after the Thirtieth, Thirty-first, and Eleventh Illinois regiments; the Eighth Missouri, Fifty-eighth Ohio, and Twenty-fifth Kentucky, and Willard's Battery were added to the National forces, and the fight became of terrific proportions. M'Allister's battery took position on an eminence, and for four hours their heavy 24-pounders were not silent for a single instant. During all this time they were exposed to a heavy fire from the rebels, who had erected batteries so as to command M'Allister's position from three points—two directly in front, and one on his right. Taylor's Battery stood a little to the rear of the other, and somewhat to the left; the other National batteries were distributed at various points along the line, as the nature of the ground would permit. All kept the air incessantly filled with their music, and with showers of grape and shell.

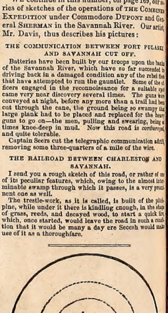
This is but an outline of the position of the National forces, for there can be strictly no correct sketch given, as at no time during the fight were the regiments stationary. Now they pushed forward, again fell back, withdrew, and were replaced by others. The fight itself was prolonged and desperate. Now it rolled over a hill, anon poured along a ravine, always in the woods, and always marking its track in characters of blood. The conflict was not conducted according to any particular military plan—men stationed themselves behind trees, logs, rocks, any thing that would afford shelter, and blazed away whenever a hostile head appeared.

The Twenty-fifth Kentucky Regiment was on the extreme right, and was attacked by a swarm of the enemy with such vigor that they broke and fled in disorder. At another part of the National line the attack was conducted by such overwhelming numbers that the line was broken through, and the battle seemed well-nigh likely to become a total rout on the part of the National forces. It was at this last gap broken through the National line that M'Allister's Battery was stationed, and where for a time it fell into the hands of the rebels. The battery had only 150 rounds of ammunition, and at about 10 o'clock these were all fired away—not a single shot was left. Captain M'Allister in vain endeavored to obtain a supply from the rear; a shot from the enemy passed through three of his horses, another tore off the trail from one of the guns, a third smashed the wheel of a second gun. Just at this time a heavy force of the enemy obtained a cover near him, and opened fire at about two hundred yards with musketry. Hitching six horses to the only undamaged gun, he endeavored to haul it off, but the weight was so great, and the road in such a muddy condition, that it was found impossible to get along with it, and after dragging it a half mile it became mired, and he was reluctantly obliged to leave it. The horses were driven off, dragging the limbers and empty caissons, and the guns were left to their fate. In the course of the day a tremendous charge on the part of our troops reoccupied the lost ground, closed up the gap, and recovered the pieces. They were found where they were left, their great weight—being 24-pound siege guns—probably preventing the enemy from taking them away.

IN THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

We continue in this number, on page 169, our series of sketches of the operations of the Combined Expedition under Commodore Dupont and General Sherman in the Savannah River. Our artist, Mr. Davis, thus describes his pictures:

THE COMMUNICATION BETWEEN FORT PULASKI AND SAVANNAH CUT OFF.



Batteries have been built by our troops upon the banks of the Savannah River, which have so far succeeded in driving back in a damaged condition any of the rebel fleet that have attempted to run the gauntlet. Some of the officers engaged in the reconnoissance for a suitable spot came very near discovery several times. The guns were conveyed at night, before any more than a trail had been cut through the cane, the ground being so swampy that a large plank had to be placed and replaced for the heavy guns to go on—the men, pulling and swearing, being at times knee-deep in mud. Now this road is corduroyed, and quite tolerable.

Captain Seers cut the telegraphic communication adrift, removing some three-quarters of a mile of the wire.

THE RAILROAD BETWEEN CHARLESTON AND SAVANNAH.

I send you a rough sketch of this road, or rather of one of its peculiar features, which, owing to the almost interminable swamp through which it passes, is a very prominent one as well.

The trestle-work, as it is called, is built of the pitch-pine, while under it there is kindling enough, in the shape of grass, reeds, and decayed wood, to start a quick fire, which, once started, would leave the road in such a condition that it would be many a day ere Secesh would make use of it as a thoroughfare.

A SUBMARINE TORPEDO.

The following correspondence will explain the above drawing:

U. S. Gun-boat, Wright River, Thursday Eve., Feb. 13, 1862.

Yesterday our boats were surveying the mouth of Wright River for a channel into the Savannah River, when they discovered something they supposed to be some infernal machine. Not being able to examine it fully yesterday, they to-day went down and discovered five of them, and succeeded in getting one, a diagram of which I inclose. They brought it on board of this vessel, and it is providential that it did not explode on board, as they handled it very carelessly; but finally, by the precaution of our Captain, it was sent ashore, when we fired into it with a rifle, when it immediately exploded; and a fearful explosion it was, enough to blow a ship out of the water. I suppose these are what they meant when they said we would meet with a warm reception in coming to Savannah. I have no doubt they have plenty more laid for us; but now, that we have discovered the plot, we shall be on the qui vive for them. Our boats are out again to-night after the other four.

THE MAJOR'S MITTENS.

The little ivory hook flew round and round on its narrow circuit, guided by Hope Bayne's slender fingers.

All the rest of the girls were busy with their four long shining needles, in the old orthodox employment of knitting, and the old orthodox "mixed" yarn streamed from the needles; and they laughed at and quizzed Hope Bayne for her daintier work—a mitten of brown zephyr wool, gauntleted with "Magenta." But Hope Bayne, through all this laughing and quizzing, kept on with her crocheting, plying deftly the ivory hook until the last mitten was nearly finished.

While she works at this, the party increases by ones, and twos, and threes—young officers camping out just beyond the city awaiting orders.

Ones and twos and threes.

Hope Bayne glances up as they enter, dropping a nod here and there, and sometimes a smile with it.

At last she drops a stitch with one of her nods, and somebody, stepping on the slender thread of zephyr, it snaps in twain and out ravels two or three more stitches.

"Goodness!" cries Kitty Mills, whom nothing escapes, "that's four times your worsted has broken, Hope. Three times a quarrel, and the fourth a death, do you remember?"

Miss Bayne's lip curved disdainfully, which, Kitty Mills perceiving, she went on in a break-neck style, quite in her way when provoked. "It's sure, Hope—never knew it fail. You spilled the salt at dinner too—I saw you. A dog howled under your window all last night besides; and this morning Margaret broke your hand-mirror in dusting, and flung the pieces into the street. I caught her at it."

Almost every body has a pet superstition. This of the breaking of mirrors happened to be Hope Bayne's. That tantalizing midge of a cousin, Kitty Mills, knew it; so in consequence she knew where to send her shaft.

If it did her any good she had her revenge; for on Hope Bayne's face, usually so masked with reticence, a look of uneasiness sat.

This only stimulated curiosity. Kitty Mills argued to herself thus:

"If Hope cares for this, it's on account of those mittens. That's the connection. I'll hold fast to that string."

Which she accordingly did, giving it little experimental pulls now and then. This by-the-way.

"And it all runs on that thread of wool, Hope; all the train of omens. Be careful where you bestow those mittens. He'll be sure to be killed whoever wears them."

The breaker of the thread stood, throughout this talk, quite silent and looking down into Miss Bayne's face. For him she dropped the nod, the smile, and the stitch with it, which has raveled on to such an extent.

Hope Bayne, lifting her eyes, catches the look, and then he says, rather low of tone,

"Do not mind the omen, Miss Hope; the wearer will not, I assure you."

Kitty Mills had discovered what she had been longing to discover. There happening a lull in the hum of voices just then, all the other girls, who had been quizzing Hope Bayne for the past two days on this very subject, discovered what Kitty had discovered.

A smile went round the group. So the mittens of brown zephyr, with Magenta gauntlets, were for Major Thornly. The nut was cracked for them.

Hope Bayne sat there, cold as a statue outwardly, but with a fire raging inwardly. Proud and reserved in all her actions, she had no power to "turn off" things of this nature. She felt her delicacy invaded, and hated, for that time, the invaders. Always on guard with the world, she could not comprehend the unguarded speech of Major Thornly; so for that time, too, she hated him.

But no sign of this betrayed itself on the cool, calm face at which Major Thornly looked, quite unconscious as he gazed that he was observed.

While he gazed the others gazed too, now and then, and wondered what she would say. She disappointed them by saying nothing, but went on with her crocheting, which was at its last stitches.

Presently the little ivory hook pulled through the final thread. Her work was done.

She put them together carelessly, then turning, handed them to Major Thornly, saying clearly, with no trace of embarrassment,

"I hope they may do you much service, Major Thornly. Colonel Grey writes that he finds the worsted ones like these much warmer than those of knit yarn."

Frank Thornly could not have told what had hurt him; but a vague sense of pain and loss stole over him. A moment ago the world was so bright and pleasant, now it was so dead and cold. A moment ago he had forgotten the room had any occupants but Hope Bayne and himself; now half a dozen people stood between them, though she sat before him.

But Hope Bayne had succeeded in her object. She had checkmated the invaders of her castle of pride; so what matter if a knight was overthrown?

Kitty Mills stood listening by, with her head on one side, plotting mischief.

Kitty Mills had such an innocent way nobody believed her malicious, yet her innocent way dealt sharp wounds sometimes.

"Oh, but Kitty don't mean any thing—Kitty is blunt, has no tact, you know, but good-hearted." That was the cry. So Kitty went on dealing her blows right and left, and they were most of them left-handed blows.

This once she overshot the mark.

"Four times the thread has broken. I wouldn't take 'em, Major Thornly. They'll bring bane to the wearer;" and she glanced up into his face with her childish expression of serious superstition.

"I'd wear them though they brought my death warrant, so that they brought one bane to the wearer," he returned, catching at her unmeant pun with a manner half earnest, half playful. A faint color dyed the cool cheek of the fair "Bayne" herself; and Charley Hayes and the rest of the boys clapped their hands, and "bravo" at the gallant Major's adroitness.

So the Major got his mittens. "I hope they may be of service to you," she had said to him. The words were kind, but the manner froze. A week ago she had promised them to him with a smile, and, he had thought, a little blush. How delightful it had all been, and now the pleasure was gone! What was the matter?

He would know before they separated that night; and with this determination he turned away from Kitty Mills, who had been chattering unheard for the last five minutes to him, and looked for the object of his thoughts.

He frowned as he looked. Hayes and the two lieutenants surrounded her chair completely. He was not going to play a fourth there; so he went back to little Kitty Mills, whose pretty wicked eyes sparkled brightly at this result. But leaning over her chair, and looking down upon such a pretty fairy even as she was, both eyes and thoughts kept wandering to the other side of the room, where Hope Bayne's silvery treble rang out brilliantly in repartee and jest.

It was easier for Hope Bayne to evince levity than deep emotion. Thus she often belied herself, and got the reputation of a woman whose nature was transparently fine, but colder than the Arctic seas.

Little Kitty now—nestling there amidst the cushions and prattling away to the gentleman overlooking her; in her queer, childish manner saying such free things so naturally that they sound prettier than any thing else—she has the reputation of a good heart: "quite a tender little thing, indeed," some people would tell you, "and tyrannized over completely by that haughty cousin, Miss Bayne." So while this "tender little thing" prattles on two hearts ache in a dumb passion which hers can never understand.

It was a bright, clear night, and the little knitting party had decided that walking home would be much pleasanter than riding; so Frank Thornly consoled himself with the determination to accompany Miss Bayne on this walk, and find out what the matter was.

But when a girl made of "spirit, fire, and dew," like Hope Bayne, decides a thing for herself, even the determination of so brave a fellow as Major Thornly is quite impotent against it. He found it so.

But what possessed the girl? What madness came over her in that hour?

As they emerged from the ante-room, cloaked and hooded, she approached him holding out her hand, saying in pleasant tones, but oh! so carelessly indifferent:

"I will bid you good-by, Major Thornly; I am going out of town to-morrow morning, and your regiment may leave before I return."

This was a precious bit of acting! She had no more idea of staying twenty-four hours out of town than she had of making a journey to the moon. But under all that cool exterior a fiery vein of thought was running. "He thinks I like him, and he proclaims it to the public. Let the public see how cool I am!"

So in this madness they parted—she sending forth her brilliancy in a strain of restless excitement which quite overcame Lieutenant Wilmer; he stunned and silent, and too careless of the world to heed its observation.

So they parted—she thought to meet again within the week. That night when he arrived at his hotel there was a dispatch awaiting him, ordering him to move forward without delay. Eagerly he prepared to obey it. Only last week what tender regrets would have saddened this news! Now it was all that was left him. "Glory should be his mistress in future! Women were false and fickle!" Thus reasoning, he marched on at the head of his troops in the early dawn of that morning.

In restless, broken slumber, Hope Bayne hears the winding bugle sound, and, half adream, marvels what it means. And while she dreams they march on and away, to "battle and sudden death."

It was late when she came down that morning. "Too late to drive to Maywood and back; we will put it off until to-morrow, Kitty!" Kitty had been up betimes, and read the newspaper; so she handed the sheet to her cousin with her cup of coffee.

There it was, in large type, the whole startling information of the late dispatch, and the hurried departure at dawn.

No exclamation escaped the reader's lips. The pure, pale coloring of her face might have whitened, but it was scarcely perceptible. Not a tremor of the mouth, not a flutter of the eyelids; yet she felt herself turning stone cold in that moment.

If Kitty Mills, sitting there opposite her, thought to discover the state of her feeling she was doomed to disappointment. Too deep for tears, or sighs, or lamentations; too deep for conscious coloring or fluttering pulses was the regret, the remorse that instantly awoke to life. When beyond recall she realized what she had lost, and how. She saw with a shiver her mad and selfish folly, her insane pride. A thousand acts of tenderness and manliness returned upon her to prove how he had forgotten the world for love of her, while she had made it her tyrant. In this retrospect her soul came down from its haughty citadel and sat in sackcloth and ashes.

All this while she mechanically drank her coffee and went through the form of a breakfast. All this while Kitty Mills sat opposite, watching her curiously. Kitty Mills could little understand that, in the solemn vigil of this stricken soul, she was utterly forgotten; and when her cousin's calm face turned away, she said to herself, "Ice is not colder and harder than Hope Bayne's heart!"

Major Thornly sat writing in his tent until a late hour the night before the reconnoissance at Leesburg. He who was usually cheerful, almost gay, under the most depressing or the most hazardous of undertakings, felt strangely oppressed on this night. Memory after memory crowded upon him, and life seemed to wear new glories in the shadow of death which haunted him. He thought of Ellsworth—his clear presentiment—the fall which followed it. And though he smiled at his thought and its suggestions, and strove to attribute it to the hour and his imagination, yet he found it impossible to shake off the solemn forebodings that filled his soul.

At length he yielded to the mood sufficiently to indite several letters, to be delivered in case he should never return from the field of the morrow. Tender letters of farewell, brave and simple and manly like the writer.

In the midst of this occupation he opens a box for a needed envelope: beneath the package lies the parting gift of Hope Bayne—the brown mittens, with their bright "Magenta" gauntlets, untouched by soil or use. Back it all comes—the dreary evening—her cold words and colder manner, and the careless parting speech. Back it all comes, but with it comes a clearer sense, perhaps, of her proud, inscrutable heart. Time and absence have softened the rough edge of these memories, and he remembers hours when she was gentle and sympathetic—when she gave him many a hope, by blush, and smile, and action. "It must have been my fault," he thinks to himself; "I was a blundering fellow always, and she was kind before. But I love you, Hope—I love you!" and on the bright Magenta colors a tear dropped suddenly from eyes as brave as ever wept.

Hesitating a moment he obeyed the impulse which quickly came, and in a few earnest sentences wrote to her of his love and faith, touching lightly upon their last meeting; but in that brief mention divesting her of the shadow of unkindness by an almost playful acknowledgment of his own failings and demerits. This done, he turned to seek the repose he needed for the coming day. As he did so his eye again fell upon her gift. He took them up hastily, and thrust them into his bosom, saying aloud, "They shall go with me as a talisman."

What was it? The sound of his own voice, or the unburdening of his heart, that suddenly broke the spell? for at the action and the words a feeling of instant relief came over him. It was as if the smoke of battle had uplifted, and showed him a sure vision of safety and success. He passed his hand over his brow, as if to clear his brain, or assure himself that he was awake. "I am the sport of idle fancy," he murmured; "not ten minutes since I felt almost as if the messenger of death had claimed me, and here I am in another moment breathing free, as if just released from some near danger; and all at the touch of a pair of mittens—Hope's mittens," he utters softly. "Perhaps, perhaps they are to be a talisman, as I said;" and with a half smile at his "idle fancies" he flings himself down to rest and sleep.

"Stormed at with shot and shell,
Boldly they rode, and well;
Into the jaws of death,
Into the mouth of hell," rode on those brave leaders with their brave troops that day. Every one knows the fearful tragedy that followed—the repulse, the flight, the loss. Every one knows, too, of the heroisms that made it not all a defeat.

In the hottest of the fight Major Thornly was urging on his men—cool, collected, and cheerful under the most disastrous circumstances. Shot and shell hurtled past him, but still he rode unharmed. He seemed to bear a charmed life in the midst of the dead and dying.

A column just beyond loses its leader; confusion and dismay run along the line. The next moment the panic would have spread, when Major Thornly dashed on to the rescue. The sight of his inspiring face as he assumed command, his dauntless air as he marshaled them together, gave them both ardor and confidence; and again they press forward through

"—— flame and smoke,
And shout and groan and sabre stroke."

Again they press forward; but the gallant leader, where is he? In a charge from the enemy that swept down many a brave fellow he had fallen. Was his presentiment of death realized? Had the messenger claimed him in that hour?

Kitty Mills at the window, making a pretty show of her blue-yarn knitting in her white glancing hands, nods and smiles to passing acquaintances. Hope Bayne, at the piano, plays melancholy nocturns with a tense passion of meaning which Kitty Mills never understands. The October sun shines in at the window, a cheery little wood-fire crackles on the hearth, the great gray cat purs contentedly in its rays, and every thing presents a smiling scene of peace, which only the passionate player there, with her drooping head, contradicts. A look at her woeful face, and the image of peace melts away into dreams of desolation as mournful as the dreary nocturn.

The door opens. Kitty glances up with a disappointed face. "Oh, it's only you, Will!"

The lad perks his saucy lips into mockery. "Yes, only 'you, Will,'" he returns. He knows Miss Kitty Mills's peculiarities.

Then his face changes, and he goes on:

"More news—all the details of the engagement," drawing the paper from his pocket. The player turns from the piano at this. Over the paper her eager eyes wander rapidly. Then, with a sigh of relief, she passes it on to her cousin. He is not mentioned. She may yet have hope. Kitty, giving the columns a hasty survey, yawns, drops her knitting, thinks the city "dreadfully stupid since the camp broke up," and then goes sauntering out of the room, tossing her blue-yarn ball to the cat upon the hearth.

This proceeding seems to give Master William undisguised satisfaction; for as the door closes the saucy lips curl with an unmistakable air of boyish triumph, and he approaches his sister with a letter.

"I waited till Kitty went; she's so curious," the lad volunteered.

Why do her cheeks pale and flush? why do her hands tremble at the seal of this letter? Ask him, who,

"At midnight, in his guarded tent," wrote those tender sentences of farewell. Ask him—ay, ask him!

But the flushing of the cheeks, the trembling of the hands, had something of expectant joy in their signs. She only thought he had written to her! But when? She knew when a moment after; and Willie, standing there, even with his untaught boy's heart, knew what that voiceless calm meant far better than Kitty Mills would have known. And as the woeful eyes uplift he realizes something more of life's stern passion than his fifteen years had ever comprehended before.

He understands so delicately and wisely, that, as Kitty enters an opposite door, he sends her away to the cupola by some hint of tents newly pitched, and rumors of a newly forming camp. And while Miss Kitty forgets her indolence in the charming prospect of a fresh court of suitors, and flies off to greet the welcome sight of their floating flags, her cousin, Hope, escapes to her room with a burden of death upon her soul. All night with this heavy burden she keeps a tearless watch. All night she goes over that bitter, bitter parting, when her cruel words belied her heart. And all night she is haunted by the "Never, never, whispered by the phantom years."

When Will came down to breakfast the next morning his sister was not there, and Kitty poured his coffee for him in her default; for Hope had been both mother and sister to Will five years that very month. Though her absence was by no means so unusual, Will was uneasy on this morning. He hadn't forgotten the odd effect of that letter; so he evinced his uneasiness by kicking the table-legs and quarreling with Kitty—two accomplishments in which he excelled.

At dinner the same cause of uneasiness existed, and the same consequence ensued; he kicked the table-legs and quarreled with Kitty. (Query: do all boys have a natural propensity to kick table-legs?—the narrator never saw one that didn't.) At tea, again he missed the familiar face; and this time forgot to quarrel with his cousin, even if he unconsciously performed the other accomplishment.

To his inquiries Kitty answered carelessly, "Hope had a headache."

Going up to bed he loitered by her door—not a sound. Then he ventured to call softly, "Hope!" No answer. Then he opened the door and entered.

Hope was lying where she had flung herself the night before, and dressed as he had seen her when she read her letter. But the white face of woeful passion was greatly changed. Fever burned upon the cheeks and parched the lips, and in the fitful slumber into which she had fallen she moaned restlessly. Unused to such signs of illness, yet the boy was well aware it was no light matter.

He turned to call for Kitty; then back he went, with a grim look of determination on his face, and deliberately turned the key upon his sister's writing-desk and transferred it to his pocket, muttering at the time,

"You don't get into that, Miss Kitty, while I'm round!"

When Kitty came she was shocked and sorry enough. "She did not know, she was sure, it was any thing serious, for Hope often had headaches."

Will growled at her, and jumped down three steps at a time as he ran for the doctor. For ten days Hope Bayne hovered between life and death; on the twelfth she awoke to sensibility and suffering. By her bedside she found watching a fresh young face, whom she had often, kindly enough, but selfishly, overlooked and half-forgotten in the past. She found it had been her most faithful watcher these ten days. It looked anxious and worn now, and her heart smote her as she realized what a fount of love she had neglected. Here was something to live for, after all; and the pang of her awakened memory softened. "Dear Will!" And the face she turned to his had resumed its calm, but the old expression of proud and lonely bitterness had departed.

A fortnight after they were en route for Washington to join her father, resident for the winter there, in his attendance upon several law cases.

Hope, still pale and thin from her recent illness, had ample excuse in remaining at home, while Kitty participated in the gayeties of the season.

Left thus alone with Will one evening—he was almost her constant companion now—she asks him the question which has possessed her mind for weeks:

"Will, you were with me much during those delirious days—did I mention any names?"

The lad looked away from her as he replied, "Once, Hope."

"Was Kitty present?"

"Not she!" and he shook his head in triumph.

"What did I say, Will?"

"You just called Frank, that was all."

At this point Miss Kitty's laughing tones are heard, and that young lady enters full of elation and success.

"Such a splendid time—so many strangers! That young Frenchman, D'Effenuil, and a Hungarian Count! And oh, Hope, an old flame of yours! He looks dreadfully thin and pale—wounded, you know, at Leesburg—hasn't been out but a little while." Hope was listening to her indifferently, until she said, "He seems as épris of you as ever; and I did think you liked him, Hope, until that night. It's my opinion, ma belle cousine, that you will never be in love with any body."

That night! what night? She turned to Kitty, asking, quite shortly,

"Who are you talking about, Kitty?"

"Well, you needn't be so snappish, Hope! I was talking of your preux chevalier, Major Thornly."

Hope Bayne had never fainted in her life; but she came so near it now that Kitty Mills was frightened. When she recovered herself somewhat, Kitty began her talk.

' What was the matter, Hope? Was the room too warm?" Slowly Hope met her eyes, and bravely answered,

"I thought he was dead, Kitty. That was why your sudden information overcame me." Kitty Mills was more amazed than she cared to own. She could understand evasion, bnt this simple courage of acknowledgment was quite beyond her.

But Hope loses all thought but one. He is living: he loves her: the long agony is forgotten.

Early the next morning, at a very unfashionable hour, Major Thornly, in obedience to the brief summons he has received, enters Miss Bayne's presence.

As he bends over her hand, reverent yet ardent, warm lips brush his cheek. It is a welcome he had not dared to dream of. He turns her face to his.

"Hope, is it so—do you love me?"

She tells him all the sad, sad story; never sparing herself from first to last. In it the wealth of her heart is clearly apparent. He no longer questions her love. His generous soul only regretted her suffering.

"I was afraid you had received that letter," he said; "but I was not sure, for Lieutenant Hayes, who had charge of my papers, immediately left for the North, and I have never seen him since the engagement. He supposed, undoubtedly, not hearing of me at once, that I was dead; and indeed, Hope, I thought I was very near death myself when I fell with my horse in that last charge. But I was only stunned and wounded, and managed to escape in spite of it. But, Hope, the most marvelous part of the story is yet untold." He drew from his breast a pair of mittens—brown mittens, with Magenta gauntlets. How well she remembered them, and shuddered as she remembered!

"Nay, do not tremble, Hope; these mittens saved my life." He unfolded them, and showed a pressure, round and even, with the threads broken and worn in its centre. "The ball which made this glanced off and lodged in my belt. If it had entered where it struck I should not be here, for it was just against my heart. The actual wound which I received was in my left shoulder, and was neither deep nor dangerous."

Briefly he went over his thoughts and emotions on the eve of the battle. The tears flowed down her cheeks as he added,

"God's providence guided me, Hope, I earnestly believe. He could have chosen no dearer instrument than you."

If Kitty Mills was amazed at this dénouement, she kept it carefully to herself; but Will wickedly declares that she is outwitted for once; and his sly allusions, as they sit over their cups at breakfast, produce the inevitable result—he kicks the table-legs and quarrels with Kitty.

TWO NIGHTS IN THE CATACOMBS.

It is rather difficult to obtain access to the catacombs of Paris, simply, I believe, because the Government consider that it is morbid and valueless curiosity which induces people to desire to visit such a spot; but there is an impression, more or less prevalent in the French provinces, that the reason why so many difficulties are thrown in the way of paying a visit to these gigantic galleries is owing to the fact that there is an entry into this underground world from the palace of the Tuileries. The provincials reverently believe that the reigning potentate, whether king or emperor, is afraid of assassins being able to penetrate into the palace by this entry if the catacombs become publicly known, and their intricacies made comprehensible. Say to any one of these provincials that the case would be met by blocking up this palatial entrance to the vaults, and you will get in return a violent shake of the head. "No, no," your countryman will answer; "if majesty is afraid of assassins entering from the catacombs, remember the catacombs would give a means of escaping if assassins, in the shape of rebels, entered at the open gate. No, no—they'll not block up the palace entrance to the catacombs. No, no!"

Let this be as it may, it is certain that I and a party of four, exclusive of the guide, obtained permission to visit underground Paris. And it is worthy of remark, as illustrating upon what small hinges serious events turn, that if I had not said the following words to the cabman who took me to the entrance, I should never have had to endure what I am about to describe. These words were: "If I do not return in half an hour, drive off." So saying, I paid the man in advance for waiting, and followed my party to the entrance-door, which was of heavy wood.

My reason for retaining the cabman was this: I had been waiting some days for the official permission to visit the catacombs, and on the very morning when it arrived I was preparing to start for London upon business of moment. Now the train started at twelve, and the written permit arrived at ten. I was undesirous of losing the opportunity for my underground exploration, and I was desirous of starting by the twelve o'clock train. I therefore came to the conclusion that if half an hour in the catacombs (from eleven to half past) would satisfy me, I could then catch the train by twelve if I had a cab ready: whereas if I found the exploration sufficiently attractive to occupy more time, I would then defer my departure until the evening.

I found the catacombs extraordinary, but monotonous. Every body knows that they were originally the stone mines which supplied the building material of Paris; in fact, it has been aptly said that Paris has been built of her own entrails. Let there be the least volcanic shock below Paris—she lies in a volcanic line—and her stupendous palaces, her whole being, would be swallowed in the tomb she herself has excavated.

At the beginning of this century Napoleon decreed extra-mural interment, and all the grave-yards within the walls of Paris were broken up and built over. The bones of centuries were moved into the catacombs. Millions of the bones of dead French were carried thither, and fantastically arranged. The visitor passes between two walls of skulls, which all seem to stare at him with a ghastly blind stare.

Ten minutes were quite enough to satisfy my curiosity; but our guide, true to his trade, kept on making the widest promises of coming wonders, and, as a couple of my party were ladies, I need not add that the party's curiosity was stimulated by the assertions of our leader.

We each carried a little lamp, and we looked an odd group.

"Well," said I, at last, "I really think I will leave you to your promenade. I can find my way back, I feel sure, and I have yet time to catch the train."

The guide laughed at the idea of my finding my way back to the entrance. I looked at my watch. It wanted ten minutes to the half hour; if I did not go back at once, the cab would be gone.

We had passed many transverse passages in our way; indeed, the catacombs, as I saw them, seemed a wide street, intersected at regular intervals by smaller streets, and courts, and alleys. I was the last of my party, and perhaps, reluctant as I felt to go on, I lagged behind. At all events, I was looking about me from one side to the other, when, as the lamp of my companions crossed one of the transverse cuttings, I noticed, a few steps along this passage, an immense skull, in which all the teeth were singularly perfect, white, and gleaming. I turned into the passage, meaning to inspect this skull more narrowly, when, as I moved my head toward it, a horrible rat, frightened at my presence, leaped, in its fright, against my cheek. I fell as though I had been shot. We all have antipathies, more or less, and my antipathy is rats. I abhor them. I am almost ashamed to say it, but the shock of the sudden appearance and touch of that rat caused me to faint. I must have lost my senses for many minutes.

When I knew myself again I was utterly in the dark. The blackness seemed absolutely to hit me. I heard not a sound at first; then a rumbling; it was a passing carriage rolling above my horrible tomb. For a few moments, I think, I lost my consciousness once more. I am not sure, however, on this point. Having again recovered it, I endeavored to grasp the full truth of my position.

My friends were not near me, that was certain.

Now, had they left the catacombs, or were they searching for me? That they discovered they had lost me, almost immediately after I had fainted, seemed to me certain. Then how was it they had left the spot near which they had last seen me? It was certain that, in looking for me, they would take the line we had traversed. Then why had they not found me? Suddenly the awful truth flashed upon me. They had thought, after calling to me many times and receiving no answer, that I had tried to make my way to the entrance. When they reached it the half hour was ended, and, the driver being gone, they had believed him to have taken me away, and so supposed me on my road to England.

It was a terrible knowledge to gain, but I did not utterly despair. I felt sure that the alarm would be taken before I had been long enough in my living tomb to die of starvation. But to pass even four or five days underground, without food or water, in a darkness which was positively maddening—

I could not remain inactive; I must do something. What could I do?

My first question was, should I remain where I lay? In the first place, such inaction would kill me; in the second, it was needless; for, as when the alarm should be taken, every inch of this subterranean world would be searched till I should be found, it mattered not whither I might have wandered—I should be equally safe any where.

I got up, stretched my hand, and touched the wall of skulls. I shrank to the ground again. A few moments, and I conquered my cowardice. I declare to you that within a few moments, and purely by dint of gravely and kindly reasoning with myself, I was able to touch the dead about me with absolute calmness; nay, I could run my hand over the shape of the skull with a kind of curiosity.

My lamp was shivered into a thousand pieces. I can not tell to this day how it was my companions did not hear the crash. I can only suppose that a carriage was rumbling along the road overhead when I fell.

Suddenly I thought of the rat. If the horrible thing came toward me, what should I do? The thought was parent to the belief that the execrable thing was there. I struck out instinctively, and, my hand coming upon some of the broken glass of the lamp, it was cut, and I felt blood flowing from the wounds. I bound my handkerchief, my gloves, my cravat, round and round the wounds, rather than a drop of my life's blood should fall, to become food for the horrible creature that had brought me to this pass.

But I felt I must move—I must seek to free myself while help was coming. Which way should I turn?

I remembered that I had entered the passage on my right, and that the skull was on the left; then, to leave it, in order to reach the road by which we had come, I must let it be on my right hand, and when I had reached the road I must turn to the left. I soon discovered the inordinately large skull, left it on my right, and groped my way the few steps to the roadway. I knew when I reached it by the angle of bones. Immediately my highly-pitched senses perceived a change. My right cheek experienced an increase of temperature. Mind—my right cheek.

I asked myself to what this change could be attributable? I soon answered myself. It was a current of air from the outer world. Now, thought I, this current of air—for current it was, though I could detect no movement in the atmosphere—must come from an opening; that opening must be at or near a door; then, if I follow up against this current, I shall ultimately reach the spot at which it enters.

Next moment I know I must have turned pale, for when I turned full face toward the current I could detect no difference of temperature. It required a contrast between the two cheeks, as it were, to ascertain the difference. I have since been told by a scientific friend that this can be accounted for. The nerves of the face, when I stood sideways, were struck by the current laterally, and therefore not so naturally as when the face was set toward it; because, as all the provisions of nature exhibit preservation of forces, the nerves of the face, in meeting the wind, naturally—that is, when the man is walking—are so placed in relation to the wind as to offer the least possible amount of nervous surface to its influence.

As suddenly as I had been struck with the cause of the current I obtained another means of ascertaining my way. I turned to the wall of skulls which flanked the main road, and against which my right hand still was. Now I thought that side of each skull which receives the warm current, precisely as my face received it, will, from its action, be drier than the other side, which has been infinitely less open to the influence of the comparatively drying influence of this external atmosphere.

It was as I thought. The right side of the skull—that is, the side which was right when I stood with my back to the wall—was smoother than the left; so it was with twenty other skulls. I was not in error, and my heart beat wildly. It was clear, let me follow this clew, and sooner or later it must lead me to the entrance.

But there was a fault!

I knew that we had come along the road which lay to my left; the current blew from the right. One of two causes accounted for this. Either I had become confused in my memory of the locality, and the right was my road, or there was more than one entrance to these vaults. I decided to move to the right. I never learned afterward how many miles I really did travel; to me it seemed hundreds. I went on and on—sometimes rapidly, sometimes slowly, but always surely. I knew that sooner or later I must come to a door. When I came to one of the transverse cuttings, of course I had to make several steps at random. The duration of those steps seemed years. My fingers trembled with agony until they touched once more the reassuring line of skulls. Sometimes I missed the clew both of the drier side of the skull and the test of heat on my face by turning it sideways, but I soon regained it by continuing on. I suppose that at those times I was skirting curves. How many hours I spent in that wondrous walk, that logical deduction, if so I may call it, I only knew when I was once more in the open air. If I had sat down and waited for help I should either have gone mad or idiotic, or have killed myself. Depend on it, reader, no matter how bad your condition, in whatever fix you may be placed, there is no help like your own.

I used to hear—I am speaking of my incarceration as though it lasted months—I used to hear the rumbling of the carriages overhead more or less distinctly, according to the depth of the stone above me. Yet it was company. That was the only noise which broke my silence.

Reverting to that current once more, it was astonishing how easily I learned its growing force, for I concentrated my whole mind upon the lesson. Ultimately, I could almost calculate the increase in its motion and temperature which so many hundred steps would yield. At last, suddenly, without any warning, the line of skulls ceased, and I touched wood!

It was a door of open lattice-work.

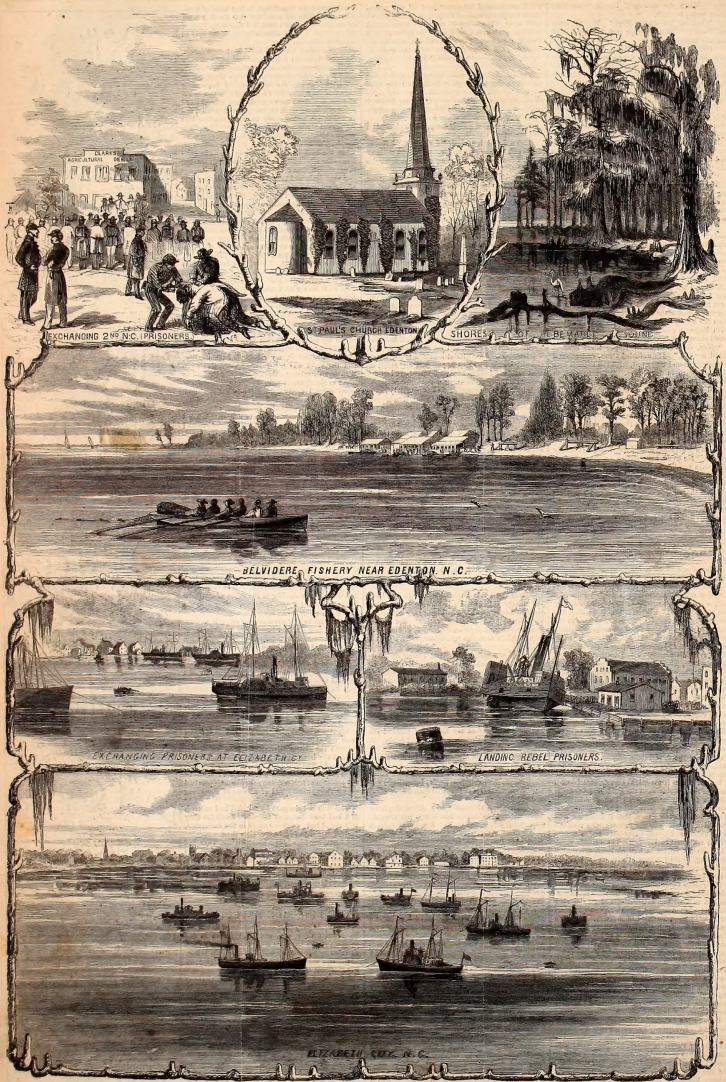
All looked dark beyond! But I knew I was at the exit. I had known that for many thousands of steps—many; and yet, when I touched the door, how I started!

What a celestial glory the day had as it broke upon my eyes, streaming in exquisite blue rays through the chinks of the outer door, which was beyond the lattice-work! I have no occasion to tell how I broke that lattice-work, how I hammered at the outer door, how I was at last released in the presence of half a dozen gens d'armes (who had drawn their swords), and of a score of wondering workmen.

This was not the gate by which I had entered. If I had been immured forty-two hours (as they told me), I had passed two nights in the catacombs, and all that time I had never once sat down.

I found my friends in a great fright. They had only just learned, by telegraph, that I had not reached England, and that nobody in London knew any thing about me. I was ill for some time, of course; but I recovered to claim the distinction of having touched more skulls than any other man living.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.



We devote page 172 to illustrations of Edenton, Elizabeth City, etc., and other scenes in the progress of the Burnside Expedition, chiefly from sketches by our correspondent, Mr. Angelo Wiser.

Edenton was occupied by Lieutenant Maury, of our gun-boat service, on 12th ult.

Elizabeth City, where General Burnside has exchanged prisoners with the rebels, is the capital of Pasquotank County, North Carolina, on the right bank of the Pasquotank River, about 20 miles from its mouth. It is 225 miles from Raleigh, and 50 south of Norfolk, Virginia. It is one of the most considerable towns in the northeastern part of the State. The population was about 3000, and it contained two banks, two or three printing-offices, and several churches. There was a large amount of Government stores in the place, which were destroyed by the rebels on the appearance of our gunboats. It was at Elizabeth City that Commander Rowan met and destroyed the enemy's fleet in Albemarle Sound.

THE FIRST SCENE.

COMBE-RAVEN, SOMERSETSHIRE.

CHAPTER I.

The hands on the hall clock pointed to half past six in the morning. The house was a country residence in West Somersetshire, called Combe-Raven. The day was the 4th of March, and the year was eighteen hundred and forty-six.

No sounds but the steady ticking of the clock, and the lumpish snoring of a large dog stretched on a mat outside the dining-room door, disturbed the mysterious morning stillness of hall and staircase. Who were the sleepers hidden in the upper regions? Let the house reveal its own secrets, and one by one, as they descend the stairs from their beds, let the sleepers disclose themselves.

As the clock pointed to a quarter to seven the dog woke and shook himself. After waiting in vain for the footman, who was accustomed to let him out, the animal wandered restlessly from one closed door to another on the ground-floor; and, returning to his mat in great perplexity, appealed to the sleeping family with a long and melancholy howl.

Before the last notes of the dog's remonstrance had died away the oaken stairs in the higher regions of the house creaked under slowly-descending footsteps. In a minute more the first of the female servants made her appearance, with a dingy woolen shawl over her shoulders—for the March morning was bleak, and rheumatism and the cook were old acquaintances.

Receiving the dog's first cordial advances with the worst possible grace, the cook slowly opened the hall door and let the animal out. It was a wild morning. Over a spacious lawn, and behind a black plantation of firs, the rising sun rent its way upward through piles of ragged gray cloud; heavy drops of rain fell few and far between; the March wind shuddered round the corners of the house, and the wet trees swayed wearily.

Seven o'clock struck, and the signs of domestic life began to show themselves in more rapid succession.

The house-maid came down—tall and slim, with the state of the spring temperature written redly on her nose. The lady's-maid followed—young, smart, plump, and sleepy. The kitchen-maid came next—afflicted with the face-ache, and making no secret of her sufferings. Last of all the footman appeared, yawning disconsolately—the living picture of a man who felt that he had been defrauded of his fair night's rest.

The conversation of the servants when they assembled before the slowly-lighting kitchen fire referred to a recent family event, and turned at starting on this question: Had Thomas, the footman, seen any thing of the concert at Clifton, at which his master and the two young ladies had been present on the previous night? Yes, Thomas had heard the concert; he had been paid for to go in at the back; it was a loud concert; it was a hot concert; it was described at the top of the bills as Grand; whether it was worth traveling sixteen miles to hear by railway, with the additional hardship of going back nineteen miles by road at half past one in the morning, was a question which he would leave his master and the young ladies to decide; his own opinion, in the mean time, being unhesitatingly No. Further inquiries on the part of all the female servants in succession elicited no additional information of any sort. Thomas could hum none of the songs, and could describe none of the ladies' dresses. His audience accordingly gave him up in despair; and the kitchen small-talk flowed back into its ordinary channels, until the clock struck eight, and startled the assembled servants into separating for their morning's work.

A quarter past eight, and nothing happened. Half past—and more signs of life appeared from the bedroom regions. The next member of the family who came down stairs was Mr. Andrew Vanstone, the master of the house.

Tall, stout, and upright—with bright blue eyes, and healthy, florid complexion—his brown plush shooting-jacket carelessly buttoned awry; his vixenish little Scotch terrier barking unrebuked at his heels; one hand thrust into his waistcoat pocket, and the other smacking the balusters cheerfully as he came down stairs humming a tune—Mr. Vanstone showed his character on the surface of him freely to all men. An easy, hearty, handsome, good-humored gentleman, who walked on the sunny side of the way of life, and who asked nothing better than to meet all his fellow-passengers in this world on the sunny side too. Estimating him by years, he had turned fifty. Judging him by lightness of heart, strength of constitution, and capacity for enjoyment, he was no older than most men who have only turned thirty.

"Thomas!" cried Mr. Vanstone, taking up his old felt hat and his thick walking-stick from the hall-table. "Breakfast this morning at ten. The young ladies are not likely to be down earlier after the concert last night. By-the-by, how did you like the concert yourself, eh? You thought it was Grand? Quite right; so it was. Nothing but Crash-Bang, varied now and then by Bang-Crash; all the women dressed within an inch of their lives; smothering heat, blazing gas, and no room for any body—yes, yes, Thomas: Grand's the word for it, and Comfortable isn't." With that expression of opinion Mr. Vanstone whistled to his vixenish terrier, flourished his stick at the hall-door in cheerful defiance of the rain, and set off through wind and weather for his morning walk.

The hands, stealing their steady way round the dial of the clock, pointed to ten minutes to nine. Another member of the family appeared on the stairs—Miss Garth, the governess.

No observant eyes could have surveyed Miss Garth without seeing at once that she was a north-countrywoman. Her hard-featured face; her masculine readiness and decision of movement; her obstinate honesty of look and manner, all proclaimed her border birth and border training. Though little more than forty years of age, her hair was quite gray; and she wore over it the plain cap of an old woman. Neither hair nor head-dress was out of harmony with her face—it looked older than her years; the hard handwriting of trouble had scored it heavily at some past time. The self-possession of her progress down the stairs, and the air of habitual authority with which she looked about her, spoke well for her position in Mr. Vanstone's family. This was evidently not one of the forlorn, persecuted, pitiably dependent order of governesses. Here was a woman who lived on ascertained and honorable terms with her employers—a woman who looked capable of sending any parents in England to the right about if they failed to rate her at her proper value.

"Breakfast at ten?" repeated Miss Garth, when the footman had answered the bell, and had mentioned his master's orders. "Ha! I thought what would come of that concert last night. When people who live in the country patronize public amusements, public amusements return the compliment by upsetting the family afterward for days together. You're upset, Thomas, I can see—your eyes are as red as a ferret's, and your cravat looks as if you had slept in it. Bring the kettle at a quarter to ten; and if you don't get better in the course of the day, come to me and I'll give you a dose of physic. That's a well-meaning lad, if you only let him alone," continued Miss Garth, in soliloquy, when Thomas had retired; "but he's not strong enough for concerts twenty miles off. They wanted me to go with them last night. Yes: catch me!"

Nine o'clock struck; and the minute-hand stole on to twenty minutes past the hour before any more footsteps were heard on the stairs. At the end of that time two ladies appeared, descending to the breakfast-room together—Mrs. Vanstone and her eldest daughter.

If the personal attractions of Mrs. Vanstone, at an earlier period of life, had depended solely on her native English charms of complexion and freshness, she must have long since lost the last relics of her fairer self. But her beauty, as a young woman, had passed beyond the average national limits, and she still preserved the advantage of her more exceptional personal gifts. Although she was now in her forty-fourth year, although she had been tried, in by-gone times, by the premature loss of more than one of her children, and by long attacks of illness which had followed those bereavements of former years, she still preserved the fair proportion and subtle delicacy of feature once associated with the all-adorning brightness and freshness of beauty, which had left her never to return. Her eldest child, now descending the stairs by her side, was the mirror in which she could look back and see again the reflection of her own youth. There, folded thick on the daughter's head, lay the massive dark hair which, on the mother's, was fast turning gray. There, in the daughter's cheek, glowed the lovely dusky red which had faded from the mother's, to bloom again no more. Miss Vanstone had already reached the first maturity of womanhood: she had completed her six-and-twentieth year. Inheriting the dark, majestic character of her mother's beauty, she had yet hardly inherited all its charms. Though the shape of her face was the same, the features were scarcely so delicate, their proportion was scarcely so true. She was not so tall. She had the dark brown eyes of her mother—full and soft, with the steady lustre in them which Mrs. Vanstone's eyes had lost—and yet there was less interest, less refinement and depth of feeling in her expression: it was gentle and feminine, but clouded by a certain quiet reserve, from which her mother's face was free. If we dare to look closely enough, may we not observe that the moral force of character and the higher intellectual capacities in parents seem often to wear out mysteriously in the course of transmission to children? In these days of insidious nervous exhaustion and subtly-spreading nervous malady, is it not possible that the same rule may apply, less rarely than we are willing to admit, to the bodily gifts as well?

The mother and daughter slowly descended the stairs together—the first dressed in dark brown, with an Indian shawl thrown over her shoulders; the second more simply attired in black, with a plain collar and cuffs, and a dark orange-colored ribbon over the bosom of her dress. As they crossed the hall and entered the breakfast-room Miss Vanstone was full of the all-absorbing subject of the last night's concert.

"I am so sorry, mamma, you were not with us," she said. "You have been so strong and so well ever since last summer—you have felt so many years younger, as you said yourself—that I am sure the exertion would not have been too much for you."

"Perhaps not, my love; but it was as well to keep on the safe side."

"Quite as well," remarked Miss Garth, appearing at the breakfast-room door. "Look at Norah (good-morning, my dear)—look, I say, at Norah. A perfect wreck; a living proof of your wisdom and mine in staying at home. The vile gas, the foul air, the late hours—what can you expect? She's not made of iron, and she suffers accordingly. No, my dear, you needn't deny it. I see you've got a headache."

Norah's dark, handsome face brightened into a smile, then lightly clouded again with its accustomed quiet reserve.

"A very little headache; not half enough to make me regret the concert," she said, and walked away by herself to the window.

On the far side of a garden and paddock the view overlooked a stream, some farm-buildings which lay beyond, and the opening of a wooded rocky pass (called, in Somersetshire, a Combe), which here cleft its way through the hills that closed the prospect. A winding strip of road was visible, at no great distance, amidst the undulations of the open ground; and along this strip the stalwart figure of Mr. Vanstone was now easily recognizable, returning to the house from his morning walk. He flourished his stick gayly as he observed his eldest daughter at the window. She nodded and waved her hand in return, very gracefully and prettily, but with something of old-fashioned formality in her manner, which looked strangely in so young a woman, and which seemed out of harmony with a salutation addressed to her father.

The hall clock struck the adjourned breakfast-hour. When the minute-hand had recorded the lapse of five minutes more, a door banged in the bedroom regions—a clear young voice was heard singing blithely—light, rapid footsteps pattered on the upper stairs, descended with a jump to the landing, and pattered again, faster than ever, down the lower flight. In another moment the youngest of Mr. Vanstone's two daughters (and two only surviving children) dashed into view on the dingy old oaken stairs with the suddenness of a flash of light, and clearing the last three steps into the hall at a jump, presented herself breathless in the breakfast-room, to make the family circle complete.

By one of those strange caprices of Nature, which science leaves still unexplained, the youngest of Mr. Vanstone's children presented no recognizable resemblance to either of her parents. How had she come by her hair? how had she come by her eyes? Even her father and mother had asked themselves those questions as she grew up to girlhood, and had been sorely perplexed to answer them. Her hair was of that purely light-brown hue—unmixed with flaxen, or yellow, or red—which is oftener seen on the plumage of a bird than on the head of a human being. It was soft and plentiful, and waved downward from her low forehead in regular folds; but, to some tastes, it was dull and dead, in its absolute want of glossiness, in its monotonous purity of plain light color. Her eyebrows and eyelashes were just a shade darker than her hair, and seemed made expressly for those violet-blue eyes, which assert their most irresistible charm when associated with a fair complexion. But it was here exactly that the promise of her face failed of performance in the most startling manner. The eyes, which should have been dark, were incomprehensibly and discordantly light: they were of that nearly colorless gray which, though little attractive in itself, possesses the rare compensating merit of interpreting the finest gradations of thought, the gentlest changes of feeling, the deepest trouble of passion, with a subtle transparency of expression which no darker eyes can rival. Thus quaintly self-contradictory in the upper part of her face, she was hardly less at variance with established ideas of harmony in the lower. Her lips had the true feminine delicacy of form, her cheeks the lovely roundness and smoothness of youth; but the mouth was too large and firm, the chin too square and massive for her sex and age. Her complexion partook of the pure monotony of tint which characterized her hair—it was of the same soft, warm, creamy fairness all over, without a tinge of color in the cheeks, except on occasions of unusual bodily exertion, or sudden mental disturbance. The whole countenance—so remarkable in its strongly-opposed characteristics—was rendered additionally striking by its extraordinary mobility. The large, electric, light-gray eyes were hardly ever in repose; all varieties of expression followed each other over the plastic, ever-changing face, with a giddy rapidity which left sober analysis far behind in the race. The girl's exuberant vitality asserted itself all over her, from head to foot. Her figure—taller than her sister's, taller than the average of woman's height; instinct with such a seductive, serpentine suppleness, so lightly and playfully graceful that its movements suggested, not unnaturally, the movements of a young cat—her figure was so perfectly developed already that no one who saw her could have supposed that she was only eighteen. She bloomed in the full physical maturity of twenty years or more—bloomed naturally and irresistibly, in right of her matchless health and strength. Here, in fact, lay the mainspring of this strangely-constituted organization. Her headlong course down the house-stairs; the brisk activity of all her movements; the incessant sparkle of expression in her face; the enticing gayety which took the hearts of the quietest people by storm—even the reckless delight in bright colors, which showed itself in her brilliantly-striped morning-dress, in her fluttering ribbons, in the large scarlet rosettes on her smart little shoes—all sprang alike from the same source; from the overflowing physical health which strengthened every muscle, braced every nerve, and set the warm young blood tingling through her veins like the blood of a growing child.

On her entry into the breakfast-room she was saluted with the customary remonstrance which her flighty disregard of all punctuality habitually provoked from the long-suffering household authorities. In Miss Garth's favorite phrase, "Magdalen was born with all the senses—except a sense of order."

Magdalen! It was a strange name to have given her? Strange indeed; and yet chosen under no extraordinary circumstances. The name had been borne by one of Mr. Vanstone's sisters, who had died in early youth; and in affectionate remembrance of her, it had descended his second daughter by it—just as he had called his eldest daughter Norah for the sake of his dead wife. Perhaps the grand old Bible name —suggestive of a sad and sombre dignity; reflecting, in its first association, the sentiment of penitence and seclusion—had been here, as events had turned out, inappropriately bestowed! Surely this self-contradictory girl had perversely accomplished one contradiction more by developing into a character which was out of all harmony with her own Christian name!

"Late again!" said Mrs. Vanstone, as Magdalen breathed kisses behind her.

"Late again!" chimed in Miss Garth, when Magdalen came round to her chair. "Well! I'm not out, taking the girl's chin familiarly in her hand, with a half-satirical, half-fond attention which betrayed at once the youngest and the oldest all her faults, was the governess's favorite—"Well! and what has the matter been about now? What form of suffering has dissipation inflicted on your system this morning?"

"Suffering!" repeated Magdalen, recovering her breath, and the use of her tongue with it. "I don't know the meaning of the word, and if there's any thing the matter with me, I'm too well. Suffering! I'm ready for another concert to-night, and I'll undertake to dance all day after. Oh, cried Magdalen, dropping into a chair, and crossing her hands rapturously on the table, "I'm in high spirits—I'm in pleasure!"

"Come! that's explicit, at any rate," said Miss Garth. "And I think I can guess what it's all you in his mind when he wrote his famous lines:

"'Men some to business, some to pleasure take,
But every woman is at heart a rake.'

"The deuce she is!" cried Mr. Vanstone, entering the room in time to hear the last line making its quotation, with the dregs at his heels. "Well; live and learn. If you're all rakes, Miss Garth, the sense of your privileges will be a new experience, and the men will have nothing left for it but to open the door and darn the stockings.—Let's have some breakfast."

"How-d'ye-do, papa?" said Magdalen, taking Mr. Vanstone's unbuttered cup of coffee to the urn if he belonged to some larger order of Newfoundland dog, and was unable to be trusted at it his daughter's convenience. "I'm the rake Miss Garth means; and I want to go to another concert—as if you hadn't given me leave to prefer it—or any thing else in the way of amusement that puts me into a new dress, and plunges me into a crowd of people, and intoxicates me with plenty of light, and sets me in a tingle of excitement all over, from head to foot. I'm willing will do, as long as it doesn't send us to bed at eleven o'clock."

Mr. Vanstone sat down composedly under his daughter's flow of language, like a man who was well used to the tumultuous rain of a thunderstorm.

"If I am to be allowed my choice of amusements next time," said the worthy gentleman, "I think a play will suit me better than a concert. The plots enjoyed themselves amazingly, my dear," he continued, addressing his wife, "the last time I did, I must say. It was altogether above my mark. They played one piece of music which lasted four hours. It appeared to me a mistake in the way; and we all thought it was done each time, and dropped our hands in our laps in front of it. But on it went again, to our great surprise and mortification, till we gave it up in despair, and all wished ourselves at Jericho. Ah, ah, my dear, when we had Crash-Bang for forty minutes, with three stoppages by the way, had all they call it!"

"A Symphony, papa," replied Norah.

"Yes, yes; nothing odd. Can't a man sympathy be the great Beethoven?" added Magdalen. "How can you say you were not amused? Have you forgotten the swollen-looking German woman, with the unpronounceable name? Don't you remember the fierce she made when she sang? and the way she contrasted and contested, till she cheated the foolish people into crying encore? Look here, mamma—look here, Miss Garth!"

She snatched up an empty plate from the table to represent a sheet of music, held it before her as the established concert-room position, and produced an imitation of the unfortunate singer's grimaces and contortions so completely and exquisitly true to the original, that her father roared with laughter; and even the footman (who came in at that moment with the post-bag) rushed out of the room again, and committed the indecorum of echoing the laughter from over the other side of the door.

"Letters, papa. I want the key," said Magdalen, passing from the imitation at the breakfast-table to the post-bag on the sideboard with the easy alternation which characterized all her actions.

Mr. Vanstone searched his pockets and shook his head. Though his youngest daughter might resemble him in nothing else, it was easy to see where Magdalen's unmethodical habits came from.

"I dare say I have left it in the library, along with my other keys," said Mr. Vanstone. "Go and look for it, my dear."

"You really should check Magdalen," pleaded Mrs. Vanstone, addressing her husband, when her daughter had left the room. "Those habits of mimicry are growing on her, and she speaks to you with a levity which is positively shocking to hear."

"Except what I have said myself, till I am tired of repeating it," remarked Miss Garth. "She treats Mr. Vanstone as if he was a kind of younger brother of hers."

"You are kind to us in every thing else, papa; and you have had allowances for Magdalen's high spirits—don't you?" said the quiet Norah, taking her father's part and her sister's, with an indirect show of motivation on the surface, that few observers would have been sharp enough to detect the genuine substance beneath it.

"Thank you, my dear," said good-natured Mr. Vanstone. "Thank you, for a very pretty speech. As for Magdalen, I'm sentenced, addressing his wife and Miss Garth, "she's an unbroken filly. Let her caper and kick in the paddock to her heart's content. Time enough to break her to harness when she gets a little older."

The door opened, and Magdalen returned with the key. She unlocked the post-bag as the sideboard and proceeded to empty it on the table. Sorting them gayly in less than a minute, she appropriated and distributed the letters with both hands, and delivered the letters all round with the business-like rapidity of a London postman.

"Two for Norah—both addressed, apparently, with her sister. "Three for Miss Garth. None for mamma. One for me. One for father—of course. You lazy old darling, you hate answering letters, don't you?" pursued Magdalen, with a mischievous look at her father, and assuming the daughter's. "How you will grumble and fidget in the study when you open it, and wish there were no such things as letters in the world! and how red your nice old bald head will get as the sheet of paper is turned, back and forwards! and how many of the answers you will leave until to-morrow, after all! The Bristol Mercury's gone, as it happened, this time; suddenly in her father's ear; "I saw it in the newspaper when I was in the library to get the key. Let's go to-morrow night!"

While his daughter was chattering Mr. Vanstone was mechanically opening his letters. He turned over the first four in succession, and looked round to Magdalen, smiling. "This has come to the fifth, his attention, which had hitherto wandered toward Magdalen, suddenly become fixed and concentrated on the letter.

Stooping over him, with her head on his shoulder, Magdalen could see the black mark as plainly as her father could—NEW ORLEANS.

"An American letter, papa!" she said. "Who do you know in New Orleans?"

Mrs. Vanstone started, and looked eagerly at her husband the moment Magdalen spoke those words.

Mr. Vanstone said nothing. He quietly removed his head from his daughter's neck, as if he wished to be free from all interruption. She returned accordingly to her place at the breakfast-table. Mr. Vanstone, as the letter in his hand, waited a little before he opened it; her daughter looking, as he did so, at the envelope. expectant attention, which attracted Miss Garth's notice and Norah's as well as Magdalen's.

After a moment more Mr. Vanstone did.

His face changed the instant he read the first lines; his cheeks fading to a dull, yellow-brown hue, which would have been ashy paleness in a darker man. His head unconsciously becoming saddened and overclouded in a moment. Norah and Magdalen, watching anxiously, saw the change but the others were unaware of their father. Miss Garth alone observed the effect which that change produced on the attentive mistress of the house.

It was not the effect which she, or any one, would have anticipated. Mrs. Vanstone looked excited rather than alarmed. A faint flush rose on her cheeks as she hastily swallowed the rest of the tea round and round in her cup in a restless, impatient manner which was not natural to her.

Magdalen, in her capacity as favorite child, was, as usual, the first to break the silence.

"What is it, papa?" she asked.

"Nothing," said Mr. Vanstone, sharply, without looking up at her.

"Mamma! there must be something," persisted Magdalen. "I'm sure there is bad news, papa, from your face. Is it bad news?"

"There is nothing in the letter that concerns you," said Mr. Vanstone.

It was the first harsh retbuff that Magdalen had ever received from her father. She looked at him with an incredulous surprise, which would have been remarkable under almost any possible circumstances.

Nothing more was said. For the first time, perhaps, in their lives, the family sat round the breakfast-table in painful silence. Mr. Vanstone's hand moving nervously, as he read the morning spirits, was gone. He absently broke off some morsels of toast from the slice on his plate, absently finished his first cup of tea, then asked for a second, which he left before him untouched.

"Norah," he said, after an interval, "you had better take me, Magdalen, my dear, you can go when you like."

His daughters rose immediately, and Miss Garth considerately followed their example. When an easy-tempered man does assert himself in his family, the rarity of the demonstration invariably has its effect; and the will of that easy-tempered man is Law.

"What can have happened?" whispered Norah, as they closed the breakfast-room door and crossed the hall.

"Norah," he said, after an interval, "you had better take me, Magdalen, my dear, you can go when you like."

His daughters rose immediately, and Miss Garth considerately followed their example. When an easy-tempered man does assert himself in his family, the rarity of the demonstration invariably has its effect; and the will of that easy-tempered man is Law.

"What can have happened?" whispered Norah, as they closed the breakfast-room door and crossed the hall.

"What do you mean by being cross with Mr.?" exclaimed Magdalen, chafing under a sense of her own injury.

"May I ask what right you had to pry into your father's private affairs?" retorted Miss Garth.

"Right?" repeated Magdalen. "I have no secrets from papa—what business has papa to have secrets from me? I consider myself insulted."

"If you considered yourself properly reproved for not minding your own business," said the plain-spoken Miss Garth, "you would be a trifle nearer the truth. Ah! you're like all the rest of the girls in the present. Not one in a hundred of you knows which end of her's upermost."

The three ladies entered the morning-room; and Magdalen acknowledged Miss Garth's reproof by bursting into tears.

Half an hour passed, and neither Mr. Vanstone nor his wife left the breakfast-room. The servant, ignorant of what had happened, went in to clear the table—found his master and mistress seated close together in deep conversation—and immediately went out again. Another quarter of an hour elapsed before the breakfast-room door was opened, and the private conference of the husband and wife came to an end.

"I hear mamma in the hall," said Norah. "Perhaps she is coming to tell us something."

Mrs. Vanstone entered the morning-room in her daughter's absence. The color was deeper on her cheeks, and the brightness of half-dried tears glistened in her eyes: her step was more hasty; all her movements were quicker than usual.

"I bring news, my dears, which will surprise you," she said. "Good news, I hope and trust. Your father and I are going to London to-morrow."

Magdalen caught her mother by the arm in speechless astonishment. Miss Garth dropped her work on her lap; even the sedate Norah seemed to be taken by surprise. Mrs. Vanstone went on, "Going to London to-morrow, my dears, on business which your father has to settle with the lawyers. Only a few days, I dare say—only a few days. Even Magdalen will have to do without her dancing to-day—many things to set in order before to-morrow. There, there, my love, let me go."

She drew herself away; hastily kissed her youngest daughter on the forehead; and at once left the room. Even Magdalen saw that her mother was not to be coaxed into hearing or answering any more questions.

The morning passed on, and nothing was seen of Mr. Vanstone. With the reckless curiosity of her age and station, Magdalen broke the rule of Miss Garth's prohibition and her sister's remonstrances, determined to go to the study, and look for her father. When she tried the door it was locked on the inside. She said, "It's only me, papa;" and waited for the answer, "Go away," that was the only one she got.

Mrs. Vanstone, in another way, equally inaccessible. She remained in her own room, with the female servants about her, immersed in endless preparations for a approaching journey. The servants, little used in that family to sudden resolutions, were in a state of confusion, ever awkward and confused in obeying directions. They ran from room to room unnecessarily, and lost time and temper in the jostling each other on the stairs. If a stranger had entered the house that day, he would have supposed that an unexpected disaster had happened in it, instead of an unexpected necessity for a journey to London. Nothing proceeded in its ordinary routine. Magdalen, who was accustomed to pass the morning at the piano, wandered restlessly about the staircases and passages, and in and out of doors when there were glimpses of fine weather. Norah, whose favorite occupation was to withdraw into a family proverb, took up book after book from table and shelf, and laid them down again, in despair of fixing her attention. Even Miss Garth felt the all-pervading influence of the household disorganization, and sat alone by the morning-room fire, with her head shaking ominously and her work laid aside.

Family affairs! thought Miss Garth, pondering over Mrs. Vanstone's vague explanatory words. Of all the troublesome words in Christendom, Family affairs! Mrs. Vanstone, Norah, and these are the first family affairs which have got between the parents and the children in the whole experience. What does it mean? Change? I suppose I'm getting old. I don't like change."

CHAPTER II.

At ten o'clock the next morning Norah and Magdalen were seated in the hall at Combe-Raven watching the departure of the carriage which took their father and mother to the London train.

Up to the last moment both the sisters had hoped for some explanation of that mysterious family journey among them. Mr. Vanstone had so briefly alluded on the previous day. No such explanation had been offered. Even the agitation of the leave-taking, under circumstances entirely new in the home experience of the parents and children, had not taken the resolved discretion of Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone. They had gone—with the customary affectionate solicitude with farewell embraces fervently reiterated again and again—but without dropping one word, from first to last, on the nature of their errand.

As the grating sound of the carriage-wheels ceased suddenly at a turn in the road, the sisters looked one another in the face; each feeling, and each betraying in her own way, the dreary sense that she was openly excluded, for the first time, from the confidence of her parents. Norah's customary reserve strengthened into sullen silence—she sat down in one of the hall chairs and looked out frowningly through the open hall door. Magdalen, as usual when her own temper was ruffled, expressed her dissatisfaction in the plainest terms. "I don't care who knows it—I think the conduct of us absurdly ill-used!" With those words, the young lady followed her sister's example by seating herself on a hall chair, and looking aimlessly out through the open house-door.

Almost at the same moment Miss Garth entered the hall from the morning-room. Her quick observation showed her the necessity for interfering to some practical purpose, and her ready good sense at once pointed the way.

"Look up, both of you, if you please, and listen to me," said Miss Garth. "If you are all three to be comfortable and happy together, now we are alone, we must stick to our regular hours and go on in our regular way. There is the state of things in plain words. Accept the situation, my dears, as the best that I can find you the example. I have just ordered an excellent dinner at the customary hour, and am going to the medicine-chest next to physic the kitchenmaid—an unwholesome girl, whose face-ache is the result, in the most obvious form, of her own gluttony. Norah, my dear, you will find your work and your books, as usual, in the library. Magdalen, suppose you leave off tying your handkerchief into knots, and use your fingers on the keys of the piano instead? Well! that's over, and take the dogs out afterward. Be as brisk and cheerful, both of you, as I am. Come! rouse up directly! I don't like a gloomy face on a holiday, or sure as my name's Garth I'll give your mother written warning to send us all home by friends by the mixed train at twelve-forty.

Concluding her address of exhortation in these terms, Miss Garth led Norah to the library door, pushed Magdalen into the morning-room, and returned in good way sternly to the regions of the medicine-chest.

In this half-jesting, half-earnest manner she was accustomed to maintain a kind of friendly authority over Mr. Vanstone's daughters after her proper functions as governess had become really come to an end. Norah, it was needless to say, had long since ceased to be her pupil, and Magdalen had left by this time entirely out of education. But Miss Garth had lived too long and too intimately under Mr. Vanstone's roof to be parted with for any purely formal considerations; and the first hint at going away which she had thrown out in the drop was dismissed with such affectionate warmth of protest that she never repeated it again except in jest. The unexpected event of the first morning was, from that time forth, left in her hands; and to those duties alone was free to which the considerable assistance she could render to Norah's reading, and what friendly superintendence she could still exercise over Magdalen's needle. Such were the terms on which Miss Garth was now a resident in Mr. Vanstone's family.

Toward the afternoon the weather improved. A half part of the day's exercise was a necessity; and the ladies left the house, accompanied by the dogs, to set forth on their walk.

The direction of the stream, ascended by the little rocky pass to the hills beyond; then diverged to the left, and returned to the house, who looked attentively first at Magdalen, then at Norah. They immediately saw that he was aware that he was dressed in black, and that he was a total stranger to them, and continued their homeward walk, without thinking more about the lingering foot-passenger whom they had met on their way back.

After they had left the village and had entered the road which led straight to the house, Magdalen supposed Miss Garth to be considering that the stranger in black had turned after they had passed him, and was now following them. "It's a pity," she said, "that he's a side of the road, mischievously. "I'm not the attraction—don't flatter me."

Whether the man was really following them or not made little difference, for they were now close to the house. The moment though the lodge-gates Miss Garth looked round, and saw that the stranger was undoubtedly behind her, apparently with the purpose of entering into conversation. Seeing this, she at once directed the young ladies to go on to the house and the dogs, while she herself waited for events at the gate.

There was no need to suggest this discreet arrangement before the stranger reached the lodge. He took off his hat to Miss Garth politely as she turned toward him, and then took like on the face of him? He looked like a clergyman in difficulties.

Taking his certain from top to toe the picture of him began with a tall hat, broadly encircled by a mourning band of crape. Below the hat was a lean, long, sallow face, deeply pitted with the small-pox, and characterized, moreover, by eyes of the most singular colors —one bilious green, one bilious brown, both sharply observant. His hair was iron-gray, carefully brushed round at the temples. His cheeks and chin were in the bluest bloom of close shaving. His neck was without flannel; his lips long, thin, and supple, curled up at the corners with a mildly affectionate smile. His white cravat was high, stiff, and dingy; the collar, higher, stiffer, and dingier, projected in rigid angles on either side beyond the chin. Lower down, the little little figure of the man was arrayed throughout in sober-shabby black. His frock-coat was buttoned tight round the waist, and left to bulge open majestically at the chest. His hands were covered with black cotton gloves nearly darned at the fingers; his umbrella, worn down at the ferule to the last quarter of an inch, was carefully preserved, nevertheless, in an oil-skin case. The front view of him was the best view in which to study the interesting lean face to face he might have been cut-
